"Tanglewood" now comprises one of the handsomest estates to be seen in the Berkshires; the formal gardens are kept in fine condition, the broad lawns are richly-hued after the early-week rains, and the whole atmosphere of the festival is one of dignity and charm and above that of any other summer musical community in the world. Confidence in the Boston Symphony and all it stands for in the world today in inevitably strengthened.

Dr. Koussevitsky drew upon works from the past season's repertory for the opening concert; they were, furthermore, works known to every concert-goer, and had with one exception figured on the New Haven programs of this orchestra. To begin, the orchestra sounded the invigorating freshness of Haydn's "Paris" Symphony No. 88, followed by Two Nocturnes by Claude Debussy, and the "Afternoon of a Faun." In closing, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was unfolded to its mighty, victorious climax. Not alone as a gesture, but as distinct novelty, the pre-intermission work was the Choros No. 10 by the distinguished Brazilian composer, Heitor Villa-Lobos. In this work the Berkshire Musical Association chorus assisted. This prolific composer has frankly attempted something new in this unusual work; his poem, only remotely adhered to, is calm enough in statement, but striking instrumental and vocal effects are sought, Indian words are sung over a Portugese text, and the rhythms fall into several classifications embodied in the works of utmost modern composers, together with liberal doses of jazz and swing. Harmonically, I doubt that it is very complex, but it is designed for effect, and as such, achieves without any question that sense of excitement achieved by "The Rio Grande" and "Bolero."

The audience, numbering 9,000 persons, took Sr. Villa-Lobos Choros No. 10 in good part, but unmistakably found its greatest satisfaction in the familiar works. At the Berkshire Festival there is always a friendly spirit, punctuated by the surprise of meeting visitors from remote parts; celebrities are always on hand, from governors to movie stars, with a high percentage of noted musicians numbered among the throng.

H. EARLE JOHNSON.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

AUG 3 - 1941

Berkshire as a Music Center

Summer music centers are multiplying, as might be expected from the steady growth of interest in music and from the great number of distinguished musicians, native and foreign, now resident in the United States, but Berkshire, made a musical Mecca by the festivals of chamber music long maintained at Pittsfield by Mrs Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, has a long lead.

That would be assured by its symphonic festivals, the eighth of which concludes its first series this afternoon with a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, assisted by the famous Russian 'cellist Gregor Piatigorsky, who will play from manuscript a new concerto by Paul Hindemith. But the festival has come to be but a part of varied activities which make the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood much more truly a music center. This concerto, for example, is inscribed "Lenox, Mass.," and was written last summer while its distinguished composer was a teacher of composition at Tanglewood.

There was a time when ambitious young American musicians felt it obligatory to spend their summers in study in Europe, and American conductors and managers went abroad to meet the rising musicians in Europe, to find new scores and to engage new singers and virtuosi for the next concert season. At present, however, most of the best known composers and other musicians of Europe are either in the United States or doing their best to escape from where they are, and America is becoming the home of music in a sense hardly imaginable a few decades ago.

In this trend Berkshire's music center has taken an important part, and to the leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, is due primary credit for seeing the great possibilities arising from the summer season at Tanglewood and the musical blackout of Europe by the war. Singing by a large chorus has broadened the scope of the festivals, operatic study has been added, the virtuosi of the orchestra give instruction on their instruments, composers have a chance to learn the elements of the subtler nuances of orchestration, and musicians and music lovers come into stimulating contact with each other and with eminent masters. For people interested in music a summer in Berkshire is something to look forward to with eager anticipation.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

AUG 3 - 1941

240

SHOSTAKOVICH 5TH PLAYED AT LENOX

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Orchestra at Tanglewood in Symphony by Russian

'LEONORE' NO. 3 OFFERED

Beethoven Overture Opens the Program and Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Work Is Heard

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 2—Serge Koussevitzky waited only until the second concert of the eighth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival here tonight before reaffirming his espousal of the cause of Shostakovich's Fifth symphony. The work of the Soviet Union's most gifted living composer had a place of honor on tonight's program at Tanglewood.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the orchestra have given the music a series of stunning performances during the last year, and they have programmed the symphony at every opportunity. Twice they played it in Boston; twice in New York; several times on tour.

To begin tonight's program, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra offered Mendelssohn's Symphony in A major, No. 4, known as the "Italian," which has a gracious, lilting loveliness. It was followed by Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, and the second half was given over to the Shostakovich symphony.

By this juxtaposition, Mr. Koussevitzky was taking a neat sideswipe at Nazi "philosophy" in so far as a conductor can do so by program construction. Mendelssohn's music is barred in Nazi Germany. Beethoven's overture speaks with passion and fire in the cause of man's fight to free himself from oppression. And Shostakovich is a representative of the latest nation to feel the impact of the Nazi invader; the symphony, in fact, was written in 1937 to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of the Soviet revolution.

Today there was the usual Saturday morning rehearsal for subscribers and school children of the vicinity. Even for a rehearsal there was a record-breaking audience, with 4,000 men, women and children in the music shed. Early in the rehearsal Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Festival Association, announced that Mr. Koussevitzky would lead the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" in memory of Norval H. Busey Jr., vice president of the festival, who was killed in an automobile accident early this week. The audience stood several moments in silence before Mr. Koussevitzky played the tribute.

During the rehearsal Olin Downes spoke about the week-end's programs, and later in the afternoon he lectured in the new chamber music hall during an informal program of ancient choral and instrumental music, played by students here and prepared by Paul Hindemith.

This Clipping From MISSOULA, MONT.
MISSOULIAN

AUG 3 1941

The Music Box

By Allegra

Twenty years ago today the morning newspapers carried a dispatch that shocked and profoundly grieved millions of music-lovers the world over. Enrico Caruso had died the day before, in his native Naples. He was only 48, and although he had been having serious throat trouble, he could still sing like nobody else in his own or recent times, and was supposedly convalescing rapidly from his latest operation. Death overtook him in the midst of eager plans for resuming his place at the Metropolitan Opera in the fall.

Natural gifts and hard work brought Caruso the blazing fame that still endures and makes it unnecessary to repeat here the oft-told account of his career. The words of W. J. Henderson in his New York Sun article of August 3, 1921 are as true in 1941: "No other tenor remembered by living opera-goers had so beautiful a voice. No other had better technic. . . . In sincerity, in fervor, in devotion to his art, he was the peer of any opera singer in history."

The Berkshire Festival concludes its Series A today and begins its Series B on Thursday. For today, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony have Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist in the Hindemith Cello Concerto, and play orchestral works by Brahms, Aaron Copland, and Rimsky-Korsakov. On Thursday, excerpts from the Mozart "Requiem" feature the Festival Chorus, and the other offering on the program is Beethoven's Third ("Eroica") Symphony. Saturday's program again includes a modern American composition, Roy Harris' Second ("Romantic") Symphony, together with music by Mozart and Wagner, and the Brahms Second Piano Concerto with Leonard Shure as soloist. Series B ends next Sunday with an all-orchestral program of Mozart, Debussy and Berlioz.

The Chicago, Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic schedules for the week can not be given in such exact detail, but here is the available information: Georg Szell concludes his Ravinia park engagement with the Chicago Symphony today, Pierre Monteux taking over on Tuesday to stay through next Sunday, his presentations including all-Wagner concerts with Helen Traubel as soloist on Saturday and Sunday. The Philadelphia Orchestra's Robin Hood Dell offering on Tuesday features Baritone John Charles Thomas and Saul Caston conducts on Thursday. The Philharmonic has among its Lewisohn stadium concerts for the week an all-Bach program on Tuesday, Hans Wilhelm Steinberg conducting the A Minor Concerto for Four Pianos with Harold Bauer, Charles Naegele, Beveridge Webster and Mosche Paranov at the keyboards, and the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto with Bauer, Violinist John Corigliano and Flutist Georges Barrere featured; then an all-Wagner program under Hermann Adler on Wednesday, with Helen Traubel.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 3 - 1941

Mozart Music Will Be Heard In Berkshires

Koussevitzky to Conduct Third Festival Event Today at Tanglewood

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra today at 3:30 at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., in the third concert of Series A of the eighth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival. The program includes Brahms's fourth symphony; Aaron Copland's "Quiet City" with Georges Mager, trumpet and Louis Speyer, English horn, as soloists; Hindemith's cello concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnol."

The concerts of Series B will be held next Thursday and Saturday nights at 8:30 and next Sunday afternoon, Aug. 10, at 3:30. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the following programs:

Thursday

Requiem, Dies Irae, Rex Tremendae, Confutatis, Lacrimosa, Domine Jesu, from Requiem.................Mozart
Berkshire Musical Association Chorus, Horace Hunt, director Symphony No. 3, in E flat (Eroica)
Beethoven

Saturday

Eine kleine Nachtmusik..........Mozart
Symphony No. 2 (Romantic)..........Hanson
Piano Concerto No. 2, in B flat major Brahms
Leonard Shure
Preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Meistersinger"..........Wagner

Next Sunday

Symphony in A major (K. 201)....Mozart
La Mer..........Debussy
Fantastic Symphony..........Berlioz

The Mozart works on this program are presented in commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of the composers death (Dec. 5, 1791).

Next Week's Schedule

Series C begins Thursday night, Aug. 14, when the Berkshire Festival Chorus, trained this summer at the Berkshire Music Center, will take part in Beethoven's "Missa Dolemnis" in D. This will be preceded by Handel's tenth organ concerto, in D Minor, with E. Power Biggs as soloist. On Saturday night, Aug. 16, Ruth Posselt will be the soloist in Samuel Barber's violin concerto. Dr. Koussevitzky will also conduct Vaughan Williams's "London" symphony and excerpts from Wagner's "Parsifal" and Tannhauser." The closing program on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 17, consists of Sibelius's seventh symphony, Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije" suite and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony.

The benefit program at Tanglewood on Friday, Aug. 15, for the United Service Organizations and British War Relief, Inc., will begin at 5:30 and last until late in the evening. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct a band of 250 musicians chosen from the bands of the 26th Division at Camp Edwards. Various activities of the Berkshire Music Center will then be illustrated. A "Manifestation," with noted speakers taking part, will begin with the singing of Randal Thompson's "Alleluia" by the festival chorus. The closing event of the benefit will be a concert by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky, with Albert Spalding as soloist in Mendelssohn's violin concerto. The program also includes the first movement of Beethoven fifth symphony and Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture.

The Berkshire Music Center's opera department, directed by Dr. Herbert Graf, will give two performances of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," in English, in its new theater on the Tanglewood estate on Tuesday and Wednesday nights, Aug. 12 and 13, with two student casts. Boris Goldovsky will conduct. The scenery and costumes are designed by Richard Rychtarik and executed by the department's stagecraft students.

Information about tickets may be obtained from the office of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in Stockbridge, Mass., or its New York office at 113 West Fifty-seventh Street. Inquiries about lodgings may be directed to the Festival Accommodations Bureau of the Berkshire Hills Conference at the Stockbridge office.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

AUG 3 - 1941

MUSIC SEASON AT STOCKBRIDGE PROMISES WELL

No immediate circumstance could be asked to make the opening of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Thursday a more fortunate occasion. The threats of rain passed away, the sharp breeze gave pith and moment to the sound of strings and brass in the open air, and the usual brilliant audience gave willing ear to the familiar works of the opening program. The Boston Symphony members appeared refreshed and eager, and Dr. Koussevitsky discovered new graces and new meanings in the works selected for performance. Another season is begun, already assured of the largest audiences yet to visit "Tanglewood," and full of promise for artistic accomplishments of a high order.

The spacious estate high in the Berkshire Hills has been improved each year, and a visit to these concerts carries with it the opportunity to trespass on the entire range of the far-flung musical community. Two new buildings have been added to accommodate student activities. A concert hall and opera stage are constructed near the formal gardens, the former for small recitals and chamber music, the latter being presently made ready for a performance of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte." Both buildings are plainly designed with complete equipment and every comfort needed for the school; glass doors are provided in one hall which, by sliding back, extend the range of hearing to persons seated outside. Tucked away in out-of-the-way corners are three private studios for practice, doubtless a very welcome refuge for performers of all types.

"Tanglewood" now comprises one of the handsomest estates to be seen in the Berkshires; the formal gardens are kept in fine condition, the broad lawns are richly-hued after the early-week rains, and the whole atmosphere of the festival is one of dignity and charm and above that of any other summer musical community in the world. Confidence in the Boston Symphony and all it stands for in the world today in inevitably strengthened.

Dr. Koussevitsky drew upon works from the past season's repertory for the opening concert; they were, furthermore, works known to every concert-goer, and had with one exception figured on the New Haven programs of this orchestra. To begin, the orchestra sounded the invigorating freshness of Haydn's "Paris" Symphony No. 88, followed by Two Nocturnes by Claude Debussy, and the "Afternoon of a Faun." In closing, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was unfolded to its mighty, victorious climax. Not alone as a gesture, but as distinct novelty, the pre-intermission work was the Choros No. 10 by the distinguished Brazilian composer, Heitor Villa-Lobos. In this work the Berkshire Musical Association chorus assisted. This prolific composer has frankly attempted something new in this unusual work; his poem, only remotely adhered to, is calm enough in statement, but striking instrumental and vocal effects are sought, Indian words are sung over a Portugese text, and the rhythms fall into several classifications embodied in the works of utmost-modern composers, together with liberal doses of jazz and swing. Harmonically, I doubt that it is very complex, but it is designed for effect, and as such, achieves without any question that sense of excitement achieved by "The Rio Grande" and "Bolero."

The audience, numbering 9,000 persons, took Sr. Villa-Lobos Choros No. 10 in good part, but unmistakably found its greatest satisfaction in the familiar works. At the Berkshire Festival there is always a friendly spirit, punctuated by the surprise of meeting visitors from remote parts; celebrities are always on hand, from governors to movie stars, with a high percentage of noted musicians numbered among the throng.

H. EARLE JOHNSON.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

AUG 3 - 1941

Berkshire as a Music Center

Summer music centers are multiplying, as might be expected from the steady growth of interest in music and from the great number of distinguished musicians, native and foreign, now resident in the United States, but Berkshire, made a musical Mecca by the festivals of chamber music long maintained at Pittsfield by Mrs Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, has a long lead.

That would be assured by its symphonic festivals, the eighth of which concludes its first series this afternoon with a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, assisted by the famous Russian 'cellist Gregor Piatigorsky, who will play from manuscript a new concerto by Paul Hindemith. But the festival has come to be but a part of varied activities which make the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood much more truly a music center. This concerto, for example, is inscribed "Lenox, 'Mass.," and was written last summer while its distinguished composer was a teacher of composition at Tanglewood.

There was a time when ambitious young American musicians felt it obligatory to spend their summers in study in Europe, and American conductors and managers went abroad to meet the rising musicians in Europe, to find new scores and to engage new singers and virtuosi for the next concert season. At present, however, most of the best known composers and other musicians of Europe are either in the United States or doing their best to escape from where they are, and America is becoming the home of music in a sense hardly imaginable a few decades ago.

In this trend Berkshire's music center has taken an important part, and to the leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, is due primary credit for seeing the great possibilities arising from the summer season at Tanglewood and the musical blackout of Europe by the war. Singing by a large chorus has broadened the scope of the festivals, operatic study has been added, the virtuosi of the orchestra give instruction on their instruments, composers have a chance to learn the elements of the subtler nuances of orchestration, and musicians and music lovers come into stimulating contact with each other and with eminent masters. For people interested in music a summer in Berkshire is something to look forward to with eager anticipation.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

AUG 3 - 1941

SHOSTAKOVICH 5TH PLAYED AT LENOX

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Orchestra at Tanglewood in Symphony by Russian

'LEONORE' NO. 3 OFFERED

Beethoven Overture Opens the Program and Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Work Is Heard

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 2—Serge Koussevitzky waited only until the second concert of the eighth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival here tonight before reaffirming his espousal of the cause of Shostakovich's Fifth symphony. The work of the Soviet Union's most gifted living composer had a place of honor on tonight's program at Tanglewood.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the orchestra have given the music a series of stunning performances during the last year, and they have programmed the symphony at every opportunity. Twice they played it in Boston; twice in New York; several times on tour.

To begin tonight's program, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra offered Mendelssohn's Symphony in A major, No. 4, known as the "Italian," which has a gracious, lilting loveliness. It was followed by Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, and the second half was given over to the Shostakovich symphony.

By this juxtaposition, Mr. Koussevitzky was taking a neat sideswipe at Nazi "philosophy" in so far as a conductor can do so by program construction. Mendelssohn's music is barred in Nazi Germany. Beethoven's overture speaks with passion and fire in the cause of man's fight to free himself from oppression. And Shostakovich is a representative of the latest nation to feel the impact of the Nazi invader; the symphony, in fact, was written in 1937 to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of the Soviet revolution.

Today there was the usual Saturday morning rehearsal for subscribers and school children of the vicinity. Even for a rehearsal there was a record-breaking audience, with 4,000 men, women and children in the music shed. Early in the rehearsal Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Festival Association, announced that Mr. Koussevitzky would lead the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" in memory of Norval H. Busey Jr., vice president of the festival, who was killed in an automobile accident early this week. The audience stood several moments in silence before Mr. Koussevitzky played the tribute.

During the rehearsal Olin Downes spoke about the week-end's programs, and later in the afternoon he lectured in the new chamber music hall during an informal program of ancient choral and instrumental music, played by students here and prepared by Paul Hindemith.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

AUG 4 - 1941

RECORD AUDIENCE HEARS SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra Attract 26,400 at Stockbridge.

Stockbridge, Mass., Aug. 3.—(AP)—Before the largest crowd to hear a concert at Tanglewood, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought to a close today the first week-end series of the eighth Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

A few more than 9700 persons heard the curiously varied program in the unique wedge-shaped music shed—setting an attendance record for the three-concert series which attracted a total of 26,400.

A few seats are still available for the next section opening on Thursday. However, everything but general admission tickets are gone for next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

A number of things account for the phenomenon of such attendance here in the Berkshires, with no large city near, and no circus stunts provided to whip up a ballyhoo, and first of these is Dr. Koussevitzky.

It is not only his conducting, and his orchestra, but his absolute refusals to play more than three concerts a week.

A second reason is the natural beauty of the 210 acres which overlook the famous Stockbridge Bowl. A third is the fact that the acoustics of the "shed" approach perfection.

Today Dr. Koussevitzky played first the Fourth Symphony of Johannes Brahms, revising the usual order of things by serving the meat before the appetizers.

Then came Aaron Copland's nocturne-like "Quiet City" for a trumpet, English horn and strings; Hindemith's 'cello concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, and the flashy Spanish caprice of Rimsky-Korsakoff, a virtuoso piece for orchestra which, as played today, brought the audience up cheering.

The Hindemith work served better to prove the abilities of Mr. Piatigorsky than those of Hindemith, the concerto being one of those woman-like jobs which leads the listener to wonder, at the end, just what has been constructed, if anything.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GREENFIELD, MASS.
RECORDER-GAZETTE

AUG 4 - 1941

This Clipping From WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS

Aug 4. 1941

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

AUG 4 - 1941

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

AUG 4 - 1941

This Clipping From BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

AUG 4 - 1941

This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE

AUG 4 - 1941

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

AUG 4 - 1941

This Clipping From
WINSTON SALEM, N. C.
JOURNAL

AUG 4 - 1941

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

AUG 4 - 1941

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

AUG 3 - 1941

IT'S FESTIVAL TIME IN THE BERSKHIRES

All Facilities Taxed, for Three Weekends — Festival Sole Conversation Topic

From Our Special Correspondent

Great Barrington, Aug. 2—It's the festival season here in the Berkshires from now through the next two weeks. You can't do a thing, go a single place, but what you see festival signs, festival people and hear festival talk. You just can't be in the Berkshires and not be festival-conscious.

The festival is, of course, the annual series of concerts produced by the Boston Symphonic festival, to which they always add, "with Serge Koussevitzky conducting." Without Maestro Koussevitzky the festival could hardly be what it is, any more than the Boston Symphony would just be another orchestra without him.

The hotel men of Berkshire can't quite make up their minds about this festival business. It fills their houses over the three concert weekends till the sides are bulging. Filled houses mean profits. But, on the other hand, with the hotels sold out for three weekends, and with not so many people during the week partaking of the hotel board and room, the facilities are held up during a critical period of the summer season. It's not all milk and honey, particularly when those rooms could have been filled for the entire summer season if the early reservations for the concert weekends had not been made.

This, however, is the hotelmen's own problem. There are many other aspects to the festival business that are on the right side of the ledger. There are the reams of newspaper clippings, all of which go to publicize the resort county. There are music-lovers from all over the world who come, find the Berkshires a pleasant spot to spend the summer, and make their temporary homes here. As residents, they spend money with the butcher, the baker, and the electric light company. Granting that these people are of the despirable type, the festival must be thanked for introducing the Berkshires to them.

It's a hectic time, when the festival is holding sway in Nathaniel Hawthorne's old house and grounds. Of course, the minute that the final concert is over, Tanglewood has the aspect of a fairground after the carnival has moved away, but all good things must naturally come to an end.

It may eventually be that the festival will extend its series of concerts to a longer period. Then people will come from all parts of the western, or civilized section, of the world to spend longer holidays in the Berkshires, to inhale Beethoven and Brahms in deeper breaths. Then the traffic cops will have a longer headache; the hotels will have no cause to complain, and the season rentals on real estate will be for a longer period.

No matter how you look at it, the festival, which started as Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith's idyllic dream in a cow-pasture has become Big Business. In the few years since its inception, when the New York Philharmonic, or at least a part of the orchestra, played in the pasture on the Dan Hanna property on the shores of Stockbridge bowl, the series have become big enough to draw the most caustic critics, the whipped cream of music connoisseures, and even President Roosevelt's mother. Like it or not, you've got to admit that Miss Robinson Smith hit the jackpot of culture.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG 4 - 1941

Berkshire Concert Draws Record Throng of 9700

Two New Compositions, by Copland and Hindemith, Delight Audience at Stockbridge

By Willard M. Clark

STOCKBRIDGE, Aug. 3—Two compositions new to the programs of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the presence of the composers of the same gave added interest to the final concert of the first series this afternoon. Perfect weather helped establish another record crowd estimated at 9700 persons, or more than attended the Saturday night concert.

New Works on Program

The new works which Dr. Koussevitzky included on the program today were Aaron Copland's "Quiet City" for trumpet, English horn and string orchestra, and Paul Hindemith's concerto for cello and orchestra, in which Gregor Piatigorsky was soloist. The two familiar works on the program were "Symphony No. 4 in E Minor" by Brahms, and "Capriccio Espagnol," by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Copland first wrote the score of "Quiet City" as incidental music to Irwin Shaw's play of that name. It was first played in 1939 but the play did not continue long. Last year he used some of the same material from the score for the present orchestration. He borrowed the trumpet and some themes from the original score and added the English horn and string orchestra.

Copland's music is always provocative. Tonight it contained considerable more of melodic beauty than, for example, his "Music for the Theater." The burden of the melody was carried by the trumpet, supplemented by the English horn, with the strings serving as background.

The solo instruments were magnificently played by Georges Mager, trumpet, and Louis Speyer, English horn. It was evident that the performance achieved the intentions of the composer. Breaking tradition, Mr. Copland did not rush on stage to acknowledge applause. Indeed, it was quite three minutes before he bounded down the center aisle and scrambled upon the stage to share the applause with Dr. Koussevitzky and his men.

Mr. Hindemith who, like Mr. Copland, is on the Berkshire music school faculty, completed his cello concerto in Lenox last year. Fortunate, indeed, is the composer who has a conductor like Dr. Koussevitzky, an orchestra like the Boston players and a Piatigorsky to interpret his works. It would be folly to judge this concerto on one hearing, yet it seemed that a notable contribution had been added to the literature for cello and orchestra. That Mr. Hindemith can write sweet melodies if he desires was evidenced in two charming themes for the cello. It is a work of great technical difficulty but then, neither Mr. Piatigorsky, nor the members of the orchestra, ever consider such things. The cello is heard continuously throughout the three movements, sometimes in a lengthy cadenza, sometimes as an obligato to an orchestral theme and yet again as an integral part of the almost fantastic march which makes up a goodly portion of the work.

Mr. Hindemith was backstage, already to come out and receive the applause.

Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of Brahm's Fourth Symphony is an oft-repeated tale, yet this afternoon it seemed as though he lavished even more than usual care upon it. The opening movement seemed never to have moved so gracefully and the variations of the finale were superbly unfolded.

The program concluded with a glittering performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnol." Here is a type of music in which the virtuosity of the Boston orchestra is best revealed. Each solo cadenza was sheer perfection and the rhythmic pulsations of each dance were equaled only by the brilliance of the coloration lavished on them.

There was a long and ardent demonstration at the close of this, the final concert of series A.

The opening concert of series B on Thursday night will begin a series of three programs commemorating the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart. Excerpts of Mozart's "Requiem" will be heard as sung by the Berkshire choral group and Beethoven's "Eroica" will be the orchestral work.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

AUG 4 - 1941

TANGLEWOOD HAS RECORD AUDIENCE

Copland's 'Quiet City' and Hindemith Work Given.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Special to THE NEW YORK SUN.

Stockbridge, Aug. 4.—A shortage of sandwiches at the refreshment stands gave the first clear indication that yesterday was to set a new record for attendance at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, held in the sylvan surroundings of Tanglewood.

With subscribers ordinarily filling the music shed as a matter of course, it is the size of the overflow audience on the grass outside that structure which determines whether and to what extent one audience tops another. And it is the listener who expects to sit or recline on the grass who comes early and most often feels the need of a snack before the concert begins.

The shed seats 6,000 and it was estimated that about 3,200 others heard yesterday afternoon's concert. The grand total of 9,200 was declared the largest in the eight years of the festival, though it went only about 200 beyond the figure for Saturday night's concert, when an audience of 9,000 was said to have equaled the record of the past. Since the Thursday evening crowd of above 7,000 was also a record for an opening night at Tanglewood, there was every reason for the festival management to regard the first series of this summer's three sets of concerts as the most successful Tanglewood has known to date.

Artistically, the concerts have been on the high plane expected of the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky. Yesterday afternoon's program might have been regarded as even a little venturesome in the confidence which the conductor reposed in his summer auditors, for it included two unfamiliar works by composers representative of the current musical idioms. Both Paul Hindemith and Aaron Copland were present to bow. Both are connected with the music school at Tanglewood and both did at least a part of their composing of the music performed while in the vicinity of the festival scene last summer.

Hindemith's work was the cello concerto heard for the first time in New York last season, with the same soloist, Gregor Piatigorsky. Copland's was "Quiet City," for trumpet, English horn and string orchestra, which had its introduction in Manhattan last winter at the hands of the Saidenberg Sinfonietta. Messrs. Piatigorsky and Koussevitsky again collaborated in a brilliant projection of the Hindemith opus, but it remains relatively ungrateful for the solo instrument, and its melodies are reluctant to soar. The orchestra has its moments and the most was made of them.

Copland's 'Quiet City.'

Mr. Copland's score, expanded from incidental music designed for a play by Irwin Shaw, retains a scenic savor. Its atmosphere is still that of the theater. The work is smoothly articulated and the writing for the trumpet, which plays a dominant part in its progress, is apt and idiomatic. But this is not a work in which to seek for profundities of thought or feeling, or, for that matter, for innovations of technic.

Yesterday's program included also the Brahms Fourth Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnol," brilliantly and fervidly played. On Saturday night the audience was regaled with highly vitalized performances of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture and the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony. The last-named was played with a virtuosity that was fairly electrifying, though some of us must continue to regard the work as a most ingenious tissue of banalities.

This Clipping From
HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN-RECORD

AUG 4 - 1941

Music News And Views

By ROGER S. VREELAND

Tanglewood, Mass., Aug. 4—The first series of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival came to a close last evening with the largest attendance on record, 9,700 persons. Music lovers took advantage of an exceptionally fair afternoon to spread blankets on the grass and enjoy the music informally—a Berkshire Festival custom of growing popularity.

This pleasure is made possible by the remarkable sound-carrying qualities of the shed and environs. The softest strains from the orchestra carry with clarity hundreds of feet beyond the shed.

Saturday night was also a near record for attendance, with the figure given officially as 9,200, which was equal to the maximum of last year, so that all in all it was a banner series. There were 2,450 general admissions, the largest number in this classification in the history of the Festival.

A greatly increased number of New Jersey patrons was noted by the management.

Music heard from the Boston Symphony Orchestra this ~~week-end~~ was: Saturday night — the Italian Symphony of Mendelssohn, Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3, and Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony. Yesterday afternoon — Brahm's Fourth Symphony, Aaron Copland's "Quiet Night", Hindemith's Cello Concerto, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, and Capriccio Espagnol, Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Of all this music, the Shostakovitch and Brahms symphonies were unhesitatingly brilliant performances. They're a strange combination. The romantic, conservative Brahms of yesterday, and the contemporary upstart Shostakovitch, who is also romantic, and who is growing more conservative than he used to be. The old German and the new Russian.

If you believe there are prophets in music, the Festival is one place to seek them. It makes little difference what you think of Dr. Koussevitzky's expressive ideas. It makes little difference what music he seeks to please with. His insistence on contemporary music is entirely right. The virtue of his perspective will be determined in the future.

It is important, though, to listen to true, sincere prophets, whether they are creators or performers. There can be little doubt in the mind of the Berkshire Festival audiences that Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra is, collectively, a true prophet, and that the music (or most of it) is of true prophets.

The Brahms' symphony was given a well-rounded performance. Contrasts of mood between sections of movements and between the movements themselves gave the continuity and consummation that all artists seek. Copland's "Quiet City", for trumpet, English horn, and strings, is a poetic piece of program music, which creates atmosphere, and urges the listener to read the program notes. The rapid notes of trumpet calls are not suitable for good perforance. There are pleasing intervals in the melodic lines, occasions for pleasing intonations, but it is thematically weak.

Gregor Piatigorsky gave a beautiful performance of a homely composition in Paul Hindemith's Concerto. It's not much of a show piece for the soloist, however. The virtuoso's capacity for finding beauty where it's scarce helped a lot. Mr. Hindemith is a highly respected composer. To this writer his music is very nice in spots, but on the whole indigestible. The program was concluded with a colorful performance of the popular Spanish Caprice. While the music is naturally colorful, the performance was discriminating.

Shostkakovitch's Fifth Symphony is undoubtedly a great piece of music. The stamp of endurance is impressed all through it. It is difficult to imagine a more fulfilling performance than that given by the Boston orchestra.

The composer gives unquestionable evidence of having dug deep into the common soil, of having sought with all his soul the source from which other prophets have taken. What he found to write was not beautiful when he finally gripped it. But he had to tell it, nevertheless, and in the language in which he was most fluent—his own style of composition. It was a greater power that infused it with beauty.

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

AUG 4 - 1941

Tanglewood Affair Set For August 15th

Mrs. William G. Dwight is one of the sponsors for the gala festival to be put on at Tanglewood in Stockbridge on August 15 for the benefit the of British War Relief and USO.

It is going to be quite tremendous affair. Musically it will be austere.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has been quick to seize upon the V for Victory motif and will include in the program the first movement of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the opening notes of which symbolize the three dots and a dash of the Morse code letter V. To give further color he will also conduct Tschaikovsky's 1812 overture, which was composed to dramatize and commemorate the famous Russian victory over Napoleon in 1812. Still another martial note will be struck by the 250 players chosen from the 26th division of the United States Army bands, who will be bivouacked in tents beside the lake for the occasion. Of additional interest is the fact that Albert Spalding is announced as the soloist in Mendelssohn's violin concerto.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

AUG 4 - 1941

Symphony Group in Lustrous Program

Berkshire Festival's Largest Crowd Responds with Hysterical Approval

By ROBERT BAGAR.

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., Aug. 4—There is always a letdown. Perfection rides along like the wind—and then a sag in the middle. Yesterday afternoon, before the greatest throng ever to come to a concert at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival—9700—it took the orchestra two whole movements of the Brahms Fourth Symphony before something like the organization's fine playing came through.

The first section of the piece went altogether wan for lack of blood. Mr. Koussevitzky has shown before that ~~he is not al~~ways completely attuned to this work. Then the second section trudged along with the ease and finesse of a brewery truck.

* * *

Moments of Splendor.

Not that there hadn't been moments of splendor in all this, for occasionally the musicians, banded together by some sudden common urge, gave for all they were worth, music be praised! The Third and Fourth movements of the symphony required no apology. Here everything proceeded according to plan, though a touch of listlessness entered into the picture toward the end.

The concert offered a soloist—a special soloist, that is, for there were two others in less prominent roles. The special soloist was Gregor Piatigorsky, noted 'cellist, who joined forces with the orchestra to perform Hindemith concerto for 'cello and orchestra.

Mr. Piatigorsky played well, for the most part. He seemed to get weak, tonally speaking, in the last few measures. Otherwise he earned the ovation he received. But that Hindemith concerto is a concentrated hornet's nest.

* * *

Plans Are Magnificent.

Mr. Hindemith knows his architecture. He draws magnificent plans. But the actual structure doesn't match the ideas. He plays with notes, putting them through all the calisthenics of harmony and dissonance in the book. If that's music you're welcome to it.

A first performance by large orchestra of Aaron Copland's The Quiet City scarcely added to the afternoon festivities.

The composer had originally written a musical score for the play of Irwin Shaw, which carried the same title. Since then he has amplified the piece and to little purpose.

Obviously the idea is to invoke a reflective mood, but how that can happen with a trumpet (Georges Magor) going berserk against subdued chords and figures in the rest of the orchestra is hard to conceive. Here are also solo passages for the English horn (Louis Speyer) which are only slightly less annoying.

* * *

Applause Aplenty.

Anyway, the audience fairly swamped the number with applause and the composer skipped up to the stage for his accolade. Concluding yesterday's program was the Rimsky-Korsakoff Capriccio Espagnol.

Saturday evening's doings were another story. An attractive list of items offered the Mendelssohn "Italian" Symphony, the Beethoven Leonore Overture No. 3 and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovich.

The beauty and super luster of the orchestra's playing were unforgettable. For an outstanding example of what the Bostonians can really do one suggests the Saltarello of the Mendelssohn, it leaped and flew with supreme agility of spiritual fawns.

Shostakovich's creation, despite its obvious debts to a whole galaxy of composers, is lusty, vigorous, red-blooded and disturbingly exciting. And what a performance Mr. Koussevitzky and his men gave it! That should have been saved for the topper of toppers. The Saturday night crowd of 9200 thrilled to it. The listeners weren't enthusiastic, they were hysterical. And why not?

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 4 - 1941

Record Is Set By Berkshire Festival Crowd

9,700 Hear Concert Which Includes Compositions of Hindemith and Copland

By Francis D. Perkins

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 3.—Irreproachable weather and the tying and breaking of attendance records marked the second and third of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival concerts presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under ~~Serge Kous~~sevitzky's direction last night and this afternoon in the Tanglewood music shed.

Yesterday's program offered Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, Beethoven's third Leonore Overture and Dmitri Shostakovitch's fifth symphony. Today's list began with Brahms's fourth symphony and closed with Rimsky Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice. Its modern portion was devoted to what might be called music by Tanglewood composers, since both Aaron Copland and Paul Hindemith are teaching at the Berkshire Music Center this summer. Georges Mager played the solo trumpet and Louis Speyer the English horn in Mr. Copland's Quiet City and Gregor Piatigorsky was the soloist in Mr. Hindemith's cello concerto.

Last night's attendance was estimated at 9,200, a record equaled only by that of the second Saturday night concert last summer. Most of those who had bought 2,450 general admission tickets chose to listen to the music while sitting or reclining on the lawn. Since the orchestra can be clearly heard at a considerable distance from the music shed, it should be possible to accommodate a five-figure audience within convenient hearing range when the weather is good.

Refreshment Supplies Exhausted

The crowd disposed of all the sandwiches at hand some time before the concert started, and the women in charge of the refreshment booths had a busy time making others for the refreshment of later arrivals. A look at the line before the box office at 3 this afternoon suggested that today's audience would be larger still, and the announced figure was 9,700, the highest thus far in the festival's history. The territory occupied by those listening from without extended nearly to the flagpole in the center of the lawn.

Both the Copland and the Hindemith works were composed near Tanglewood last summer. Mr. Copland has taken the title and some of the themes of his Quiet City from his incidental music composed in 1939 from a play by Irwin Shaw. This has a trumpter as its protagonist, and a lyrically meditative trumpet is constantly in the foreground in the music heard today. The combination and contrast of the trumpet with the English horn and the strings are skillfully and effectively wrought, and the music has lyric breadth and sensitiveness. This was its first performance by a major orchestra, but it was played in New York last winter by the Saidenberg Sinfonietta. Mr. Mager played laudably as the principal soloist.

Introduced Concerto in New York

Mr. Hindemith's concerto was introduced to New York by Mr. Piatigorsky and the Boston Symphony last winter. It is ingenious, often elaborate and often makes a more positive impression of energy and animation and, in the first and last parts of the second movement, appealing and sustained lyricism. These are not the only occasions when the composer waxes tuneful, but more often he hesitates to present his most melodic measures unveiled. The solo, which is sometimes interwoven with the orchestral fabric, gives its interpreter plenty to do, and at times he has a grateful task. As a rule, however, the solo cello is called upon to play in its middle and high registers, and thus one of its most effective and characteristic ranges is seldom represented, so that the result often seemed pale and not particularly effective, despite Mr. Piatigorsky's consistently admirable playing. There is considerably more color and vitality in the orchestral part of the score. Both composers were called to the stage and enthusiastically applauded. Encomiums could be bestowed both upon Dr. Koussevitsky's reading of the Brahms symphony and on the quality of its performance. The Rimsky Korsakoff Caprice gave the concert a brilliant close.

Admires Shostakovitch Work

Although Dr. Koussevitsky was not the first to introduce the Shostakovitch symphony to America, he has done much toward making it known here and holds it in high regard. This was the suggestion of the expressive conviction and intensity of Saturday's interpretation and of the vivid projection of the work's various moods. The symphony stands the test of rehearing well. It has considerable inventiveness in its musical ideas along with a communicative and convincing emotional expression. Some ideas indeed are more memorable than others and the often appealing slow movement could stand some condensation, but yet this is one of the best works which have come to us from post-revolutionary Russia.

The Mendelssohn symphony had an enlivening performance, and the distant trumpet in the Leonore overture had a peculiar impressiveness, despite an unusual echo or two. Here the conductor was on excellent terms with Beethoven.

The second series of the festival opens next Thursday night. In spite of the increasing size of the audiences, the traffic arrangements have been marked by praiseworthy smoothness.

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

AUG 4 - 1941

The Great Berkshire Festival

They are scoring the Berkshire Music Festival in more ways than one. First there is the superlative quality of the music. It is agreed that perhaps never in the world has music been presented under such ideal surroundings. There is beauty everywhere. Perhaps the greatest conductor in the world today has kept his men of his superb orchestra in constant but happy practice under the most ideal condition for weeks.

Now the concerts are being given — three series, the first one closing yesterday afternoon with the largest attendance ever gathered for this music festival. One doesn't just happen in at Tanglewood. One must make a journey thither.

Thousands of people have made long journeys even from the ends of the country. For there has been set up in our beautiful Berkshire country something which we think will go on to be one of the great music festivals of the world. America has made great contributions to music. It has shown itself eager to sit under the great interpreters and find, if they can, the power that comes from great music.

At Tanglewood, Serge Koussevitsky and his men are teaching their great audiences that a nation's soul can speak in its music.

For example, on Saturday night, they played the Fifth Symphony of a new Russian composer name Shoshtakovich. Into it are written the passion and glory of the Slavic people and the dreams they have built out of their new order of life —their sense of freedom and their search for the brotherhood of man and the union of the world.

Next week they will be playing again the glorious things that Beethoven wrote into his Fifth Symphony, his call for what freedom means.

It is happy that the people who go to hear the music take it as part of their lives. Thousands of them sit on the hillside and feel the music as something unconfined, something reaching out. Those under cover have the extreme simplicity of a music shed that is a triumph of acoustics.

The music festival at Tanglewood was planned before the world went into a mad war. It was actually set going when we here in the United States were at a low ebb in an economic way and music could be an uplifting power. It has its chance for growth at a time when the other great music centers of the world are listening to bombs and warning sirens.

It is an expression of our developing maturity as a people.

Like the work on South Mountain just over the hill, which is the gift of Mrs. Coolidge to American music the great festival at Tanglewood was undertaken by a few women who had the leisure and the grace to understand that our glorious Berkshires make a right setting for a great national adventure in music. So it is working out.

This Clipping From
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 4 - 1941

Berkshire Music Festival Attendance Totals 26,400

Records Broken Over Week-End as 18,900 Persons Enjoy Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky Directing, at Tanglewood—4,000 Students Attend Rehearsal—Tribute Paid Late Vice President of Festival, Recently Killed in Auto Accident—Series B Will Open Thursday Night —Mozart to be Featured.

Attendance records of the Berkshire symphonic festival were broken as audiences numbering 18,900 persons, according to official announcements, heard the two week-end concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in the picturesque Tanglewood setting.

In addition, 4,000 persons, including Berkshire county school pupils who took the Festival-sponsored laymen's music course last year, gathered in the vast music shed Saturday morning for the rehearsal of the program presented Saturday night.

Moment's Silence

The audience at the rehearsal jonied the orchestra in tribute to Norval H. Busey, Jr., of Lee, vice-president of the Festival, who was killed in an automobile accident last week. Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Festival president, announced that Dr. Koussevitzky would lead the orchestra in the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony in memory of Mr. Busey. Before the music was played the audience stood for a few seconds in silence.

The festival management announced after yesterday's concert that 9,700 persons, the largest number in the festival's history, had thronged the shed and the grounds.

Attracted by the fine weather, about 2,900 persons bought general admission tickets and enjoyed the cnocert from the lawns surrounding the shed.

As he usually does for the Sunday afternoon concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday selected a program of variety and contrast. Opening with the classic strains of Brahms' Fourth symphony, he shifted, following the intermission, to music by two of the leading contemporary composers, Aaron Copland and Paul Hindemith, both of whom are members of the Berkshire Music center faculty. They were present to receive the applause of the audience.

Following a superb rendition of the more or less familiar music of Brahms, the novel character of the two modern works was greatly accentuated. Both these compositions were completed last summer at Tanglewood, and, although they have been played by the Boston orchestra in Boston, they were heard for the first time last night by the majority of the Tanglewood audience.

Mr. Copland's composition, "Quiet City," was written for trumpet, English horn and strings. The solo parts were masterfully played by Georges Mager and Louis Speyer, who were congratulated by the composer when he was called to the stage to acknowledge the plaudits of the audience. Most of the listeners made it plain they were intrigued by the novel conception of Mr. Copland's tone poem.

Mr. Hindemith's composition, a Concerto for violincello and orchestra, had the advantage of a rendition by Gregor Piatigorsky, acknowledged to be one of the finest of present-day 'cellists, supported by one of the world's finest orchestras. The composition gave the solist ample opportunity to display his virtuosity.

The Saturday night program opened with two of the most popular of classic compositions, Mendelsshon's "Italian" symphony and Beethoven's third overture to "Leonore." Then, by way of contrast, Dr. Koussevitzky offered the Fifth symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch, a leading modern Russian composer.

Anniversary Piece

This work was composed for the celebration of the 20th anniversary of Soviet Russia, and was first heard in America during a National Broadcasting company concert in April, 1938.

According to the Festival management attendance at the three concerts of the first series totaled 26,400, a record. If the weather continues favorable, it is anticipated that equally large numbers will attend the second and third series. Series B, opening Thursday night will feature three compositions of Mozart, in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the composer's death. At the opening concert, the Chorus of the Berkshire Musical association will join the orchestra in excerpts from Mozart's Requiem. Following the intermission the orchestra will play Beethoven's Third symphony, the "Eroica".

Festival Guests Tax Hotels; Overflow Is Cared For Here

With down-county rooming houses and hotels filled to capacity by visitors attending the Berkshire Symphonic Festival concerts at Tanglewood, about 300 persons were taken care of by hotels in this city and Williamstown over the week-end.

The Richmond and Wellington hotels in this city accommodated about 50 persons Friday night and about 100 Saturday night, while the Williams Inn also took care of about 150 persons on the two nights. The accommodations in the southern part of the county near the Festival grounds were reserved well in advance of the opening date—last Thursday. Later, applications for rooms were referred by the Berkshire Hills Conference to hotels in this part of the county. A large number of Festival guests were reported to have taken rooms in Springfield after finding every available room in Southern Berkshire filled.

Restaurants, taverns, and garages throughout the county were reported to have enjoyed their most prosperous week-end so far this year rivaling even the peak week-end of last year. The Hotel Wendell in Pittsfield acommodated 500 guests it was said.

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

AUG 4 - 1941

Record Crowd Hears Concert At Tanglewood

Berkshire Music Festival Audiences Total 26,000 to Date

Perfect summer weather and audiences which totaled over 26,000 made a gala event of the opening series of concerts of the eighth annual Berkshire Symphony Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Thousands began pouring into the grounds of Tanglewood yesterday before noon, and when the conductor raised his baton for the Brahms' Fourth, the audience was estimated at 9,700, the largest in the festival history.

More than 7,000 attended the Thursday night concert which opened the season. Saturday night the audience topped 9,000. Traffic arrangements are marked by praiseworthy smoothness, although a word of warning is necessary for the absent-minded. There is no conceivable plan whereby the men in charge of the parking field can locate any individual car. There were some half dozen who were forced to wait until the fields were practically clear Saturday night and to locate their cars by the process of elimination.

Sunday was Family Day. Many groups came, picnicked on the Tanglewood lawns, visited the beautiful formal gardens and sat or reclined on the lawn as the music followed its course. The listeners, according to a survey of the thousands of cars parked on the edge of the estate, came from every state in the Union. The crowd disposed of all the sandwiches at the refreshment stand some time before the concert started, and the women in charge had a busy time preparing for the intermission period.

Every Income Level

The week-end audiences were definitely Tanglewood gatherings, with people of every income level and with every conceivable background in music responding to the Boston Symphony and Serge Kaussevitzky with a uniformly high and open-minded appreciativeness. The series presented such contrasting values as Haydn, Debussy, Villa-Lobas, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Shostakovitch, Brahms, Copland, Hindemith and Rimsky-Korsakov.

There was never any perfunctory applause, whether the music was from the field of the familiar classics, the modern and strangely beautiful Villa-Lobos or Shostakovitch, or the more understandable modernism of Copland and Hindemith, both members of the staff of the Berkshire Music School at Tanglewood, and audience loved it. It would be impossible for an orchestra and its director not to respond with equal warmth. The rousing, vivid performance of the Symphony, the meticulous interpretation of Koussevitzy, superb soloist and a fine choral group made for a memorable week-end.

Series B will open Thursday night with Mozart and Beethoven. The chorus of the Berkshire Musical Association again will be featured in excerpts from the Mozart Requiem.

This Clipping From ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
AUG 4 - 1941

Berkshire Festival Ends Initial Week Gloriously

—By JOSEPH J. HORAN

The first week of the 1941 Berkshire Symphonic Festival has come to a close amid an explosion of superlatives. It has attracted the greatest audiences in its short history; the programs have included the best of the classics and moderns; it has presented Serge Koussevitzky at the peak of his form, leading an aggregation of musicians which certainly ranks among the greatest in history.

The venture, which started in a tent seven summers ago on the lawn at Tanglewood, has shown such a caliber of perfection in the last three days that one wonders how they can hope to surpass themselves during the next two weekends to come.

Even the weather combined to make this outdoor festival one of the finest musical events that the world has witnessed in the last decade. It is certainly established by this time that the Boston Symphonic Orchestra has replaced anything in this nature that the old world ever had to offer.

Although the art of music transcends the racial and the political, it is hard to escape its significance even in the victorian atmosphere of Tanglewood. In the huge music shed, a Russian-American wields a baton, interpreting the music that a German-Jewish composer wrote about classical Italy in the last century; on the same program he conducts the overture that the greatest of the German classicists penned and then finishes with the work of a product of the Soviet Russian regime. And on the lawn, pretty girls sell tickets for British relief and the USO.

Such was the case Saturday night when Dr. Koussevitzky gave the first performance in the Berkshires of Dmitri Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony That the Boston conductor thinks well of this young Soviet's composition was evidenced in the masterly reading he gave of this rousing contemporary work.

So often—among those listeners who have been nurtured on a classical diet—upon hearing the work of a modern for the first time, one is left either "cold" or esthetically offended. But the ovation that this work received Saturday night left little doubt as to the acceptance of Shostakovitch among the Boston listeners.

It is music simple enough to be understood, unusual enough to be modern and dramatic enough to be rousing. In its themes are the prosaic speech of the peasants developing into the marked meters of nature.

The use of the piano and the treble harp in this composition—both inovasions for a symphonic work—literally moved the audience to upright positions in their seats and unashamed neckcraning as the unusual sounds floated out into the shed. The piano, here truly a percussion instrument, was bold and clear; the harp no more frilly than the composer's Soviet Russia.

There may be some who would look askance at a capitalistically supported orchestra like the Boston playing the works of a Communist Russian, but those of us who listened Saturday night could only feel that here was the voice of a new and vigorous artist, demonstrating that beauty can be created in a medium that overcome political ideologies.

Mendelssohn's Fourth Symphony, also known as the "Italian Symphony," could be aptly described as being in "exquisite good taste." The work was based on his travels in Italy, but while he may have been influenced somewhat by his experiences, the musical composition's tonal coloring is from the man himself. Used for Saturday's opening piece, the orchestra gave a refined rendition, befitting the works of this composer.

The themes simple and happy are translations of the impressions of the people of a sunny Italy. Mendelssohn himself in the throes of composition called this "the most sportive piece I have yet composed, especially the last movement." Yet even in his Saltarello (an Italian dance of marked rhythm which grows faster and faster as it progresses) one feels the artist's restraint rather than the peasant's abandon.

Beethoven's "Overture to Leonore" completed Saturday's program. From the interesting dialogue between the strings and the winds of the introduction to the brilliant close of the coda there was no "letdown" in the performance. The striking effect of the offstage trumpet call added to the drama of this work which is better conceived as an independent composition than as a part of the little known opera.

Two men associated with the Berkshire Music Festival heard their own compositions at yesterday afternoon's concert. Aaron Copeland's "Quiet City," originally composed as thematic music for a Broadway play of the same name, was given as was Paul Hindemith's "Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra."

Gregor Piatigorsky, Russian cellist was the soloist for both Hindemith's composition and "Capriccio Espagnol" by Kimsky-Korsakov. Solo parts in Copeland's "Quiet City" were taken by Georges Mager, trumpet and Louis Speyer, English horn.

Brahm's Fourth Symphony completed yesterday's program.

The second series of concerts, marking the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart will begin Thursday night.

This Clipping From HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
AUG 4 - 1941

Tanglewood Crowd Near 10,000 Sunday

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Lenox, Mass — Nearly 10,000 people—9,700 to be exact—heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the third concert of the 1941 season at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon. The official count was 9,200 on Saturday night, and so each succeeding concert has set new records this summer.

The program was hardly a "popular" one. for whereas the pre-intermission business was devoted to Brahms' Fourth Symphony and closed with the demonstrative Capriccio Espagnol of Rimsky-Korsakoff, the featured events of the afternoon were Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," after which the composer was prevailed upon to come to the platform for his share of the applause, and Paul Hindemith's cello concerto in which the solo part was taken by Gregor Piatigorsky. Already something of a Tanglewood favorite, he extended upon his previous successes by reason of a smooth and evocative performance of a difficult score.

Softly Spoken Solo

In this work a softly spoken instrument was pitted against the heaviest sonorities of the orchestra, the brass choir having been mobilized by the composer to its fullest capacities. Perhaps only by reason of this unfair contrast it seemed that Piatigorsky lacked tonal volume, but his execution was fluid, sure and finished.

The concluding march movement was the most intelligible as well as the most ingeniously colored of the three sections. The second had an agreeable lyricism which gave it more appeal than the first. This is probably to reverse the order of their importance as the composer would judge them, but they seemed to register that way with the audience.

Other Soloists

Copland's "Quiet City" proved a spare, somewhat ascetic composition in which the solo instruments, trumpet and English horn, were in the hands of Georges Mager and Louis Speyer, respectively. The melodic material was angular, with a recitative-like utterance.

The trumpet had the most to say, and its masculinity of statement contrasted with the veiled feminine timbre of the woodwind. Their dialogue against an atmospheric orchestral background was programmatic in feeling. Mr. Mager's trumpet performance was marred by bad luck in intonation a number of times.

The Brahms Symphony had such a performance as it seldom receives. There was a perfectly limpid beginning, with a flowing together of the elements in which a superb cello tone was important. The first movement, with a beautifully organized interpretation that increased in excitement up to the spine-tingling coda, was the foundation upon which subsequent beauty was built.

Saturday's Concert

The audience is an instrument Its temper, resonance, sympathy and pitch are all contributory factors to music making. The quality and responsiveness to the Tanglewood crowd-instrument help to make the Berkshire concerts what they are.

It was in a mettlesome mood Saturday night. The tension was such that anything might have happened, and with the benefit of excellent preparatory auspices in an Italian Symphony and a Leonore No. 3 Overture inspiringly played, the occasion was just right for Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony.

This was the doubtfully received work that Koussevitzky declared he would program again and again until it was understood and liked He gave it to us at Bushnell Memorial last winter.

Enthusiasm High

Saturday night the crowd seemed to have accumulated enthusiasms that were waiting to be spent. After the first movement a restive minority wanted to applaud, but Koussevitzky would have none of it.

Following the dance-time scherzo, the applauders picked up some recruits but no notice was taken of them from the platform. After the slow movement the majority seemed to want to whoop it up and at the end of the concert Dr Koussevitzky was recalled at least half a dozen times in a demonstration that seemed to be engendered not only by affection for the conductor and a job well done but also in a cordial feeling for the Shostakovitch Symphony.

Serious But Friendly

It is long, and in parts of its first and third movements tediously attenuated with the young Russian composer laying his thoughts end to end rather than braiding them polyphonically. He is dreadfully serious-faced throughout, even for a communist, tryingly noisy, showing undue favoritism for the percussion corner, which has far too much to do for communal orthodoxy. The symphony has some good tunes, though, and an air of conviction about it as though it earnestly wished to get along with people.

The Mendelssohn Symphony was ebullient and stimulating, the andante taken at a much quicker pace than usual. The Beethoven Overture was given an outstanding performance, although the off-stage trumpet was badly situated so that its tones were blurred by echoes.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

AUG 4 - 1941

245

Berkshire Festival Lures Big Audience

Tanglewood Concerts of Bostonians Mixture of Old and New Composers

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Weekending with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its Tanglewood Estate, exactly 150 miles from Borough Hall as the roads wind, has become so inviting a pastime that larger audiences than ever before are frequenting the concerts. Even those of us who have heard a majority of the works on the Berkshire Festival programs during the Winter months, either at the Academy of Music or in Carnegie Hall, find something refreshing and revitalizing in listening to them under entirely different circumstances. The orchestra may not have quite the same polish that distinguishes its performances in our concert halls, still it plays as no other orchestra plays and its dynamic conductor misses no dramatic moment in his interpretations of the music. More to the point, however, is the fact that it plays this music in ideal surroundings the beauty of which strike sympathetic vibrations in the hearts of all who go to listen. The combination creates an amazing audience. It is no wonder that going to Tanglewood for the Berkshire Festival is as important now as going to the European music festivals was a few years ago.

The audience is an integral part of the story of the festival, not that there would be no festival were there no audience, but that hundreds come who have no intention of being part of the formal audience seated within the music shed. These people form a very real part of the picture, and if they choose to take their music lying down then they may appreciate it the more. Those within the shed offer the most intense concentration during the performances. It must be an inspiration to play for such a devoted assembly gathered literally from all over the country.

In its eighth season the Berkshire Festival continues to feature the playing of symphonic music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Its purpose has been defined no further. The staples of the standard repertoire again form the substance of the three programs scheduled for each of the three August weekends. The first weekend witnessed more performances of contemporary music than those to come, and thus provided the most diversified and perhaps the most diverting programs. That fact will not decrease the size of the audiences for subsequent concerts; it may increase them.

Prominent on the Thursday night program was the Villa-Lobos Chorus No. 10, "Pasga o coracao," for chorus and orchestra. It has been heard here several times in the last two years. Repeated performances do not add to the stature of the work, rather they tend to diminish it because of certain long stretches which appear to have little to offer. But familiarity does not detract from the strangeness of the music nor from the prehensile grip which its natural rhythms fasten upon the listener. There is something strongly compelling about this composition.

The performance served to introduce the chorus of the Berkshire Musical Association, a group 150 strong, under the direction of Horace Hunt. They coped with the intricacies of the score commendably while conductor and orchestra wove their way thorugh the labyrinth of rhythms with ingenious skill. Other numbers on the program were the Haydn Symphony in G, No. 88; Debussy's "Nuages," "Fetes" (which was the best performance of the evening) and the "Afternoon of a Faun," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which for some reason Dr. Koussevitzky chose to play more deliberately than usual, taking five more minutes to perform, with corresponding loss of forcefulness.

The playing of Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony on Saturday night will remain one of the highlights of the festival. If anything, the interpretation revealed a further command of the music on the part of the conductor. There are some who choose to dismiss the work as defaced by too much banality, but this performance did not give them much ground on which to establish their argument. Dr. Koussevitzky saw to that. He evidently won the greater part of the audience to his way of thinking, for there was an ovation after the performance. Repeated hearings have not altered my opinion of the Fifth as one of the landmarks of contemporary music; this one bolstered its worth. Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 completed this program. The orchestra was in much better form for its second concert.

After the Brahms Fourth Symphony on yesterday's afternoon program (the Sunday concerts begin at 3:30) there were two modern works: Copland's "Quiet City" and Hindemith's Concerto for cello and orchestra, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist. (He played this concerto in Brooklyn last season.) All that Piatigorsky and Koussevitzky could do for the Hindemith did not breathe one iota of genuine human appeal into the score. On the other hand, Copland's music had definite appeal, creating the atmosphere the composer sought and leaving its haunting themes in the mind of the listener.

Written last Summer in a barn-studio two miles down the road from Tanglewood, this score may be an example of what inspiration composers may derive from the influence and setting of the Berkshire Music Center. Whatever the implication, Mr. Copland has here his finest work to date. He says that he tried to write music "evocative of the nostalgia and inner distress of a society profoundly aware of its own insecurity." That he has done with poignant melodies fitting perfectly the timbre of the solo English horn and trumpet for which they are written, and with harmonic background of singularly moving content. It is music which stirs the inner feelings as little of modern music does.

The concert ended with Rimsky-Korsakov's colorful "Canpriccio Espagnol," played in equally colorful fashion. The audience set forth on its several paths, with many planning to convene this Thursday night for the second weekend session.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

AUG 4 - 1941

Tanglewood Tales

The blanket battalion on the lawn Saturday night had its own conductor to make up for not being able to see Dr. Koussevitzky. He was a boy of pr[redacted]ght years, who stood just beyond the British War Relief booth and, with an imaginary baton, put the Boston Symphony through as tough a workout as they ever had under the doctor.

Sharp-eyed patriots report that somebody forgot to fly the American flag for yesterday's concert.

Saturday night's crowd on the lawn—so big that you had to play a delicate game of hopscotch to get through—included a great many picnickers.

This department's Junior Gestapo reports a few of the chauffeurs in the boxholders' parking lot look back on the concert Saturday night with regret. There was a poker game.

It is rumored that there's going to be a new honorary member of the Festival board of directors—the weatherman.

Witnesses of undoubted veracity tell us that yesterday afternoon at 3.15, a car drove right past the entrance to Tanglewood.

Several of the attending newspapermen were unable to report first-hand on the early portion of Saturday night's concert. George W. Edman, clerk of the Festival corporation, had a cocktail party.

Even Berkshire's back roads no longer are the secret of the natives. Yesterday afternoon's record-breaking Festival traffic raised the dust on practically every cow path leading to Tanglewood.

For the first time in Festival history, the emergency parking field near Gate 4 was used Saturday night and yesterday.

Every gas station for four or five miles from Tanglewood had lines of cars following yesterday's concert, which ended shortly after 5.30, an hour-and-a-half before the 7 o'clock deadline. Some listeners even left before the concert was over.

Yesterday's problem of getting 3500 cars away from Tanglewood as quickly as possible was eased somewhat by the many people who stayed after the concert to view the grounds.

Modes of transportation to the Festival are being exploited to the limit. By train, automobile, motorcycle, bicycle, horseback, by foot, and now by airplane, they come. Two privately-owned planes arrived at Pittsfield Airport for the week-end concerts—a Piper coupe, flown by William Vaughan of Hallowell, Me., and a Stinson 105, piloted by C. F. Taylor of East Boston.

Koussevitzky Shares the Spotlight at Tanglewood

A tremendous ovation swept the music Shed yesterday afternoon at the conclusion of Paul Hindemith's concerto for violoncello and orchestra with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist. Left to right, are: Piatigorsky, Dr. Koussevitzky and Hindemith.

Aaron Copland with the assistance of the smiling Koussevitzky acknowledges the plaudits of the crowd at the conclusion of his "Quiet City" which was the opening number on yesterday afternoon's program.

This Clipping From
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 4 - 1941

BENEFIT PROGRAM TICKETS ON SALE

Gala Concert to be Given at Tanglewood Aug. 15—North Adams Committee Named.

Tickets for the gala benefit program to be presented Aug. 15 at Tanglewood by the Berkshire Symphonic Festival are now on sale here, it was announced today.

Mrs. Robert J. Carpenter has been named chairman of the committee for North Adams which is composed of Mrs. James A. Hardman, Herbert B. Clark, Mrs. Maye Mahar, Mrs. Philip Melcher, Mrs. Thomas E. Graham, Mrs. Clinton Whitney, Mrs. William G. Cleary, Jr., and Thomas Hosty. Tickets can be obtained from any of the committee members or at Apothecary hall.

The program will include selections by 250 members of the bands of the 26th division from Camp Edwards under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra which will also play in the evening. The Berkshire Festival chorus and outstanding soloists will be presented and operatic selections will also be offered.

The event is being sponsored by the festival association for the benefit of the United Service Organizations and for British War Relief and will start at 5.30 o'clock and end with a fireworks display late in the evening.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

AUG 4 - 1941

Berkshire Festival Lures Big Audience

Tanglewood Concerts of Bostonians Mixture of Old and New Composers

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Weekending with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its Tanglewood Estate, exactly 150 miles from Borough Hall as the roads wind, has become so inviting a pastime that larger audiences than ever before are frequenting the concerts. Even those of us who have heard a majority of the works on the Berkshire Festival programs during the Winter months, either at the Academy of Music or in Carnegie Hall, find something refreshing and revitalizing in listening to them under entirely different circumstances. The orchestra may not have quite the same polish that distinguishes its performances in our concert halls, still it plays as no other orchestra plays and its dynamic conductor misses no dramatic moment in his interpretations of the music. More to the point, however, is the fact that it plays this music in ideal surroundings the beauty of which strike sympathetic vibrations in the hearts of all who go to listen. The combination creates an amazing audience. It is no wonder that going to Tanglewood for the Berkshire Festival is as important now as going to the European music festivals was a few years ago.

The audience is an integral part of the story of the festival, not that there would be no festival were there no audience, but that hundreds come who have no intention of being part of the formal audience seated within the music shed. These people form a very real part of the picture, and if they choose to take their music lying down then they may appreciate it the more. Those within the shed offer the most intense concentration during the performances. It must be an inspiration to play for such a devoted assembly gathered literally from all over the country.

In its eighth season the Berkshire Festival continues to feature the playing of symphonic music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Its purpose has been defined no further. The staples of the standard repertoire again form the substance of the three programs scheduled for each of the three August weekends. The first weekend witnessed more performances of contemporary music than those to come, and thus provided the most diversified and perhaps the most diverting programs. That fact will not decrease the size of the audiences for subsequent concerts; it may increase them.

Prominent on the Thursday night program was the Villa-Lobos Chorus No. 10, "Pasga o coracao," for chorus and orchestra. It has been heard here several times in the last two years. Repeated performances do not add to the stature of the work, rather they tend to diminish it because of certain long stretches which appear to have little to offer. But familiarity does not detract from the strangeness of the music nor from the prehensile grip which its natural rhythms fasten upon the listener. There is something strongly compelling about this composition.

The performance served to introduce the chorus of the Berkshire Musical Association, a group 150 strong, under the direction of Horace Hunt. They coped with the intricacies of the score commendably while conductor and orchestra wove their way thorugh the labyrinth of rhythms with ingenious skill. Other numbers on the program were the Haydn Symphony in G, No. 88; Debussy's "Nuages," "Fetes" (which was the best performance of the evening) and the "Afternoon of a Faun," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which for some reason Dr. Koussevitzky chose to play more deliberately than usual, taking five more minutes to perform, with corresponding loss of forcefulness.

The playing of Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony on Saturday night will remain one of the highlights of the festival. If anything, the interpretation revealed a further command of the music an the part of the conductor. There are some who choose to dismiss the work as defaced by too much banality, but this performance did not give them much ground on which to establish their argument. Dr. Koussevitzky saw to that. He evidently won the greater part of the audience to his way of thinking, for there was an ovation after the performance. Repeated hearings have not altered my opinion of the Fifth as one of the landmarks of contemporary music; this one bolstered its worth. Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 completed this program. The orchestra was in much better form for its second concert.

After the Brahms Fourth Symphony on yesterday's afternoon program (the Sunday concerts begin at 3:30) there were two modern works: Copland's "Quiet City" and Hindemith's Concerto for cello and orchestra, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist. (He played this concerto in Brooklyn last season.) All that Piatigorsky and Koussevitzky could do for the Hindemith did not breathe one iota of genuine human appeal into the score. On the other hand, Copland's music had definite appeal, creating the atmosphere the composer sought and leaving its haunting themes in the mind of the listener.

Written last Summer in a barn-studio two miles down the road from Tanglewood, this score may be an example of what inspiration composers may derive from the influence and setting of the Berkshire Music Center. Whatever the implication, Mr. Copland has here his finest work to date. He says that he tried to write music "evocative of the nostalgia and inner distress of a society profoundly aware of its own insecurity." That he has done with poignant melodies fitting perfectly the timbre of the solo English horn and trumpet for which they are written, and with harmonic background of singularly moving content. It is music which stirs the inner feelings as little of modern music does.

The concert ended with Rimsky-Korsakov's colorful "Canpriccio Espagnol," played in equally colorful fashion. The audience set forth on its several paths, with many planning to convene this Thursday night for the second weekend session.

---

lipping From FIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

AUG 4 - 1941

Tanglewood Tales

The blanket battalion on the lawn Saturday night had its own conductor to make up for not being able to see Dr. Koussevitzky. He was a boy of pr[redacted]ght years, who stood just beyond the British War Relief booth and, with an imaginary baton, put the Boston Symphony through as tough a workout as they ever had under the doctor.

Sharp-eyed patriots report that somebody forgot to fly the American flag for yesterday's concert.

Saturday night's crowd on the lawn—so big that you had to play a delicate game of hopscotch to get through—included a great many picnickers.

This department's Junior Gestapo reports a few of the chauffeurs in the boxholders' parking lot look back on the concert Saturday night with regret. There was a poker game.

It is rumored that there's going to be a new honorary member of the Festival board of directors—the weatherman.

Witnesses of undoubted veracity tell us that yesterday afternoon at 3.15, a car drove right past the entrance to Tanglewood.

Several of the attending newspapermen were unable to report first-hand on the early portion of Saturday night's concert. George W. Edman, clerk of the Festival corporation, had a cocktail party.

Even Berkshire's back roads no longer are the secret of the natives. Yesterday afternoon's record-breaking Festival traffic raised the dust on practically every cow path leading to Tanglewood.

For the first time in Festival history, the emergency parking field near Gate 4 was used Saturday night and yesterday.

Every gas station for four or five miles from Tanglewood had lines of cars following yesterday's concert, which ended shortly after 5.30, an hour-and-a-half before the 7 o'clock deadline. Some listeners even left before the concert was over.

Yesterday's problem of getting 3500 cars away from Tanglewood as quickly as possible was eased somewhat by the many people who stayed after the concert to view the grounds.

Modes of transportation to the Festival are being exploited to the limit. By train, automobile, motorcycle, bicycle, horseback, by foot, and now by airplane, they come. Two privately-owned planes arrived at Pittsfield Airport for the week-end concerts—a Piper coupe, flown by William Vaughan of Hallowell, Me., and a Stinson 105, piloted by C. F. Taylor of East Boston.

This Clipping From
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 4 - 1941

BENEFIT PROGRAM TICKETS ON SALE

Gala Concert to be Given at Tanglewood Aug. 15 —North Adams Committee Named.

Tickets for the gala benefit program to be presented Aug. 15 at Tanglewood by the Berkshire Symphonic Festival are now on sale here, it was announced today.

Mrs. Robert J. Carpenter has been named chairman of the committee for North Adams which is composed of Mrs. James A. Hardman, Herbert B. Clark, Mrs. Maye Mahar, Mrs. Philip Melcher, Mrs. Thomas E. Graham, Mrs. Clinton Whitney, Mrs. William G. Cleary, Jr., and Thomas Hosty. Tickets can be obtained from any of the committee members or at Apothecary hall.

The program will include selections by 250 members of the bands of the 26th division from Camp Edwards under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra which will also play in the evening. The Berkshire Festival chorus and outstanding soloists will be presented and operatic selections will also be offered.

The event is being sponsored by the festival association for the benefit of the United Service Organizations and for British War Relief and will start at 5.30 o'clock and end with a fireworks display late in the evening.

Koussevitzky Shares the Spotlight at Tanglewood

A tremendous ovation swept the music Shed yesterday afternoon at the conclusion of Paul Hindemith's concerto for violoncello and orchestra with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist. Left to right, are: Piatigorsky, Dr. Koussevitzky and Hindemith.

Aaron Copland with the assistance of the smiling Koussevitzky acknowledges the plaudits of the crowd at the conclusion of his "Quiet City" which was the opening number on yesterday afternoon's program.

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 911
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK

[246]

END OF VOLUME

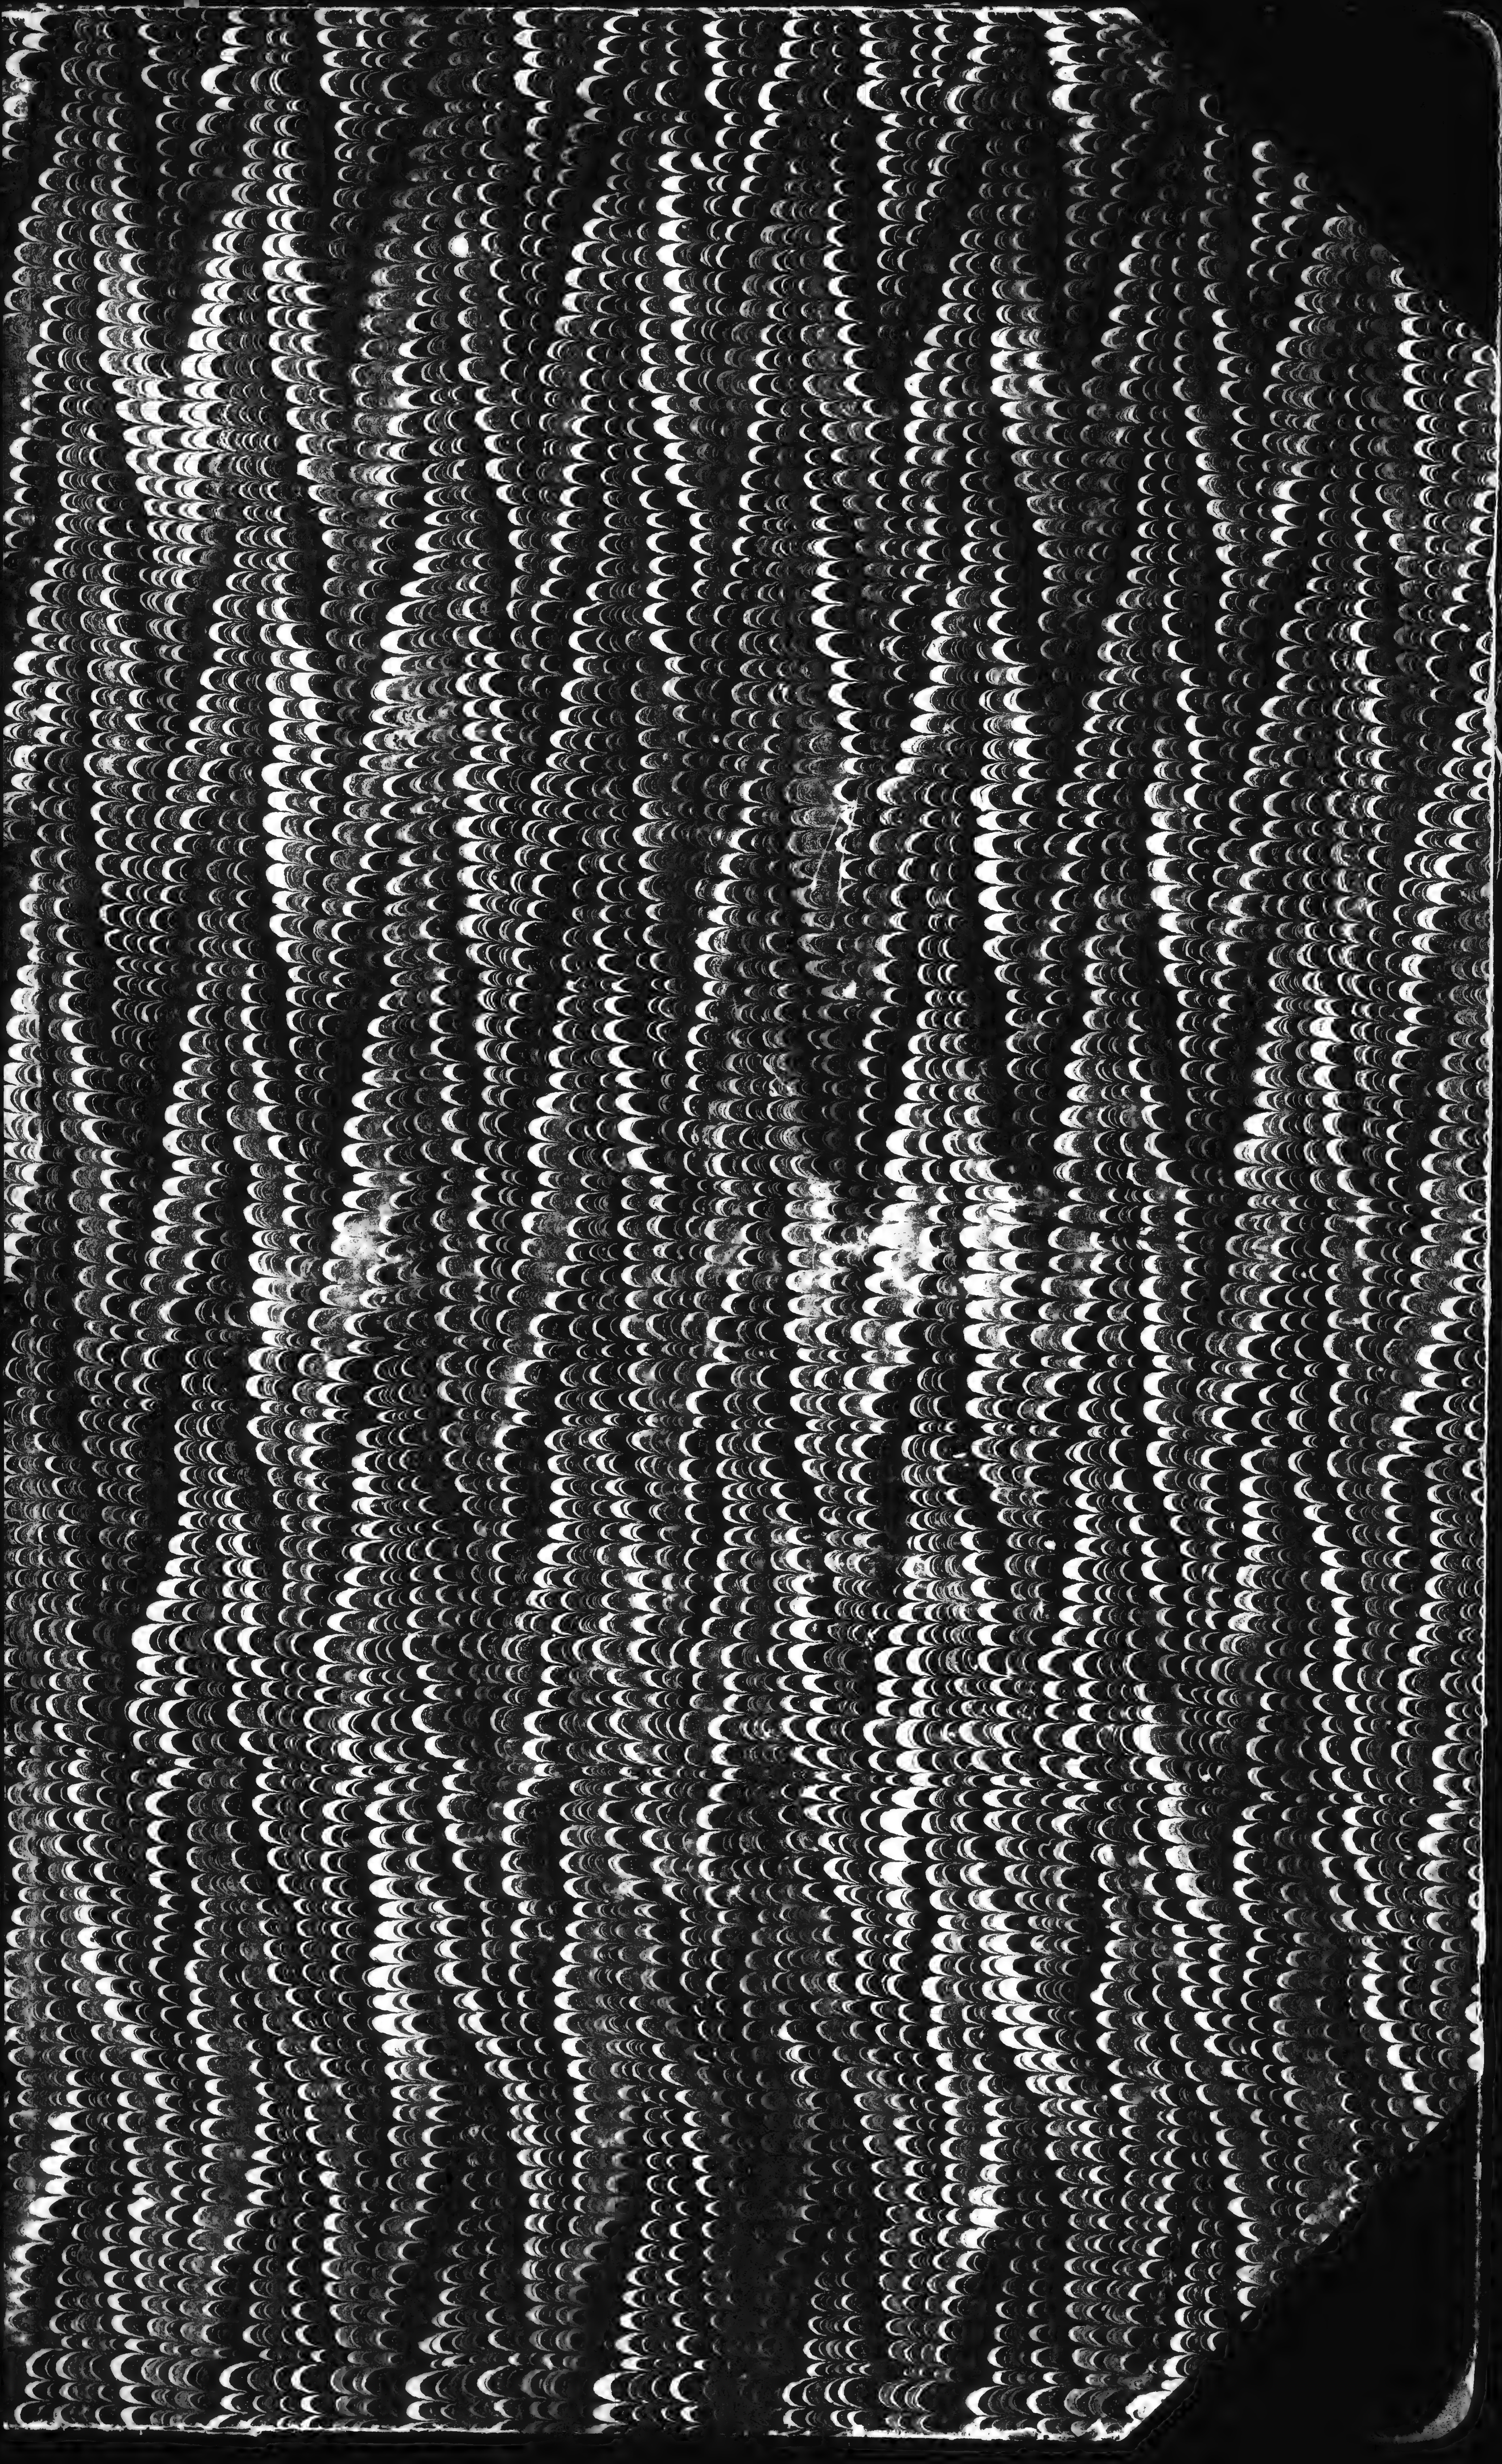
VOLUME 68

BSO
Pops

1940



BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

THIS CLIPPING FROM BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

MAR 16 1940

Men to Predominate At Musical Center

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky's now famous Berkshire music center, at the Tanglewood home of the Boston Symphony summer festival, probably will be a predominantly male affair.

The music center is a unique non-profit school at which Dr. Koussevitzky and a large staff will help professional and advanced musicians.

A little less than four months ahead of the July 8 opening 275 applications have been received from 23 states.

Of the first 200 received men were found predominating, 111 to 89. Sixty-five were from Massachusetts and 55 from New York. About half were from professional musicians.

Lawyers, doctors and engineers were numerous among the amateur group, the survey showed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES

MAR 17 1940

SHARPS AND FLATS

Boston's Symphony Orchestra will give nine programs in the Berkshire summer series, including the Bach B minor Mass with choir trained at the new Tanglewood Summer School of Music. Artur Rodzinski will come over from his goat farm at Stockbridge near by to be a guest conductor, Koussevitzky being the conductor, musical director and head of the school. Soloists will be Dorothy Maynor, discovered there last year at a Koussevitzky picnic for the orchestra, and Albert Spalding, who lives near by and is known locally in the hills as a tennis shark. The Berkshire school' will open July 8, continuing for six weeks.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

MAR 23 1940

Men Predominate In Musician Bids

Stockbridge, Mass. —(AP)— Serge Koussevitzky's now famous Berkshire music center, at the Tanglewood home of the Boston Symphony summer festival, probably will be a predominately male affair.

The music center is a unique non-profit school at which Dr. Koussevitzky and a large staff will help professional and advanced musicians.

A little less than four months ahead of the July 8 opening 275 applications have been received from 23 states.

Of the first 200 received men were found predominating, 111 to 89. Sixty-five were from Massachusetts and 55 from New York. About half were from professional musicians.

Lawyers, doctors and engineers were numerous among the amateur group, the survey showed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

MAR 24 1940

Sellout in Prospect For Berkshire Festival

Special to The News.

NEW YORK, March 23.—Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a three-week series of concerts to be given in Auguest at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Reports from advance reservations show that already the festival shed has been sold out to a third of its capacity. Members have responded to the additional week of concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

MAR 16 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 16 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN

MAR 16 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

MAR 17 1940

Hindemith Is Busy

Paul Hindemith is a visiting lecturer at Buffalo university, Cornell university and Wells college. The German composer will head the advanced composition department at the Berkshire academy during July and August. His new violin concerto will receive its premiere by the Boston symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concert master as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

MAR 19 1940

Karl Muck.

(In Memoriam.)

Scarce could we pay heed to dinner in the college dining hall, and scarce engage in the smallest spurts of conversation. Ever and anon one of us would look up, his eyes remote and fixed on an inner vision, and then return to his mutton. Shivering with a premonition at once uncontrollable and mysterious, I pushed aside my rice pudding, folded my napkin and gazed at my table mates, freshmen all: Arthur, specializing in Latin and Greek; Thorndike, majoring in geology; Clyde, hesitating between psychology and economics, and Henry, preparing for the graduate business school.

By intention we dined late, so that we should be first in line at the tiny gallery of the auditorium, with its scarcity of seats, two bits apiece, and first come, first served. And as we lingered, now and then glancing at the clock on the west wall, every one of us knew, by his own knowing, that tonight, for the first time, with not one of us majoring in music, we should hear Karl Muck conduct.

Scarce were we physically conscious of our walk from the dining hall to the auditorium and our waiting in line. Then, with a sprint itself a marathon of endeavor, there we all sat in front-row seats, our heads supported by our hands, our eyes gazing down at the professors and the richer students dawdling to their reserved accommodations, the orchestra humming and squealing in their tuning up for all the world like a concert of classic Chinese music.

Hardly ere we were aware, Karl Muck had come in, bowed with a severe grace and faced the Boston Symphony Orchestra, delegated that night to Cambridge. Even at that tender age I had heard many great conductors and was, in true undergraduate spirit, prepared to be aloof and devastating.

All at once, when the first theme of Beethoven's C-minor Symphony had been sounded, it was as if a dark uprush of waters rose from the stage, flowed over me in tumultuous eddies, drew me down to their enigmatic depths and yet let me have consciousness of that one figure holding the baton with even more magical divination than Wotan held the spear commanding all the gulfs of the winds. As from a distance and yet incalculably clear, I saw the leonine head, the face as if cut from steel, the body taut like a bow, the arms not waving like theatrical windmills, but cutting the air like swords.

My throat invaded by an immense, throttling frog, I came to at the end of the final movement and gazed at my companions, to find them in like case; lads by no means sentimental, but rather subscribing to that "indifference" popularly ascribed to our college. However should we have strength to pass through the remainder of the program: Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and Wagner's Funeral March and Finale from "The Twilight of the Gods!" By Wotan and Wagner, Karl Muck was a man, endowed with a cold, white, invisible flame that turned bread-and-butter violinists into soaring larks and doughnut-eating tuba players into demigods! And then, without a word spoken of communal intention, we rose and cheered, our shouts more exultant than in the stadium the week before when our football team had whelmed Yale.

Karl Muck died, the other day, the noblest German of them all. Hardly was he noticed amid the fever and cannonade of war; hardly known to the stampeding Nazi youths who are slugging their own Fatherland, even more than the outside world, into mud and blood and intellectual darkness, and no less beating down the gracious and genuinely heroic German spirit, universal in music, that Karl Muck nurtured to the end of his long life.

In retirement for years, obscure to the drums and tramplings of a new, brawling generation, Karl Muck could not look to the public reverence that should accompany old age, but in his heart and mind he must have known the assured continuance of his genius, perpetuated, at the very least, by phonograph records embedding his incomparable conducting.

Vex not his ghost. So let him pass. Upon the tough rack of this present world he would not have desired to be stretched out longer.

* * *

I would rather write the songs of a nation than underwrite all its generals.

* * *

Music, though harsh voices hum it, Cannot fail the golden summit.

—DONALD DOUGLAS.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GREENFIELD, MASS.
RECORDER-GAZETTE

MAR 16 1940

MEN SEEK MUSIC

STOCKBRIDG7 (AP)—Serge Kousevtizky's Berkshire Music center, at the Tanglewood home of the Boston symphony summer festival probably will be a predominately male non-profit school.

A little less than four months ahead ofthe July 8 opening 275 applications have been received from 23 states. Of the first 200 received men were found predominating, 111 to 89. Sixty-five were from Massachusetts and 55 from New York.

About half were from professional musicians. Lawyers, doctors and engineers were numerous among the amateur group, the survey showed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

MAR 16 1940

Music Center Project

The Berkshire Music Center, a project of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opening at Tanglewood in July, has already stimulated interest to the point where more than 275 applications have been received from more than a score of states and many colleges, universities and music schools.

To house students of this summer school will be a problem but through the co-operation of Lenox School, about 100 will be taken care of there. The other 200 will find accommodations at inns, hotels, private homes and cottages around the lake. There is no question but the presence of these students and the faculty will be a wholesome stimulant to the Berkshires.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

MAR 16 1940

Third of Festival Shed's Capacity Already Subscribed

Orchestra Reports More Than 275 Applications for School—Men Predominate

Already the third week's series of concerts to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor has met with remarkable response according to a report today from the trustees. The season has been extended this year from two to three weeks. That the Festival's concerts at Tanglewood will have an unusual appeal not only because of the programs but because of world conditions is indicated by early applications for subscriptions. Advance reservations for all nine concerts show that the Festival Shed has been sold out at this date to a third of its capacity.

Similarly the orchestra reports enthusiastic interest in its Berkshire Music Center opening at Tanglewood July 8 and continuing through the period of the concerts, the first three weeks in August. More than 275 applications have been received.

Third Week Encouraging

Recently the Festival mailed announcements concerning the third week of concerts to all its members. Already more than half have responded and a third of them have indicated their desire to avail themselves of the membership privilege for the third week. The greatest number want at least the first two weeks while the percentage of those desiring all three weeks is just slightly less. Similar percentages apply to those making application for subscriptions.

During the opening week of the Festival the programs will include works by Beethoven, Schumann, Sibelius, Schubert, Brahms, Prokofieff, Ravel, Stravinsky and Roy Harris.

For the second week there will be a Tchaikovsky Festival celebrating the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. Artur Rodzinski will conduct one of the programs. Albert Spalding will be a soloist at another.

Dorothy Maynor, talented Negro soprano will appear with the orchestra the third week. The program will include works by Grahms, Haydn, Wagner, Hindemith, and Bach's B Minor Mass with the Festival Chorus from the Berkshire Music Center.

The first two hundred applications received for admission to the Berkshire Music Center, have been analyzed and are remarkable not only because of the large number received at this time, but also because they bear witness to backgrounds and varied experience of the prospective students

Men Predominate

Among the first 200—men predominate—111 men to 89 women. About half of the applicants, 102, are under 25 years of age; 29 are between 25 and 30 years; 45 are between 35 and 40 years; 24 are over 40.

Twenty-three states are already represented among the applications. More have come from Massachusetts than from any other state—65; New York follows with 55; 18 are from Ohio; 12 are from Pennsylvania; 7 are from Connecticut, and 7 are from Illinois. Other states represented are Iowa, Louisiana, Kentucky, Mississippi, New Jersey, New Hampshire, Michigan, California, Rhode Island, Oklahoma, Virginia, Minnesota, Indiana, Kansas, Missouri, Wisconsin, Nebraska, and Canada.

These applicants come from the finest schools of music: 25 have been students at the New England Conservatory; 20 at Juilliard; 15 at Eastman; 12 at the Cleveland Institute of Music; 8 at the Curtis Institute; 8 at the Longy School; 6 at Oberlin; 4 at the American Conservatory of Chicago; a number at the Salzburg Mozarteum, the American Conservatory at Fontainebleau, the Royal College of Music in London, the Cincinnati Conservatory, and several others. Three-fourths of the applicants are either college students or have attended college: 21 of the applicants have been Harvard students; 14 have gone to Radcliffe; 7 to Wellesley; 7 to Smith; 7 to Western Reserve; 5 each to Oberlin, Yale and Columbia.

In Musical Profession

About half of the applicants are already in the musical profession: teachers, directors and supervisors of music, orchestral and choral conductors, composers and arrangers, pianists, singers, organists, symphony orchestra players. The other half are music students and amateurs with an interest in music and some musical education. Some of these amateurs are members of the legal, medical, and engineering, as well as other professions, but have retained an active interest in the field of music.

Dr. Koussevitzky's class in orchestral conducting is bringing many applications from the best qualified graduates of the outstanding music schools. Only those are eligible who can meet the minimum requirements: a knowledge of the technique of composition—form, harmony, counterpoint, fugue and instrumentation; ability to transpose at sight and to play the piano and one or more orchestral instruments. It is also considered desirable for applicants to have had some experience in conducting and that they be, generally, not over 35 years of age. In addition, they must be well recommended by former teachers or directors of musical institutions in which they have studied. The group selected from the basis of these high standards will be small, but provision has been made for other well-qualified students to attend Dr. Koussevitzky's class in conducting as auditors.

Choral Conducting

Other important departments of the Berkshire Music Center are those of choral conducting, for which 36 applications have already been received, closely followed by the course in opera dramatics, composition, and music in the schools. Fifty-seven have expressed a special interest in chamber music and ensemble playing.

Among the outstanding opportunities offered by the Berkshire Music Center are the two student orchestras, and the applications received indicate that both the orchestra of the institute for advanced study and the less advanced academy orchestra will have a well-balanced distribution of symphonic instruments. To date the applicants for the institute orchestra include the following: 17 violin, 5 viola, 9 cello, 4 bass, 4 flute, 1 oboe, 7 clarinet, 1 basson, 1 horn, 1 trombone, 1 harp, and 1 timpani.

The academy chorus, which will prepare the Bach B minor mass for performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the conductorship of Dr. Koussevitzky at one of the concerts of the Festival, will, according to the applications already received, be a well-prepared and splendidly balanced group. There are already 37 sopranos, 30 altos, 18 tenors, and 26 basses. The chorus will be limited to 250, the largest number that can be accommodated in the barn, which has been remodeled into an excellent rehearsal room.

All of the students of the Berkshire Music Center, in addition to their school activities, will be privileged to attend the nine Festival concerts and a number of the rehearsals.

Catalogues Available

Catalogues of the Berkshire Music Center will be sent upon application to Margaret Grant, secretary of the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

Information about the Berkshire Symphonic Festival will be sent upon application to the office at Stockbridge or the New York office at Steinway Hall, 113 West 57th Street. The Berkshire Hills Conference, Pittsfield, will be glad to answer inquiries about living accommodations.

2

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

MAR 18 1940

Dr. Karl Muck—Martyr or Spy?

Death of Famous Boston Symphony Conductor Recalls World War Controversy Over Whether He Was Guilty of Charge Which Sent Him to Prison or Was Merely Silly in Refusing to Play National Anthem

"IT IS said that truth is the first casualty of every war, and I would add with it, common sense. The death in Stuttgart, Germany, a few days ago, of Dr. Karl Muck, the famous Wagnerian conductor, is a case in point. It is an ironic reminder that Dr. Muck, who suffered such ignominy in America in the last great war, should die at the beginning of the second."

Thus writes "An Appreciative Reader" of The Journal, who feels that the master should not be permitted to quit these earthly scenes without the meed of some melodious tear, or more specifically a mention of Dr. Muck's hardships in his final years. Not many American residents under 35 or 40 have heard of Muck. A generation ago he was the kingpin director of the symphonic world, the equivalent of a Stokowski or a Toscanini, let us say. Dr. Muck lacked the personal magnetism and the publicity build-up of the latter day maestros, but he was acknowledged to be the ablest conductor in the business and the Boston orchestra which he lead was accounted the world's finest. To throw such a gentleman into jail, after a nation-wide uproar, was certainly an incident of more than passing interest.

* * *

Karl Muck, the son of a Bavarian judge, was born in Darmstadt in 1859, thus being 80 at the time of his death. He studied languages, philosophy and music at Heidelberg and other colleges and naturally was a foremost European director before he was imported for the American trade.

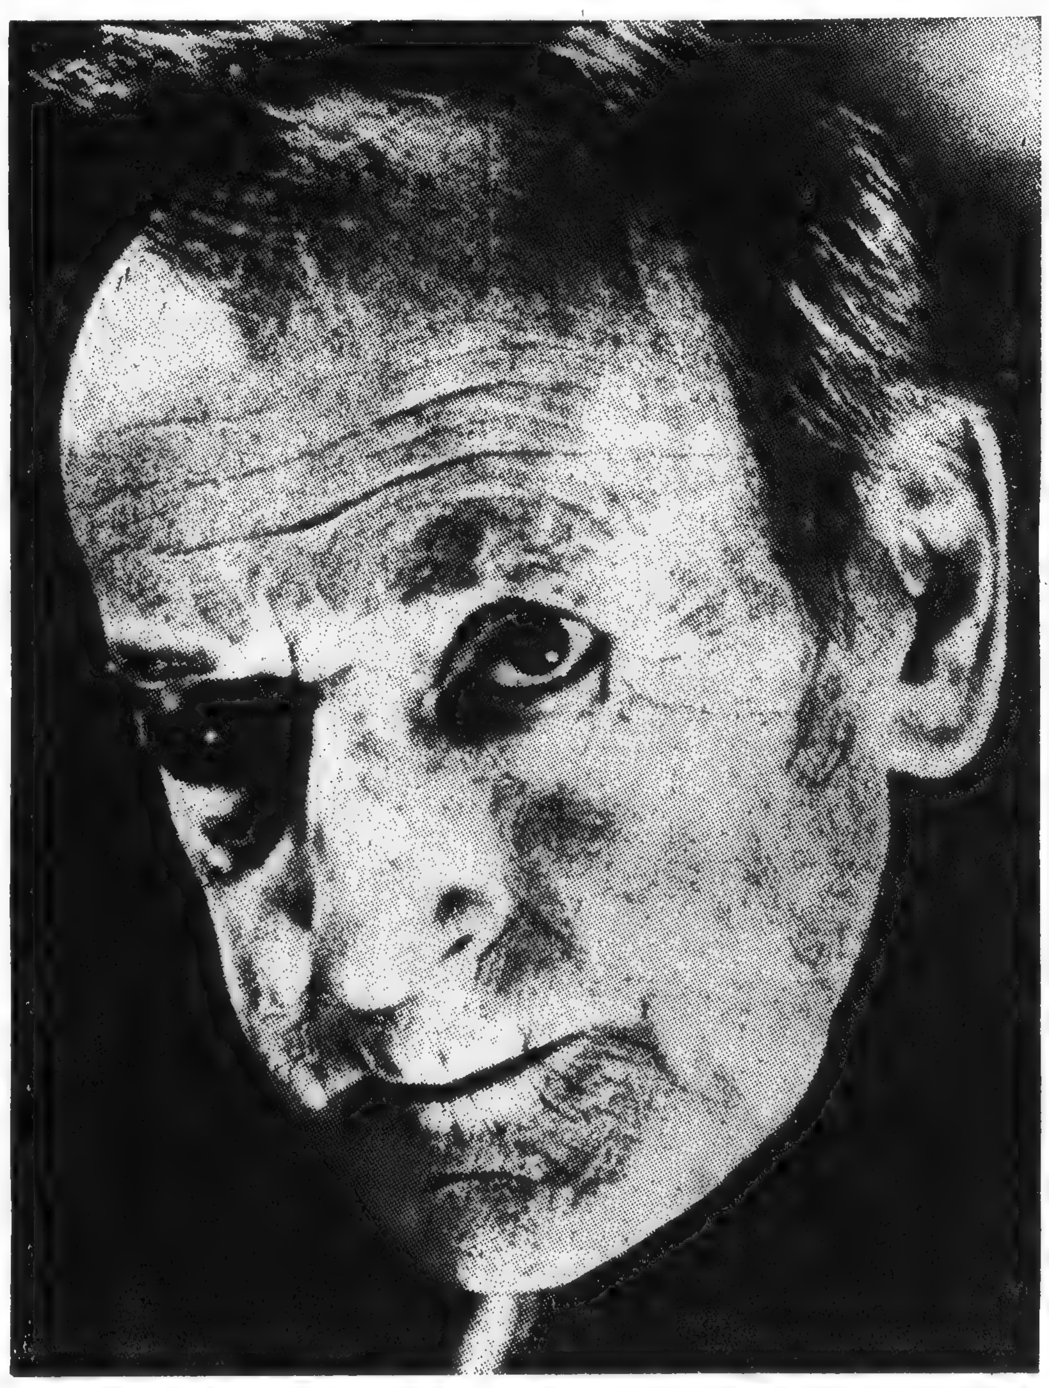
In 1906 he made his first visit to the United States at the invitation of Henry Lee Higginson, the eminent banker and music patron, who freely gave of his wealth to insure an unexcelled orchestra for Boston. Dr. Muck did not disappoint his patron either. He was the musical martinet of popular imagination—a tall, skinny drill sergeant who could fell an antagonist with a single baleful glance. He rehearsed his men unmercifully, he insulted and browbeat them, but like every great conductor, he drove himself twice as hard as he did his subordinates. The organization which he produced approached perfection.

Now, Muck was a thoroughgoing German by birth, temperament and tradition, but his father had become a citizen of Switzerland when Karl was a child, and Dr. Muck regarded himself as a naturalized Swiss. When he returned to America in 1915, after his summer vacation, the World war was in its second year and Muck was interviewed about his opinions and observations of the European panorama. He declared bluntly that he could not believe the Germans perpetrated the Belgian "atrocities" which had been charged, and he further announced that, as an artist and not a statesman, he was maintaining a strict public neutrality. Privately, however, he was not so discreet. It was fairly well understood that he favored the German cause and he certainly did not deny any sympathy with his native land.

* * *

When America entered the war in 1917, Dr. Muck's position was none too comfortable, obviously. He promptly offered to resign his Boston position, but Maj. Higginson refused to accept the resignation. "To quit is a sign of weakness," Higginson argued. "Carry on with your conducting, show them that art has no connection with politics." Muck was persuaded to continue his work, but his misgivings were well founded.

At a concert which his Boston orchestra played in Providence, R. I., Oct. 30, 1917, Muck declined to play "The Star Spangled Banner" on the ground that the music was unworthy of a place on a symphonic program. Civic and patriotic groups and individuals made capital of the refusal. So Higginson advised Muck to play the American anthem at the next concert of the Bostonians and Muck complied. Waggishly, he interpolated some counterpoint from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser." The audience did not understand the subtle insult and cheered the performance. But the obdurate Muck refused to turn to the audience to acknowledge the applause, and the hearers' enthusiasm was swiftly changed to anger. The next day Muck again implored Higginson to let him resign, but the major was firm in his refusal.



Dr. Karl Muck, Wagnerian conductor, who died recently in Germany

Four days later the Baltimore police ordered cancellation of a concert there by Muck's orchestra, and Baltimore citizens held a meeting to denounce the conductor. According to David Ewen, the young musicologist who has made a close study of Muck's "American tragedy," Gov. Warfield of Maryland actually asserted that "no true American could remain satisfied until Muck had been mobbed to death."

By that time the chorus of defamation had become a constant roar —Muck was violently pro-German, Muck was a secret German agent, Muck was a friend of the kaiser, Muck was sending his money to Germany to aid it in prosecuting the war, etc., etc. Even the gentle Walter Damrosch upbraided his colleague over "The Star Spangled Banner" controversy. "The explanation that Dr. Muck gives in the newspapers is cowardly and evades the real issue. He says, 'Why will people be so silly? Art is a thing by itself and not related to any particular nation or group. Therefore it would be a gross mistake, a violation of artistic taste and principles, for such an organization as ours to play patriotic airs.' He chooses to ignore the fact that the national anthem is the symbol of our patriotism and loyalty, and that even though he is an 'enemy alien,' the Boston symphony should be, most decidedly, an American organization."

* * *

After a few months of such attacks, even Maj. Higginson bowed and announced that Dr. Muck would resign at the close of the season. Late in March, 1918, while the director was preparing the majestic "St. Matthew's Passion" of Bach for the final concert, federal officers went to his home at night and arrested him on charges of being an unregistered enemy alien. Muck protested that he was a citizen of Switzerland and therefore not required to register as a German. Nevertheless he was held in jail for 11 days until the department of justice at Washington announced that Muck had been found guilty of "espionage" and was to be interned at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., during the war.

The conductor remained a prisoner for more than a year and in the summer of 1919 was deported.

For several years thereafter he was unable, physically or temperamentally, to work, but when he did resume conducting, at Hamburg and Bayreuth and the other musical centers, he displayed all of his former genius and energy. He made his last public appearance at Leipzig, in 1933, for the observance of the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner.

His countrymen did not forget him in the years of retirement. Only a few months ago, when he reached his eightieth birthday, the chancellor bestowed the order of the German eagle upon him, with a commendation "to the great conductor."

WALTER MONFRIED.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

CHRISTIAN CENTURY
CHICAGO, ILL
3/20/40

Kark Muck, Alien But Not Enemy

WHEN Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, died a few days ago, memories were revived of the strange excitement which raged about him in the days of the World War, and especially after we got into it. Dr. Muck was, of course, a German by birth and training, and he had become one of the most famous conductors in the world before he was brought to Boston. He was especially celebrated as an interpreter of Wagner and his work at the Beyreuth festivals had given him eminence. As the war psychosis began to work on us and Germanophobia became epidemic, suspicion pointed to Dr. Muck for no other reason than that he was a German. Then came the day when, having been requested to end a concert by playing "The Star-Spangled Banner," he was said to have "refused." Anyway, it was not played. A furor arose. This German so-and-so takes American money, occupies a place that some good American ought to have, and refuses to play our national anthem! From that it was not a long step to his internment as an alien enemy, though it took some time to make it. It was assisted by the vigorous urgency of some of our most eminent and respected religious and civic leaders. After the armistice he returned to Germany and never came back, though he retired from public life when the nazis came to power and pure art became, in his judgment, impossible in Germany. But about that "refusal" to play the national anthem. The real facts were disclosed not long ago. The request did not come to Dr. Muck but to the president of the Boston orchestral association. The president, feeling that the selection was not in harmony with the classical program which it was to close, and that patriotism did not depend upon such demonstrations, pocketed the request and said nothing about it. The first Dr. Muck ever heard of it was when the howl arose, and even then he did not at first know what it was about. After he had learned, he regularly played "The Star-Spangled Banner" at the close of his concerts. The incident is instructive, and especially just now when we are in danger of repeating some of the forgotten follies of twenty years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

MAR 18 1940

Dr. Karl Muck—Martyr or Spy?

Death of Famous Boston Symphony Conductor Recalls World War Controversy Over Whether He Was Guilty of Charge Which Sent Him to Prison or Was Merely Silly in Refusing to Play National Anthem

"IT IS said that truth is the first casualty of every war, and I would add with it common sense. The death in Stuttgart, Germany, a few days ago, of Dr. Karl Muck, the famous Wagnerian conductor, is a case in point. It is an ironic reminder that Dr. Muck, who suffered such ignominy in America in the last great war, should die at the beginning of the second."

Thus writes "An Appreciative Reader" of The Journal, who feels that the master should not be permitted to quit these earthly scenes without the meed of some melodious tear, or more specifically a mention of Dr. Muck's hardships in his final years. Not many American residents under 35 or 40 have heard of Muck. A generation ago he was the kingpin director of the symphonic world, the equivalent of a Stokowski or a Toscanini, let us say. Dr. Muck lacked the personal magnetism and the publicity build-up of the latter day maestros, but he was acknowledged to be the ablest conductor in the business and the Boston orchestra which he lead was accounted the world's finest. To throw such a gentleman into jail, after a nation-wide uproar, was certainly an incident of more than passing interest.

* * *

Karl Muck, the son of a Bavarian judge, was born in Darmstadt in 1859, thus being 80 at the time of his death. He studied languages, philosophy and music at Heidelberg and other colleges and naturally was a foremost European director before he was imported for the American trade.

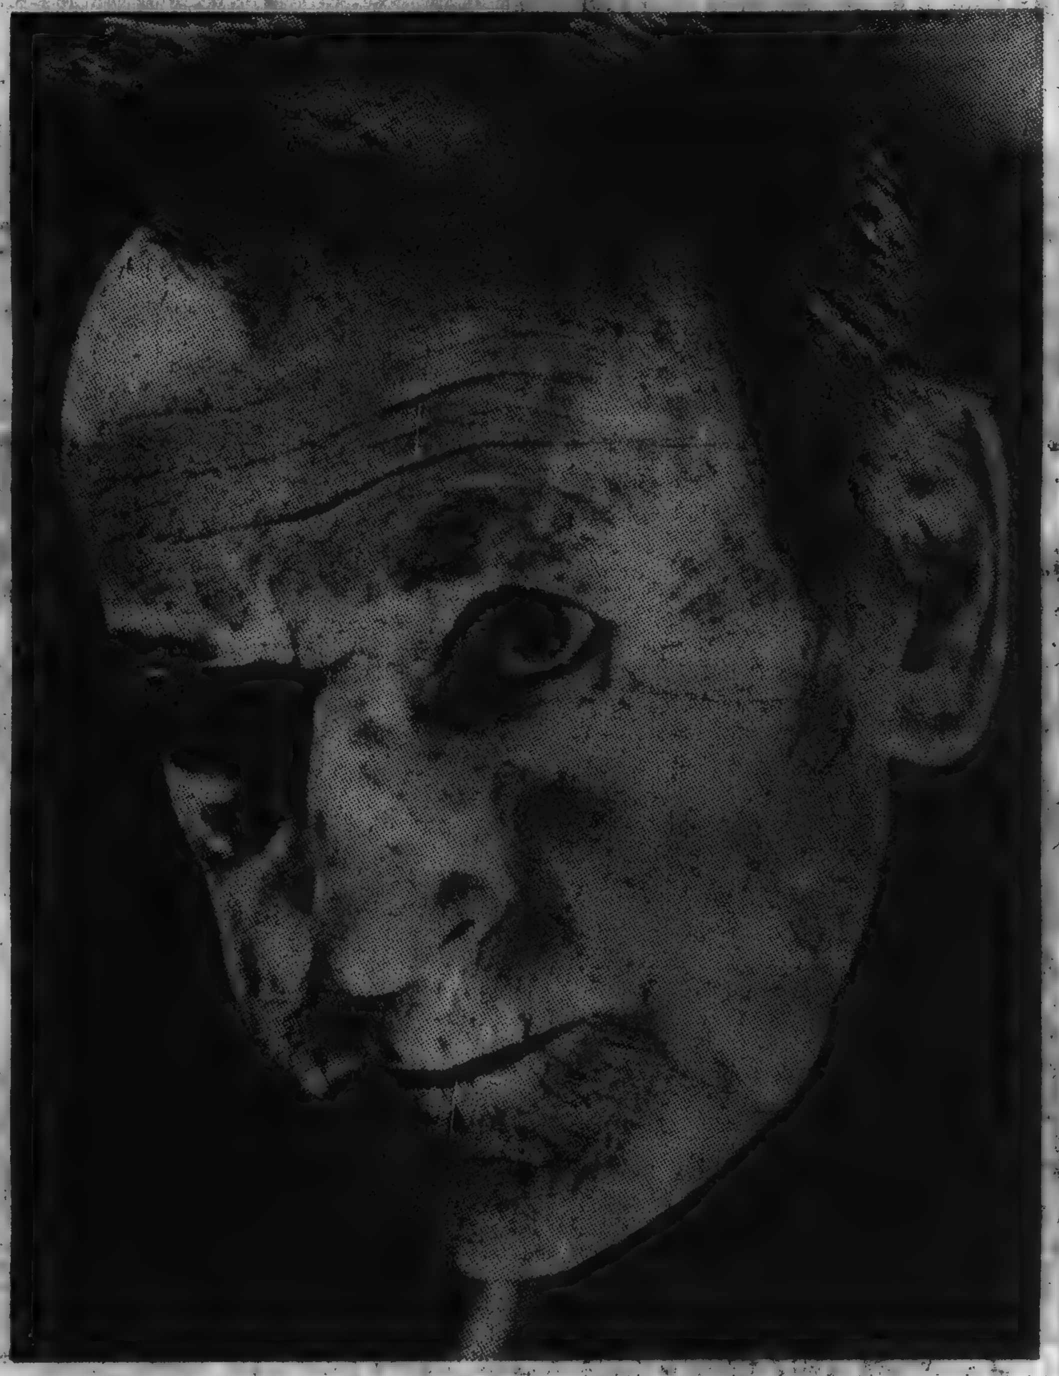
In 1906 he made his first visit to the United States at the invitation of Henry Lee Higginson, the eminent banker and music patron, who freely gave of his wealth to insure an unexcelled orchestra for Boston. Dr. Muck did not disappoint his patron either. He was the musical martinet of popular imagination—a tall, skinny drill sergeant who could fell an antagonist with a single baleful glance. He rehearsed his men unmercifully, he insulted and browbeat them, but like every great conductor, he drove himself twice as hard as he did his subordinates. The organization which he produced approached perfection.

Now, Muck was a thoroughgoing German by birth, temperament and tradition, but his father had become a citizen of Switzerland when Karl was a child, and Dr. Muck regarded himself as a naturalized Swiss. When he returned to America in 1915, after his summer vacation, the World war was in its second year and Muck was interviewed about his opinions and observations of the European panorama. He declared bluntly that he could not believe the Germans perpetrated the Belgian "atrocities" which had been charged, and he further announced that, as an artist and not a statesman, he was maintaining a strict public neutrality. Privately, however, he was not so discreet. It was fairly well understood that he favored the German cause and he certainly did not deny any sympathy with his native land.

* * *

When America entered the war in 1917, Dr. Muck's position was none too comfortable, obviously. He promptly offered to resign his Boston position, but Maj. Higginson refused to accept the resignation. "To quit is a sign of weakness," Higginson argued. "Carry on with your conducting, show them that art has no connection with politics." Muck was persuaded to continue his work, but his misgivings were well founded.

At a concert which his Boston orchestra played in Providence, R. I., Oct. 30, 1917, Muck declined to play "The Star Spangled Banner" on the ground that the music was unworthy of a place on a symphonic program. Civic and patriotic groups and individuals made capital of the refusal. So Higginson advised Muck to play the American anthem at the next concert of the Bostonians and Muck complied. Waggishly, he interpolated some counterpoint from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser." The audience did not understand the subtle insult and cheered the performance. But the obdurate Muck refused to turn to the audience to acknowledge the applause, and the hearers' enthusiasm was swiftly changed to anger. The next day Muck again implored Higginson to let him resign, but the major was firm in his refusal.



Dr. Karl Muck, Wagnerian conductor, who died recently in Germany

Four days later the Baltimore police ordered cancellation of a concert there by Muck's orchestra, and Baltimore citizens held a meeting to denounce the conductor. According to David Ewen, the young musicologist who has made a close study of Muck's "American tragedy," Gov. Warfield of Maryland actually asserted that "no true American could remain satisfied until Muck had been mobbed to death."

By that time the chorus of defamation had become a constant roar—Muck was violently pro-German, Muck was a secret German agent, Muck was a friend of the kaiser, Muck was sending his money to Germany to aid it in prosecuting the war, etc., etc. Even the gentle Walter Damrosch upbraided his colleague over "The Star Spangled Banner" controversy. "The explanation that Dr. Muck gives in the newspapers is cowardly and evades the real issue. He says, 'Why will people be so silly? Art is a thing by itself and not related to any particular nation or group. Therefore it would be a gross mistake, a violation of artistic taste and principles, for such an organization as ours to play patriotic airs.' He chooses to ignore the fact that the national anthem is the symbol of our patriotism and loyalty, and that even though he is an 'enemy alien,' the Boston symphony should be, most decidedly, an American organization."

* * *

After a few months of such attacks, even Maj. Higginson bowed and announced that Dr. Muck would resign at the close of the season. Late in March, 1918, while the director was preparing the majestic "St. Matthew's Passion" of Bach for the final concert, federal officers went to his home at night and arrested him on charges of being an unregistered enemy alien. Muck protested that he was a citizen of Switzerland and therefore not required to register as a German. Nevertheless he was held in jail for 11 days until the department of justice at Washington announced that Muck had been found guilty of "espionage" and was to be interned at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., during the war.

The conductor remained a prisoner for more than a year and in the summer of 1919 was deported.

For several years thereafter he was unable, physically or temperamentally, to work, but when he did resume conducting, at Hamburg and Bayreuth and the other musical centers, he displayed all of his former genius and energy. He made his last public appearance at Leipzig, in 1933, for the observance of the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner.

His countrymen did not forget him in the years of retirement. Only a few months ago, when he reached his eightieth birthday, the chancellor bestowed the order of the German eagle upon him, with a commendation "to the great conductor."

WALTER MONFRIED

THIS CLIPPING FROM

CHRISTIAN CENTURY
CHICAGO, ILL
3/20/40

Kark Muck, Alien But Not Enemy

WHEN Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, died a few days ago, memories were revived of the strange excitement which raged about him in the days of the World War, and especially after we got into it. Dr. Muck was, of course, a German by birth and training, and he had become one of the most famous conductors in the world before he was brought to Boston. He was especially celebrated as an interpreter of Wagner and his work at the Beyreuth festivals had given him eminence. As the war psychosis began to work on us and Germanophobia became epidemic, suspicion pointed to Dr. Muck for no other reason than that he was a German. Then came the day when, having been requested to end a concert by playing "The Star-Spangled Banner," he was said to have "refused." Anyway, it was not played. A furor arose. This German so-and-so takes American money, occupies a place that some good American ought to have, and refuses to play our national anthem! From that it was not a long step to his internment as an alien enemy, though it took some time to make it. It was assisted by the vigorous urgency of some of our most eminent and respected religious and civic leaders. After the armistice he returned to Germany and never came back, though he retired from public life when the nazis came to power and pure art became, in his judgment, impossible in Germany. But about that "refusal" to play the national anthem. The real facts were disclosed not long ago. The request did not come to Dr. Muck but to the president of the Boston orchestral association. The president, feeling that the selection was not in harmony with the classical program which it was to close, and that patriotism did not depend upon such demonstrations, pocketed the request and said nothing about it. The first Dr. Muck ever heard of it was when the howl arose, and even then he did not at first know what it was about. After he had learned, he regularly played "The Star-Spangled Banner" at the close of his concerts. The incident is instructive, and especially just now when we are in danger of repeating some of the forgotten follies of twenty years ago.

3

MILLERTON, N.Y.
NEWS
3/21/40

Quick Response To Tanglewood Series

The third week's series of concerts to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor, has already met with a remarkable response, according to a report today from the trustees. The season has been extended this year from two to three weeks. That the Festival's concerts at Tanglewood (between Lenox and Stockbridge) will have an unusual appeal not only because of the programs but because of world conditions is indicated by early applications for subscriptions. Advance reservations for all nine concerts show that the Festival Shed has been sold out at this date to a third of its capacity.

Similarly the orchestra reports enthusiastic interest in its Berkshire Music Center opening at Tanglewood, July 8, and continuing through the period of the concerts, the first three weeks in August.

Recently the Festival mailed announcements concerning the third week of concerts to all its members. Already more than half have responded and a third of them have indicated their desire to avail themselves of the membership privilege for the third week. The greatest number want at least the first two weeks while the percentage of those desiring all three weeks is just slightly less. Similar percentages apply to those making application for subscriptions.

During the opening week of the Festival the programs will include works by Beethoven, Schumann, Sibelius, Schubert, Brahms, Prokofieff, Ravel, Stravinsky and Roy Harris.

For the second week there will be a Tchaikovsky Festival celebrating the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. Arthur Rodzinski will conduct one of the programs. Albert Spalding will be a soloist at another.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAR 24 1940

Two Boston benefits loom on the current horizon, both of them a considerable cut above the usual hodge-podge charity show. The first comes tomorrow night in Symphony Hall, to aid the Four French War Charities. Dr. Koussevitsky will direct an ensemble of players from his orchestra. Lily Pons will sing pieces by Faure, Debussy, Ravel and other French composers, and George Copeland will play, among other items, a few of the Debussy interpretations for which he is famed far and wide.

◆ ◆ ◆

The other benefit (peering dimly into the future) occurs Sunday afternoon and evening, April 21. Then, for the Boston Symphony's Pension Fund, the orchestra will combine with the voices of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society in their celebrated performance of the Bach B-minor Mass—the "Gone With the Wind" of music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, O.
NEWS

MAR 23 1940

MUSIC IN AMERICA

Westward is the path of music. The mystical chants of ancient Asia found nobler expression in the choral arrangements of the Periclean Athenians. Music coming to western Europe culminated 2000 years later in the operas and symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt, Bach, Schubert, Weber, Mozart, Chopin and many others. The opera houses and orchestra halls of Vienna, Dresden, Paris and London reechoed with the music of the masters during the Eighteenth century. The Nineteenth century saw the formation of such notable symphonic orchestras in the United States as the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony Co. and the Philadelphia Philharmonic.

Speaking recently of the history of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Edward Johnson pointed out that the political disorder, the social disintegration and the economic chaos of Europe have driven the best musical talent to our shores. Music needs comparative calm and leisure to flourish. In a continent torn by war and disorder with racial persecutions, goose-stepping and concentration camps, music fades. What Europe has been losing these past few years has been America's gain.

Since the close of the World War of 1914-1918, symphony concert activities have increased three or fourfold in this country. The 16 largest companies operate under budgets ranging from $120,000 to $750,000 each annually. During the season of 1937-38 these 16 companies gave 1300 concerts with a visible audience numbering nearly 3,000,000 persons. These figures do not, of course, include the radio audience, which in the case of the New York Philharmonic alone, totals around 10,000,000 weekly.

Beethoven continues to be the most popular composer, followed closely by Wagner. Brahms, who at one time could hardly hold an audience, now ranks third, followed closely by Bach. Since the Russian invasion of Finland, Sibelius has been rapidly gaining in popular esteem, while Tschaikowsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff fell off Strauss, father and son, Debussy and Schubert are holding their own in favor.

Doubtless America will be the chief center of the best music for the next few generations at least. Our heritage in this respect has been rich, and events in Europe indicate that we can expect to be the custodians of the compositions of the great masters. That we are taking our stewardship seriously is reflected in the fact that through the medium of the radio more people are hearing the great operas and symphonies than at any other time in the history of music.

LEONIA, N.J
NORTH JERSEY LIFE
3/29/40

Concert Ends Rutgers Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky, will make its sixth annual appearance on the program of the Rutgers Concert Series in the Rutgers Gymnasium, Wednesday night, April 3, at 8:30. The famed Symphony's performance will close the 24th annual Rutgers Series.

Works of three outstanding composers, Mozart, Beethoven and Tschaikowsky, comprise the program to be offered. Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" will open the evening, followed by Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Opus 60. Following the intermission, Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Opus 64, will conclude the concert.

One of the most famous musical organizations in the world, the Poston Symphony has become the outstanding feature of the Rutgers series. The Rutgers Series is the only one in New Jersey on which the Boston organization appears annually. In 1937, the University conferred upon its conductor, Dr. Koussevitsky, the honorary degree of Doctor of Music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

MAR 24 1940

New York Symphony Expands

New York, March 23.—(AP)

THE NEW YORK Philharmonic-Symphony has announced an expanded tour of 17 successive concerts for next autumn.

The orchestra, under John Barbirolli, will open the tour on Nov. 18 in York, Pa., and close on Dec. 5 in Springfield, Mass. In between, concerts will be given in Baltimore, Toledo, Chicago, Milwaukee, Ann Arbor, Saginaw, Lansing, Fort Wayne, Cincinnati, Columbus, Pittsburgh, Washington, Providence and Boston.

As previously announced, while the orchestra is in Chicago, the Chicago Symphony, under Dr. Frederick Stock, will give two concerts at Carnegie Hall in New York. The exchange is part of the celebration of the golden jubilee tour of the Chicago orchestra.

The Philharmonic also has four other out-of-town dates in addition to the tour—at Princeton University on Oct. 26; Philadelphia on March 13; Hartford, April 14, and at Yale University at New Haven on April 15. It will mark the orchestra's first appearance at Yale since 1927.

+ + +

THE ANNUAL Berkshire Symphonic Festival, to be held this summer at Tanglewood (between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass.), is looking forward to one of its best seasons.

By mid-March, early applications for advance reservations had been sold to one-third of capacity. The season has been extended from two weeks to three, comprising the first three weeks of August.

During the opening week of the festival, the programs will include works by Beethoven, Schumann, Sibelius, Schubert, Brahms, Prokofieff, Ravel, Stravinsky and Roy Harris.

For the second week there will be a Tschaikovsky festival, celebrating the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. Artur Rodzinski will conduct one of the programs and Albert Spalding, violinist, will be soloist on another.

Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, will appear with the orchestra the third week. The programs will include works by Brahms, Haydn, Wagner, Hindemith, and Bach's B-minor mass with the festival chorus of the Berkshire Music Center.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will conduct the festival as usual.

+ + +

THIS CLIPPING FROM
YONKERS, N. Y.
YONKERS RECORD

MAR 29 1940

We Can All Enjoy Classical Music

THE mistaken idea of the "difficulty" of symphonic form and fear of classical music have kept many individuals from a richer enjoyment of life, in the opinion of Oscar Levant, famous musician and composer, who writes a music 'clinic' for Good Housekeeping Magazine.

In the April issue of the magazine, Mr. Levant discusses the comparative methods used by modern composers and the methods of such well-known impressionists as Debussy, Ravel and Strauss. For example, he points out two of the most popular songs of the past year, "My Reverie" and "The Lamp Is Low." The former was based on a Debussy piano piece and the latter is lifted almost literally from Ravel's Pavan for a Dead Princess.

Records recommended by Mr. Levant for those who would like to build a music library and learn to understand as they build include Serge Koussevitzky's direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Beethoven's Second Symphony, Gieseking's recording of Reverie, and the orchestral version of the Ravel Pavan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 25 1940

MUSIC FOR BRIDE

BOSTON, March 25.—Igor Stravinsky, Russian composer, who will be guest conductor with Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown here playing for his bride of two weeks, the former Vera de Bosset Sudeikine. (Associated Press Photo.)

Says It Is Easy To Handle Genius

BOSTON, March 25 (INS) — "It's easy to handle genius." take it from Mrs. Igor Stravinsky, bride of the Russian conductor-composer and Harvard University lecturer on poetry, "You can do it with love and goodness—and a nice jucy steak."

Igor loves "guillade" — that's the French word for a grilled steak, according to Mrs. Stravinsky.

The couple was honeymooning in a Boston hotel today following their marriage two weeks ago at the home of Dr. and Mrs. T. A. Taracouzio in Bedford.

They met for the first time in Paris 20 years ago, though their families had been friendly for years before that at St. Petersburg, Russia. At that time, Mrs. Stravinsky was Vera de Bosset Sudeikine, wife of a Russian painter. Stravinsky was also married, but his wife died more than a year ago and when he met Vera again shortly afterward she was divorced. Mrs. Stravinsky came to this country two months ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PLAINSFIELD, N. J.
COURIER-NEWS

MAR 30 1940

Boston Symphony At Rutgers Wednesday

The fifth and final event of the Rutgers University Concert Series will take place Wednesday evening at 8:30 o'clock in the Rutgers Gymnasium, when Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to New Brunswick for the sixth year in succession. These concerts are the only ones this famous musical organization ever plays in New Jersey. In 1937, Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Music upon the orchestra's eminent conductor.

Works of three classic composers (Mozart, Beethoven, and Tchaikowsky) will comprise Dr. Koussevitsky's program on Wednesday—Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major Opus 60; and Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor.

This will be the second symphonic program presented in Rutgers' 24th annual series of major concerts. The season was opened last October by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy. These concerts are directed by Dr. Howard D. McKinney, head of the music department.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

MAR 29 1940

Tschaikowsky Centenary to Be Observed; Mozart, Beethoven Works Also Scheduled

Two symphonies and one of the most popular overtures of the classical period will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday night in its appearance at the Rutgers Gymnasium in the final presentation of the University Concert Series. The concert, closing the 24th annual series, will start at 8:30 p. m.

"The Marriage of Figaro" overture by Mozart will open the concert. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony will follow and the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky will complete the concert. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, world - renowned conductor, will direct the orchestra in its sixth appearance on the Rutgers Series.

The Mozart overture has gained much popularity among music-lovers in recent years and its brilliant styling has placed it on many concert programs. Dr. Koussevitzky has selected it for the local concert because of the demand for its presentation.

Beethoven's Fourth is making a surprise appearance on the program. The symphony has been played very seldom and very little is known of its history. Written in B-flat, the number's four movements present a much lighter, humorous and romantic Beethoven than is usually found in his more profound works.

Dr. Koussevitzky is considered among the greatest interpreters of Tschaikowsky music and the Fifth Symphony, written in E-minor, is certain to prove the favorite of the evening. The 100th anniversary celebration of the noted Russian composer this year has stimulated interest in the nationalistic music of his era and the Fifth, played by the Boston Symphony, has been amon the highlights of the musical season.

A few tickets for the concert are still on sale, according to officials at the Rutgers Music House, but all are expected to be sold before the night of the concert.

Local music patrons will be getting their first sight in two years of Dr. Koussevitsky on the Rutgers series, even though the orchestra played here last year. The noted conductor was taken ill a few hours before last year's concert and the assistant conductor led the group through a distinguished concert.

Although Wednesday's concert is the final official presentation of the series, a special concert April 15 has drawn almost a sell-out advance sale. Nelson Eddy, noted radio, movie and concert baritone, will make his only metropolitan appearance of the year at that time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 30 1940

Boston Symphony to Give Final Concert of Season Here, Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will give its fifth and final Brooklyn concert of the season, next Friday evening, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, beginning at 8:30 o'clock. Included on its program will be: Symphony No. 1 in C maor, Op. 21, Beethoven; Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" (Second Suite), Ravel, and Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetique," Op. 74, Tchaikovsky.

The Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and a Brooklyn committee. On the Tuesday afternoon preceding this concert, a discussion of the progra mwill be held by Jonathan Schiller, lecturer in music at the Institute, who will speak in the lecture hall of the Brooklyn Academy of Music beginning at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAR 31 1940

At the end of March, the Boston Symphony managers looked over the advance reservations for next August's Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Tanglewood and found them booked more than one-third of capacity. The moral is obvious.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CARTHAGE, MO.
DEMOCRAT

MAR 30 1940

TODAY'S PROFILE
(By United Press)

In the study of his suburban home stands a bass viol and Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, once Europe's greatest virtuoso, is unable to play it.

With tears in his eyes the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra explains that he has been so busy for the past five years that he scarcely touches the instrument.

Generally conceded to be the country's leading symphonic conductor, Koussevitzky has trained his 110 players until they came to be known as the nation's finest orchestra. He joined the orchestra in 1924 and raised it from the musical doldrums with sharp, quick criticisms that brought fine playing as a response.

Born in Russia 76 years ago, Koussevitzky went to Moscow when a boy and won a scholarship for instruction on the bass viol. After becoming a virtuoso, he serenaded Natalya Konstantinova on the instrument. He later married her and she helped finance an orchestra for him to conduct. Until 1920 Koussevitzky stayed in Russia. Then he came to America because he was out of sympathy with the Bolsheviks.

The preliminary work of the Boston Symphony is done by Koussevitzky in his study. Music litters the room, standing in stacks on the piano, tables and bureau. Diplomas and citations cover the walls.

Koussevitzky sits in an easy chair before a music stand to study the score of forthcoming concerts. However well he knews the music he is going to conduct, he always rehearses at home before he rehearses the orchestra.

At actual performances the haughty, gray-haired Russian is distinguished in appearance in his dress clothes. At rehearsals, however, he becomes a tyrant hunching over in an old sweater, shouting, singing and waving frantically with his baton.

"You must zing," she shouts, "you must blay." His word is law because he can discharge members at will.

One legend says that Koussevitzky became disgusted with the sour notes one musician played. "You are fired. Ged out. Ged out!" the exasperated conducted shouted.

After the rehearsal the musician opened Koussevitzky's dressing room door and bellowed, "Nuts to you, Koussevitzky."

The conductor turned his head slowly and then snapped, "Ged out. It's too lat to abologize."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

MAR 30 1940

Boston Symphony Ends Local Series Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give its last three concerts of the season here next week, playing at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, and at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday evening.

Dr. Koussevitzky will celebrate the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Tchaikovsky by playing one of that composer's symphonies on each of the programs.

Thursday evening's program, at Carnegie Hall, lists the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven and the "Pathetique" Symphony of Tchaikovsky. Saturday afternoon's program offers the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven and the Fifth of Tchaikovsky.

In Brooklyn Friday evening, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the First Symphony of Beethoven, the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," and the "Pathetique" Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
B'klyn. Section

MAR 31 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL CLOSE SEASON

Final Brooklyn Concert to Be Given Friday Night at the Academy

MUSIC PROJECT CURTAILED

WPA Activities to Be Cut From 17 to 3 Centers Because of Reduced Funds

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is conductor, will give a concert Friday night in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program will consist of Beethoven's symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21; Ravel's orchestral excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" (second suite) and Tchaikovsky's symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetique," Op. 74.

The event is the fifth and final concert of the orchestra in Brooklyn this season. The series is under the sponsorship of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society and a local committee.

Preceding the concert, on Tuesday at 4 P. M., Jonathan Schiller, lecturer in music at the Institute, will discuss the program at the Academy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 30 1940

(4)

A Tchaikovsky Anniversary

Approaching Centenary of Composer's Birth and the Reaction That Failed.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Though no world commotion is to be expected because of the impending centenary of the birth of Tchaikovsky, the date of May 7 will not pass unnoticed. Already we find the B flat minor piano concerto being played by Vladimir Horowitz at tonight's and tomorrow afternoon's concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony in "commemoration" of an anniversary that is five weeks away. Serge Koussevitzky will play a Tchaikovsky symphony at each of his Carnegie Hall concerts next week.

But neither the concerto nor the symphonies stand in need of the anniversary, much less a "Tchaikovsky year." Some service might be done Tchaikovsky's memory by performing works that figure only occasionally on our concert programs—we ought all to be better acquainted with the symphonic fantasy, "Francesca da Rimini" and the "Manfred" Symphony—but two things are obvious. Tchaikovsky is in no sense a neglected composer. The music which the public hears from season to season is his best and his most typical.

Beyond these is another consideration of continuing importance. The great reaction against the too-popular Tchaikovsky has missed fire. Probably it never did cut very deep. Sophisticates did the talking, theorists the writing. But audiences went right on listening, as they are listening today. It takes no special gift of prophecy and no unusual fund of courage to be able to say that those Tchaikovsky works which have held the ear of the world for half a century are here to stay. Even the hit-smiths of the popular-song sweatshops cannot kill them by reducing their melodic appeal to the lowest common denominator.

Qualities Readily Discerned.

The anniversary may prompt sundry "re-valuations." But are revaluations of Tchaikovsky's better known works really in order? Aren't the reasons for their continued success precisely what they were when the world first came to know the worth of these compositions? There is the perennial platitude about Tchaikovsky wearing his heart on his sleeve. His music wears its virtues there, even more plainly than it does its faults. And all the dither about the faults can never obscure, for those who can accept what is obvious in the virtues, the causes for the continued vitality and appeal of Tchaikovsky in the concert room.

It may be that some new chapter will have to be written about the operas; that is, two or three of them. America, at least, has had no real opportunity to hear them for what they are. But the relatively humble Russian performances away from the Metropolitan have done something to correct erroneous notions about "Eugen Onegin" and "Pique Dame."

The Italian production of the one and the German of the other were Metropolitan misfits which left Russian opera just where it had been before, save as they may have prejudiced subscribers against it. Though some were miscast, the fault was not primarily with the singers—Muzio, Martinelli, De Luca and Didur in the "Eugen Onegin" of 1920; Slezak, Meitschik, Destinn and Didur in the "Pique Dame" of 1910. It was in the Italian or Germanic approach. Tchaikovsky has suffered much from the charge that musically he is not to be considered a Russian. Mussorgsky's "Boris Godounoff" is weakened less by translation and for the very reason that the music cannot be made falsely Italianate, whereas that of "Eugen Onegin" can.

The Element of Ballet.

There is no need, however, to build a case for Tchaikovsky on works that may not as yet have come into their just due in our or some other quarter of the world. True, a wider knowledge of little performed scores might tend to show that the tags of "hysteria" and "morbidity" can be attached at most to only a handful of Tchaikovsky's many compositions, the opus numbers of which run into the seventies. The cheerful Tchaikovsky of the ballets is quite as much a personality as the fateful Tchaikovsky of the last three symphonies. "Swan Lake," "The Sleeping Beauty" and "Casse-Noisette" remain among the most distinctive ballet scores of their type; certainly they vie with those of Delibes and any other French composer of the period, not only in their musical quality but in their suitability for the mimetic stage.

Some, or many, may agree with the English commentator who said that the "element of ballet music, of luscious melody and piquant rhythm and flavor, is at the heart of all Tchaikovsky's work." The critical Taneieff complained of the Fourth Symphony that "in every movement there are phrases that sound like ballet music." In this connection it has been noted that the pizzicato scherzo of the Fourth Symphony was written shortly after Tchaikovsky had made the acquaintance of the score of Delibes's "Sylvia." Moreover, Tchaikovsky cited that work as an example of good music written for ballet when he undertook to reply to Taneieff.

Taneieff's shaft may have hit the mark. But if so, to what end? Certainly not to prove hysteria or morbidity, or still uglier inferences drawn from "Beloved Friend." There is, of course, ballet music and ballet music, as there are symphonies and symphonies. Without his ballets, Stravinsky would have been a much less striking figure in the concert room. "Firebird," "Petrushka" and "Le Sacre du Printemps," more than anything written directly for concert purposes, have given him his position as a composer of "symphonic" music. The suites from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" certainly are not scorned because they are ballet music. Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune" would have possessed precisely the same qualities as music if Nijinsky's dance scheme had preceded rather than followed the composition of the symphonic prelude.

Content and Form.

Aside from this cry of "ballet," and with it one of "banality," the long-standing charge against Tchaikovsky's better-known works is that they suffer from lack of form. With his sometimes unfortunate but often winning candor, Tchaikovsky himself provided ammunition for his enemies by writing to Mme. von Meck that he had always had great difficulty in making the form of his works correspond with the content. The seams, he said, always showed. And he was ready to admit that the structures he contrived would never be exemplary; the essential qualities of his musical nature might be improved, he said, but they could not be completely altered. The French, in particular, seem to have taken Tchaikovsky at his word, rejecting his symphonies as lacking in form, at the same time that they approved and accepted works by Rimsky-Korsakoff and other Russians that were much more free in form, making no pretense, in fact, to being symphonies.

But today there is a body of practical scholarship that has a different conception of form than that which prevailed at the time Tchaikovsky was making his perhaps mistaken confessions. If it is now to be contended that the content must in many cases determine the form, is there not reason to turn to Tchaikovsky as one of those composers for whom this was true? Does the fact that some of his movements are episodic defeat the symphonies? Do the "seams" seriously hinder the communication of the musical and emotional message? Do not the melodies state their case, if anything even too readily and openly for all to hear? Does the drama stumble in the building of those climaxes that audiences love and professors decry? Is there ever a feeling that inspiration has been choked off for want of breathing space?

Harmony was not Tchaikovsky's strength; neither was the sort of development that grows out of harmonic mastery. But in his clear, lustrous and thoroughly appropriate scoring—scoring which may be regarded today as much more logical and more inevitable than Rimsky's parade of coloristic devices—he has given his symphonic melodies a voice that is eminently right and as eminently their own. Tchaikovsky's own era produced greater composers, but none more essentially musical.

6

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 31 1940

OPERA FUND'S RISE GRATIFIES SLOAN

Campaign Stands at $733,906 With $247,402 Donated by Radio Audience

The Metropolitan Opera Fund announced yesterday that $733,906 had been raised toward the $1,000,000 sought to purchase the opera house and advance the interest in opera. George A. Sloan, campaign manager, disclosed that of the total money raised $247,402 had come in contributions from the radio audience.

"The status of the fund," Mr. Sloan declared, "shows a gratifying response to our appeal. While the number of contributions is great, it must be borne in mind that twenty-two large gifts, each one in excess of $5,000, now account for approximately 33 per cent of the total which has been raised.

"In order that we may meet success in this endeavor and assure future years of opera on an increasingly high standard, it is essential that we have not only a large number of contributions but that we have numerous large gifts from the friends of opera who are able to give substantially."

An analysis of contributions, exclusive of radio gifts, shows:

One gift of $73,357.
Ten gifts of $10,000 to $24,999, amounting to $112,000.
Eleven gifts of $5,000 to $9,999, amounting to $59,000.
Nine gifts of $2,500 to $4,999, amounting to $25,500.
Fifty gifts of $1,000 to $2,499, amounting to $74,205.
540 gifts of $100 to $999, amounting to $97,686.
5,239 gifts of less than $100, amounting to $44,756.

It was disclosed also that Mrs. Sarah Delano Roosevelt, mother of the President, had joined the committee of honorary patronesses for the preview of the Italian film, "The Life of Giuseppe Verdi," on Tuesday evening at the Fine Arts Theatre, Fifty-eighth Street and Seventh Avenue. The proceeds of the performance will be turned over to the fund.

In an address over the NBC-WJZ network during the intermission of "Die Walkuere" from the opera house in Boston, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, asserted that "the future of opera in America will be stable if a permanent home is provided for the Metropolitan Opera Company, to which we all owe a debt of gratitude for all the joy, beauty and perfection it has brought to the American public for many decades, and for holding the standards of operatic art so high."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 31 1940

A Week's Events At the Academy

Boston Symphony to Give Final Concert on Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give its fifth and final Brooklyn concert of the season Friday at 8:30 p.m. in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Included on its program will be: Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21, Beethoven; orchestral excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" (Second Suite), Ravel, and Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetique," Op. 74, Tchaikovsky.

The Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn commitee.

On Tuesday afternoon at 4 o'clock a discussion of the program will be held at the Academy by Jonathan Schiller, lecturer in music at the institute and director of the RCA Victor lecture bureau.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

MAR 31 1940

Brooklyn Academy

Institute Sponsors Seven Events During Coming Month

Seven events are scheduled for this month at the Brooklyn Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Dr. Felix Guenther, of Queens College, will conduct the Chamber Music Society of New York tomorrow. On Tuesday afternoon at 4 o'clock Jonathan Schiller will lecture on the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussvitzky's direction on Friday night in the last concert of its 1939-'40 Brooklyn series.

Next week, on Wednesday night, April 10, the Eva Jessye Choir and twelve Negro dancers will take part in a Negro folk festival. Elie Siegmeister will conduct the American Ballard Singers in a concert sponsored by the Flatbush Arts Theater on Saturday night, April 20. The Tollefsen Trio will play works of Brahms, Eugene Goossens and Schumann Sunday afternoon, April 21, and the Brooklyn Civic Orchestra will be heard uder Dr. Paul Kosok's direction on Saturday night, April 27.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 31 1940

Boston Symphony's Final Concert to Be on Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fifth and final concert of the current season in the opera house at the Academy of Music on Friday evening.

Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince and Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clarke H. Woodward will be among the boxholders as well as the Adelphi Academy Alumnae, the Brooklyn Woman's Club and the Brooklyn Girl Scouts.

The program to be presented under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will include Beethoven's Symphony No. 1, orchestral excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" and Tchaikovsky's symphony, "Pathetiqué."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are in their 54th season in Brooklyn and are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Art sand Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which R. Huntington Woodman is president and the Brooklyn Committee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

MAR 31 1940

American Composers Should Not Grumble

Englishman Benjamin Britten, Writing in the New York Times, Finds That Native Creative Workers Are Given Far Greater Opportunity Than Their Contemporaries the Other Side of the Atlantic

IN APRIL of last year, I left England on a vacation trip across the Atlantic, a vacation rather from the general European atmosphere than from overwork, writes Benjamin Britten in the New York Times.

I spent two months in Canada, and since last August have been chiefly in and around New York with occasional visits to the Middle West. I have found this country enormously stimulating, and, as I have met many of the chief figures in American music today, I have had perhaps as good an opportunity as most foreigners of comparing conditions in this country with those in their own.

There has been in these columns recently a lot of correspondence about American music and the treatment of American composers. It has been the chief topic of conversation in many musical circles to which I have been introduced, and it has been the subject of many articles and essays.

Let me say straightaway that, in my opinion, the American composer has little to grumble at; compared with English composers, nothing. Whatever struggle American music may have had in the past for its fair share of public recognition, today the composer here, compared with his English brother even in normal times, has a very rosy prospect.

In the first place, as far as I can see, there does not exist in the minds of most audiences here the deadening distinction, so common in England, between "music" and "contemporary music." This in part may have been caused by the British Broadcasting corporation's mistaken policy of giving a full-sized concert once a month by music of contemporary composers (generally of the most formidable and unattractive kind); and with this gesture, having done its duty to "contemporary music," it returns with a sigh of relief to the normal programs of "music."

This distinction has been aggravated by the modern music enthusiasts themselves, who have not always been very discriminating in their praise, and have made the same mistake of giving entire concerts of modern music. This, separating as it does the two audiences, is obviously fatal. Contemporary music should take its place in concert programs side by side with the well-tried masterpieces; it should be judged solely on its merits as music.

American audiences appear to be less prejudiced in this respect than English ones. Most of the symphonic programs include a 20th-century work, and the halls do not seem to be any the less full. American composers should be very definitely helped by this attitude, in their efforts to be heard, and, to judge from the concert and radio columns of the Sunday papers, it is undoubtedly the case.

Since the beginning of the season, modern music generally has been continually broadcast, and American music in particular has received outstanding encouragement from such festivals as the one organized by ASCAP and, more recently by WNYC, as well as the fine concerts of American music given by Dr Koussevitzky. The programs of the Boston and New York Symphony orchestras contain American works, as do the programs of the symphonic bodies all over the country.

In England, too, there is no such organization as the WPA, which, according to the press, has performed 7332 American compositions by 2258 native or resident composers! I wish that the American musician could see the program of the BBC Symphony, the London Philharmonic orchestra and the London Symphony orchestra. He would not think himself so hardly used.

White Hairs Needed

Generally speaking, unless one has become a national institution (process which requires many white hairs and 40 years of being snubbed and rejected), one is limited for performances of new works to the London branch of the I. S. C. M., with its few concerts a year and exclusively highbrow audience; to occasional semiamateur performances organized by well-meaning but often inefficient enthusiasts, or to very infrequent and strangely timed radio performances, few of which reach the general concert-going public.

Here the composer has a chance of obtaining commissions from radio and phonograph companies. In England these are even rarer than chromatic timps. Here there are private fellowships; I know of nothing of the kind in England. In America perhaps the printing of modern music has lagged behind performances, and in this respect the publishers seem scarcely to have realized that a printed work stands a much better chance of establishing itself in the regular repertory than a sometimes illegible score, and parts that may not have been too well copied and have been thumbed and blue-penciled from Boston to Los Angeles.

Phonograph companies on this side have been much more enterprising, and many works by the not so old have been "disked" and many are to come. On the other side of the Atlantic, the great publishing houses automatically issue a few contemporary scores each year, but to be recorded is for most composers a rare privilege.

All this is not to say that the struggle of the young and unknown composer is not often heartbreakingly difficult here as everywhere. But I am sure that his opportunities are greater in this country than in any other country in the world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

MAR 31 1940

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The 21st pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place a week from this coming Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 12-13, when the orchestra will have returned from its last visit of the season to New York. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the 21st programme with Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," and will follow the overture with a performance of the Fourth Symphony in A minor by Sibelius. This symphony, accounted one of the most significant by the Finnish master, has not been heard at these concerts for several years. The programme will close with the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert, and Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

c to Mount Greylock with "Tanglewood" in the Foreground choral work; third, a piano composition and fourth, a composition for violin and piano. There will also be a contest in voice and piano for young men and women from 18 to 25 years of age. All test numbers in both voice and piano must be by American composers and vocal numbers must be sung in English. Eligibility for both contests requires United States citizenship, either native or naturalized and one year's residence in the state. The winners will be presented at the festival in May.

240 CENTRAL Park South is the address of the latest building venture in the music center of New York. Overlooking Central Park and Columbus Circle and extending through the entire block covering Broadway and 58th Street this new 28-story structure will be the ideal home for musicians. Of training until she was in her teens. Now, however, she has a beautiful voice which will soon attract attention. These interesting evenings which Mme. Chalia, former Metropolitan Opera Star presents, are very advantageous to young sing- who wish to be heard under the per conditions.

TANGLEWOOD

home of the Berkshire Sym- nic Festival, is a perfect setting the Summer program now un- taken by the Boston Symphony chestra under the able direction Serge Koussevitzky. Offering a que opportunity for a summer work and music this new center designed to lay special empha- upon those aspects of musical ication concerned with collect- performance. Active participa- in the student orchestra choruses, chamber music and operatic groups will offer the means of acquiring a working knowledge of music as it is written, conducted, played and sung. Students who enrole in the various courses will have an opportunity to study under a faculty of renowned musicians and in addition ,the Boston Symphony will be there for a series of concerts beginning Aug. 1st.

The Berkshire Music Shed is a unique attraction and its seating capacity of 6000 is usually well filled. Tanglewood was presented to the orchestra in 1937 and is now the musical center of New England during the summer.

GLADYS SWARTHOUT will sing the title role in Bizet's Carmen on Fri. afternoon, Mar. 15, at the Meropolitan Opera House. This will be a benefit for the Henry Street Settlement Music School. Miss Swarthout has not been heard at the Met. since she sang "Mignon" two seasons ago. Ezio Pinza and Giovanni Martinelli will sing the two principal male roles and Licia Albanese will sing Micaela. Miss Swarthout made an appearance as Carmen last Summer with the Cincinnatti Zoo Opera Company. This appearance at the Metropolitan is only one of the busiest concert and opera season of her career.

Spencer B. Driggs.

SEVENTH ANNUAL

BERKSHIRE SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL

AUGUST, 1940

THURSDAY AND SATURDAY EVENINGS—SUNDAY MATINEES

Series A	Series B	Series C
August 1	August 8	August 15
August 3	August 10	August 17
August 4	August 11	August 18

at Tanglewood, between Stockbridge and Lenox, Massachusetts

•

The BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Scale of Prices

for One Series of Three Concerts

Front Sections—$7.50	Rear Sections—$4.50
Front Sections—$6.00	Rear Sections—$3.00

Double or triple the price for two or three series

A limited number of boxes available

•

For information write to the

BERKSHIRE SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL, INC.
Stockbridge, Mass.
(New York office—Steinway Hall, 113 W. 57th St., N. Y. C.)

If interested in further information, fill out coupon below and mail to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Steinway Hall, 113 W. 57th Street or telephone CI 5-9154.

Kindly send me a subscription blank and the programs for each Series

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

Brooklyn Bulletin

choral work; third, a piano composition and fourth, a composition for violin and piano. There will also be a contest in voice and piano for young men and women from 18 to 25 years of age. All test numbers in both voice and piano must be by American composers and vocal numbers must be sung in English. Eligibility for both contests requires United States citizenship, either native or naturalized and one year's residence in the state. The winners will be presented at the festival in May.

240 CENTRAL Park South is the address of the latest building venture in the music center of New York. Overlooking Central Park and Columbus Circle and extending through the entire block covering Broadway and 58th Street this new 28-story structure will be the ideal home for musicians. Of the 325 suites about 100 will have open-air terraces. Tree-planted terraces, landscaped roof-gardens and log-burning fireplaces for all suites above the fifth floor will be among the features. There will be a tree planted central court at the second floor level above the main lobby dividing the building into two sections. Twelve retail shops will occupy the Broadway frontage.

LYDIA STANISLAW was graciously received when she sang on two occasions at Mme. ROSALIA CHALIA'S Wednesday Evening Velada at the Hotel Des Artists. First an instrumentalist, Miss Stanislaw did not begin voice training until she was in her teens. Now, however, she has a beautiful voice which will soon attract attention. These interesting evenings which Mme. Chalia, former Metropolitan Opera Star presents, are very advantageous to young singers who wish to be heard under the proper conditions.

Lake Mahkeenac to Mount Greylock with "Tanglewood" in the Foreground

TANGLEWOOD the home of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, is a perfect setting for the Summer program now undertaken by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the able direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Offering a unique opportunity for a summer of work and music this new center is designed to lay special emphasis upon those aspects of musical education concerned with collective performance. Active participation in the student orchestra choruses, chamber music and operatic groups will offer the means of acquiring a working knowledge of music as it is written, conducted, played and sung. Students who enrole in the various courses will have an opportunity to study under a faculty of renowned musicians and in addition ,the Boston Symphony will be there for a series of concerts beginning Aug. 1st.

The Berkshire Music Shed is a unique attraction and its seating capacity of 6000 is usually well filled. Tanglewood was presented to the orchestra in 1937 and is now the musical center of New England during the summer.

GLADYS SWARTHOUT will sing the title role in Bizet's Carmen on Fri. afternoon, Mar. 15, at the Meropolitan Opera House. This will be a benefit for the Henry Street Settlement Music School. Miss Swarthout has not been heard at the Met. since she sang "Mignon" two seasons ago. Ezio Pinza and Giovanni Martinelli will sing the two principal male roles and Licia Albanese will sing Micaela. Miss Swarthout made an appearance as Carmen last Summer with the Cincinnatti Zoo Opera Company. This appearance at the Metropolitan is only one of the busiest concert and opera season of her career.

Spencer B. Driggs.

New Collection of Daytime Dresses

With Unusual Detail and Style.
Attractively Priced.

•

The
CLAIRE SHOP
1019 Flatbush Avenue near Loew's Kings
BUckminster 2-9685

Private Lives

THE INTERIOR life of famous European women will be told in voice, expression, and gesture, on Wednesday evening, April 17. Mme. Maria Ley, of Paris and Vienna, will be the dramatis persona of the evening. Acclaimed throughout the Continent, her reenactments of such celebrities as Marie Antoinette, Madame Sans Gêne, Camille, Carlotta of Mexico, and Elizabeth of Austria, all bear witness to a remarkably complex art and personality, exceedingly pleasing.

Only daughter of the famous architect of so many Viennese theaters, Edmund Czada, great-niece of the brilliant ballerina, Fanny Elssler, Maria Ley grew up with the names and presences of the ①

MUSIC OF THE TIMES

CHORAL CONDUCTING

Dr. Davison's Book Throws Light on Harvard Glee Club Evolution

By OLIN DOWNES

THE Harvard Glee Club, product of the vision and the labors, in past years, of Dr. Archibald Davison, and now pursuing its course under the leadership of Dr. Davison's able former assistant, G. Wallace Woodworth, returns to New York for its concert of the season of 1939-40 next Saturday. Dr. Davison undertook the training of the Harvard Glee Club from 1912 onward. By 1919 he had gradually proved to his singers and to their officers that music by the greatest masters was appropriate for performance by the amateur singers and music lovers of a university glee club, in place of the conventional repertory in dark ages before manly men and serious music were supposed to have anything to do with each other.

In that year Dr. Davison's ideas were accepted in toto by the Harvard Glee Club and its officers, with the result that this organization grew quickly from a membership of 75 to 250, and has more applicants for membership each season than the football team, and is one of the outstanding choral bodies of the United States.

It may be urged that it is easier to find a good voice for a glee club than it is to discover a fullback or end who will bring the team to victory on the gridiron. The fact remains that the number of applicants for the Harvard Glee Club each season is astonishingly high compared to the numbers of those who go in for sports and other recreational activities, and that the Harvard Glee Club plays constantly a greater role in the lives of Harvard men. Its programs and performances have had an immense influence, not only upon the development of other college or university choruses, but upon choral developments and methods all over America.

* * *

SOME of these methods, as inaugurated by Dr. Davison and carried forward by Mr. Woodworth, are material for discussion by choral leaders and all who delight in choral music. Much light is thrown upon them by Dr. Davison's book, "Choral Conducting," recently printed by the Harvard University Press, a book containing more information, taste and common sense on the subject than any other book we have seen. Here, in simple and practical terms, is the theory and procedure which, fundamentally, has made the Harvard Glee Club what it is today.

He remarks that "Thirty years ago, if one were contemplating a performance of Bach's 'Magnificat' or Hindemith's 'Das Unaufhoerliche' (had it then been in existence), he would have recruited his chorus from the ranks of experienced singers, with emphasis on trained voices and able sight-readers; in other words, of veteran choristers, most of whom would have been between 30 and 60 years of age. The reverse is now quite generally the case, for we have learned that a group of young, enthusiastic singers in their late teens and early twenties can perform the most difficult music more impressively than their elders. I have never paid much attention to the 'quality' of a choral candidate's voice. I am much more influenced by the extent of his desire to sing and his interest in music."

The above statement is qualified in another paragraph by the remark that Dr. Davison believes firmly in people of all ages singing, and in their capacity, in varying degrees, of doing so. He maintains, however, that when a conductor is aiming at the highest artistic result the choice of younger voices is desirable.

* * *

AS to the confessed "indifference to vocal endowment" and "an extreme example" of the same, Dr. Davison mentions that he had at one time, as members of a chorus, two monotones; that these two had indescribable delight at being permitted to take part in choral rehearsals, without showing undue sensitiveness when seated close together and a little part from the other singers. "Fortunately, their voices were not strong ones. They sang, without deleterious effect, not less than four major choral works with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor."

Older and more experienced singers will not give the conductor the same enthusiastic response and the same unquestioning acceptance of his advice that he can count on from the younger people. The elders are less willing to rehearse or to listen to "council of perfection."

As for the capacity to sing at sight: "While a singer's ability to read music is a valuable asset to the conductor, I have never submitted a choral candidate to such a test, nor have I ever discovered that it was necessary to do so. A few readers scattered through the chorus effectually guide the non-readers, and in course of time, and with frequent rehearsals, most singers acquire all the reading skill they need. Sight readers—that is, those who can perform the music at sight without a mistake—are more often than not a thorn in the conductor's flesh. Their opinion is apt to be that a correct rendering of the notes is the main issue; and since that is accomplished at the first trial, they find the constant repetition of the notes irksome, a fact which the less able readers are not slow to observe. For sight-readers the real romance of rehearsing is an undiscovered country."

It is to be borne in mind that Dr. Davison, and now Mr. Woodworth, have been confronted each season with the departure of the more experienced singers of last season from the Glee Club, with graduation, and the influx each season of new members, new voices, new problems of training. This is true, of course, of every glee club representative of an educational institution the country over. How are these conditions best met? How are the singers chosen? By what methods, technical and artistic, are they trained? The book is so full of shrewd observations and practical advice that there is temptation to quote from each chapter. But here, in the chapter devoted to "Choral Technic" is what Dr. Davison has to say, in partial summary on the subject of "tone."

* * *

THE conductor discovers at the first rehearsal an astonishing number and variety of ways in which his singers, for the most part untrained, produce their voices. And the conductor must bring all these tone-qualities into some sort of harmonization, or standardization, which will produce a good choral tone. Whatever the conductor's ideal of that tone may be, one thing is absolutely imperative: the tone must be homogeneous—"for without homogeneous tone there cannot be effective singing."

Mr. Davison divides choral tone into two kinds, "subjective" and "objective." The objective tone is almost purely a technical matter, standing apart from interpretation, existing "merely as an audible vehicle of the words." The subjective tone is something quite else. It might be called a tone resulting from poetical understanding of a text and qualified by interpretive purpose. "Objective tone is most generally in use, perhaps, because it lies nearer than does subjective tone to the natural method of the amateur singer and may, therefore, be dealt with much less laboriously and artificially." By contrast, "subjective tone results from and is an inseparable component of the whole musical situation of which it is a part."

The objective tone quality is likely to be monotonous in effect and of unalterable timbre. It is lacking in versatility of color; the ear may soon tire of it. It is an end in itself and "not a sympathetic partner in an undertaking that involves much more than mere vocal sound." Dr. Davison seeks to develop the subjective tone partly by direct physical methods but more by appealing to the singer's intelligence and imagination.

* * *

WE may skip the technical directions and continue: "This gives a somewhat covered tone which is capable of the most diverse and sensitive coloring and of being bent in or out to characterize any textual requirement. Subjective tone, furthermore, guarantees the destruction of individual idiosyncrasies of tone production and yields one magnified choral voice as no other tone can. The voice is not beautiful in the sense that a solo voice may be beautiful, but there is, as I have said before, no time for individual voice lessons in the schedule of the average chorus, even were such instruction desirable. I have sometimes referred to subjective tone as 'distinguished mediocrity' in the sense that the separate voices which form it are often mediocre and assume distinction only when merged into homogeneity under one method. Such a flexible and versatile tone, when supported by other details of technique, furnishes, for me at least, the ideal medium."

In a clear, informative, axiomatic way, a way that is profitable and even entertaining to a non-professional, this book encourages in every page the amateur spirit and amateur attitude toward music, and aims point blank, amiably, but one would say with fairly devastating effect, at unthoroughness and superficiality. It should be worth its weight in gold to choral singers and choral conductors who are situated far from training schools or other musical influences. Thus the chapter on the conductor. It deals much of the time with ABC's—but how important they are, fundamental to effective performance, and how loosely understood by many leaders.

What is the choral conductor's equipment? Too often it is of the poorest. Seldom is it the result of thorough or systematic study. Why this unthoroughness? "It is, perhaps, because we as choral conductors deal mainly with amateurs. * * * This is unfortunate, for it is the amateur who, above all, needs the stimulus which can only be offered by thoroughly competent training."

The choral conductor needs a very keen ear—which is not the characteristic of as many choral conductors as might be thought. He should have an extensive knowledge of orchestral instruments and be a quick reader of orchestral scores. "There is no musical fallacy so common to the uninitiated * * * as the delusion that any one who can train an orchestra can train a chorus, and vice versa." One can ask whether there are many who can do the two things equally well even among the great orchestral and choral conductors of the world. Where would most of the great symphonic conductors be if, when a chorus appeared with their orchestra, they had no choral conductors to prepare the singers.

* * *

THE chorus conductor need not be ashamed to ask questions in these matters. Orchestral leaders are nearly as ignorant about the resources of technic and tone-color of the chorus. In modern music many scores require an experienced and authoritative leader of both chorus and orchestra, to insure their cooperation. A chorus leader should be able to convey by singing what he means to his forces.

How to rehearse? There are golden maxims. The "arm-chair" leader is hopeless, he who doesn't want to stand, or move, who "monotonously intones" page, line and measure and is affected by nothing. It is well said that "Conducting an amateur chorus is like throwing a rubber ball at a stone wall. There is as much rebound as there is force in the throw." The conductor must exercise humanity, and constantly tact; he must be blessed with humor; he must be ingenious, stimulating to his singers."

If he is abreast of his job—and here is "Doc" Davison's credo—"he has the thrill of companionship with eager men and women whose joy it is to create beauty by breathing life and significance into music which, without the exercise of their skill and attention, would remain cold symbols on the printed page; to have a part with them in the mutual accomplishment of high artistic ends arrived at only after enthusiastic cooperation and painstaking labor; to see them grow in sensitiveness to the refinements of performance and in the appreciation of what is true and enduring in art—I cannot believe that many occupations offer greater rewards."

Honoring Tchaikovsky

By Pitts Sanborn

New York

Russian music has been occupying a big place in the local sun. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, visiting Carnegie Hall for the last times this season, observed the centenary of Tchaikovsky's birth by playing the "Pathétique" Symphony on the evening of the fourth and the Fifth Symphony at the matinée on the sixth, and that evening Mr. Toscanini and the NBC Symphony devoted their entire broadcast to Tchaikovsky (the "Pathétique," the "Nutcracker" suite, and the "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasy).

The Philharmonic-Symphony, having paid its official tribute to Tchaikovsky and offering Igor Stravinsky for a second time this season as its guest conductor, devoted four programs in Carnegie Hall, on the evenings of the third and sixth and the afternoons of the fifth and seventh, to music by the eminent Russo-Frenchman.

Naturally no new view of Tchaikovsky as composer could be derived from the repetition of the extremely familiar pieces listed. There could be question only of performance. Dr. Koussevitzky threw himself heart and soul into the conducting of the symphonies he had chosen, and the orchestra played magnificently. On each occasion the program consisted of two symphonies, one of them by Beethoven, and nothing else. The "Pastoral" was paired with the "Pathétique" and Beethoven's Fourth preceded Tchaikovsky's Fifth. The orchestral execution was always of the first order.

* * *

Two of the Stravinsky concerts, as originally planned, would also have contained a tribute by allusion to Tchaikovsky—the orchestral divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fée," which makes use of Tchaikovsky melodies. But at rehearsal the composer decided to substitute the suite from the "Firebird." Consequently that and "Le Sacre du Printemps" figured on all four occasions. At the earlier concerts the symphonic poem, "Le Chant du Rossignol" served as introductory number, at the later ones the suite from "Pétrouchka."

It was a pleasure to hear again, "Le Chant du Rossignol" once played here so often and lately almost never. Yet incontestably the feature of each concert was the performance of the "Sacre." The composer, with the forceful cooperation of the orchestra, obtained for this work so vivid a setting forth that all the old vitality and impact seemed restored to a score which on occasion has shown signs of wilting and fading. No suspicion of the sort has chilled "Pétrouchka," however, and "The Fire-bird" when well played is always its magical self.

For one of the outstanding concerts of the season New York is indebted to collegians. On the evening of the sixth the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth conducting, came to the Town Hall with a program of singular distinction. In it the two choirs were assisted by an ensemble of brass from the Boston Symphony Orchestra and E. Power Biggs, organist. The entire first section of the two-part program was given over to works by Giovanni Gabrieli. This composer, the greatest of the Venetian school, was organist at St. Mark's, Venice, from 1585 (one century before Handel and Bach were born) till his death in 1612, and through such pupils as Schütz and Praetorius he exerted an important influence.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

APR 1 - 1940

Oscar Levant, the musical wizard of "Information, Please", has just published a book with the misleading title, "A Smattering of Ignorance." Mr. Levant, in spite of his own modest asseverations to the contrary, is a composer, pianist and conductor of great talent and a musical critic of caustic but penetrating ability. His book is a delightfully spicy commentary on contemporary American music with a section of particular interest on well known orchestra conductors and another on George Gershwin who was a close personal friend. . . . As for conductors, Mr. Levant has them categorized and places them in several classifications; the with-your-cooperation-we-will-make-a-beautiful-music-together type; the supercilious, cold shoulder type who never speaks to a player unless he makes a mistake; the social worker, just-call-me-Al type, and so on. He tells an unbelievable story of Toscanini's fabulous memory. Ernest Schellin was to be the soloist with the Philharmonic for the performance of his own compositions. During the rehearsal, Toscanini, who was conducting without score, suddenly stopped the orchestra and asked Schelling, who was playing with the music in front of him, "What are you playing there?" Schelling repeated the measure, but Toscanini demanded the music and peered myopically at it. "Just as I thought," he said. "You were playing wrong." And Toscanini was, as always, right. . . . Of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Levant says, "Unquestionably the finest in the world."

8

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

APR 3 - 1940

Concert by Boston Symphony Ends Rutgers Series Tonight

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to Conduct Famous Orchestra in Sixth Appearance Here; Three-number Program

Advance sales promise a packed gymnasium at Rutgers tonight when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the final presentation of the 24th annual Concert Series. The three-number program starts at 8:30.

The famed 108 piece orchestra will be making its sixth appearance in this city in closing the Rutgers series. In its five previous appearances the unit has gained a popularity which has made its visits the highlight of the annual musical season.

Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen the popular Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky as the final number of his program in honor of the 100th anniversary of the birth of the noted Russian composer. The number promises to hit a peak in recent orchestral presentations in this city since Dr. Koussevitzky is renowned as the outstanding interpreter of Tschaikowsky music in the orchestral field.

To Open With 'Figaro'

The program will open with the dainty overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" by Mozart. Before the intermission the orchestra will also render the seldom-played Fourth Symphony of Beethoven. The melodic strains of the Beethoven number are unknown to music lovers and tonight's presentation will mark one of its few renditions this season.

Tonight's program will be repeated by the Boston Symphony Saturday afternoon in a concert in Carnegie Hall, New York. Concerts with a different program are scheduled for tomorrow night in Carnegie Hall and Friday night in Brooklyn.

Dramatic episodes have characterized recent appearances of the Boston Symphony in this city. Last year Dr. Koussevitzky was taken ill a few hours before the concert was scheduled to start and Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, substituted in a last minute change. Three years ago Dr. Koussevitzky was awarded an honorary degree by the university following the concert.

Tonight's concert comes near the close of the 59th year of existence of the Boston Symphony. In the past few years it has increased its eminence in the musical world and is now considered by many the outstanding symphonic orchestra. The rise of Dr. Koussevitzky to a pinnacle in the directional world has occurred simultaneously with the rise of the orchestra.

The concert will officially close the 24th annual series of Rutgers. In an extra local concert, Nelson Eddy, screen and radio star, will present his only metropolitan program a week from Monday. Tickets for the concert are almost all gone, with mose of the number going to Eddy fans from North Jersey and New York, according to Rutgers University Music Department officials.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 1 - 1940

Boston Symphony to End Season In Borough Friday; Boxholders Are Named for Final Concert

On Friday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fifth and final concert of the current season in the Opera House at the Academy of Music. Mrs. David C. Johnson, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince and Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clarke H. Woodward will be among the boxholders, as well as the Adelphi Academy Alumnae, the Brooklyn Woman's Club and the Brooklyn Girl Scouts.

The program to be presented under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will include Beethoven's Symphony No. 1, orchestral excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" and Tchaikovsky's Symphony "Pathetique."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are in their fifty-fourth season here. They are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which James G. McDonald is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, executive chairman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 3 - 1940

TO HONOR TCHAIKOVSKY

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Mark Centennial at Concert Here

The memory of Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky, who was born on May 7 just a century ago, will be honored on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for April 16, in Metropolitan Theatre.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony, in E minor, Op. 64. The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz, and the Schubert "Unfinished" are the other selections.

SOMERVILLE, N.J
SOMERSET
MESSENGER
4/2/40

Boston Symphony Concert Closes Rutgers Series

NEW BRUNSWICK—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky, will make its sixth annual appearance on the program of the Rutgers Concert Series in the Rutgers Gymnasium at 8:30 o'clock tomorrow. The famed symphony's performance will close the 24th annual Rutgers series.

Works of three outstanding composers, Mozart, Beethoven and Tschaikowsky, comprise the program to be offered. Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" will open the evening, followed by Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Opus 60. Following the intermission, Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Opus 64, will conclude the concert.

One of the most famous musical organizations in the world, the Boston Symphony has become the outstanding feature of the Rutgers series. The Rutgers series is the only one in New Jersey on which the Boston organization appears annually. In 1937, the university conferred upon its conductor, Dr. Koussevitsky, the honorary degree of Doctor of Music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS

APR 3 - 1940

Boston Symphony to Play In Rutgers Series Tonight

Works of Mozart, Beethoven and Tschaikowsky comprise the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it makes its sixth annual appearance on the program of the Rutgers concert series in Rutgers Gymnasium tonight at 8:30 o'clock.

One of the most famous musical organizations in the world, the Boston Symphony has become the outstanding feature of the Rutgers series. Serge Koussevitsky will direct the orchestra, whose performance closes the series.

Bach Today

april 3

Once Old Fashioned, He Now Seems Most Modern of Them All—The B Minor Mass

Bach's Mass in B minor will have what promises to be a notable performance when it is presented by Serge Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chorus, and soloists, at Symphony Hall, next Sunday, April 21. The performance will be divided into two parts, beginning at 4.30 and 8. The orchestra will be assisted by a full double chorus of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists will be Elisabeth Schumann, soprano; Viola Silva, contralto; William Hain, tenor; and Alexander Kipnis, bass.

In anticipation of this performance and in commemoration of the recent 255th anniversary of Bach's birth the following article is printed analyzing Bach's relation to the "moderns" of his day, particularly as seen in the B minor Mass, and describing Bach's crucial relation to his own past. These two aspects of Bach's work explain how, though an outmoded conservative in his own day, he has come to be to us the greatest master of them all.

OSCAR LEVANT

Composer-author and star of "Information Please" who appears in benefit concert of Metropolitan Singers for crippled children in Symphony Hall, April 21.

When Mendelssohn raised his baton to conduct the then forgotten "St. Matthew Passion" by Johann Sebastian Bach in Berlin, March 11, 1829, he made the first decisive step of a rediscovery: Bach's music seemingly had been buried with its creator. Only his fame as an organ-player and composer had survived.

Suddenly interest in Bach was aroused. Schumann urged the foundation of the "Bach Society" and only a few decades later Bach's work had reached such general recognition that Johannes Brahms thought the completion of the Bach Society's publications the most important event of his life-time beside the founding of the German Empire.

Bach was rediscovered by a generation antagonistic to classicism and rationalism. Its spiritual basis favored historical preoccupations and Bach's music answered this inclination. The idea of God is the eternal measure, as an undisturbed faith is the basis of this music, which is full of symbolism and belongs to the greatest expressions of the spiritual in harmony.

These things alone would have sufficed to fascinate the romantic mind. But in Bach there is still more. Our appreciation of Bach surpasses a mere admiration of some of his works. We are absorbed by the personality of this music, which appears simple and ingenuous, massive and delicate, subjectively devout and intellectually cool, glowingly passionate and rigidly academical all at once, without our being able to find a final explanation of its transcendental appeal.

There are antagonistic forces in Bach's music despite the wonderful unity of its devoutly religious basis. In all his works one feels the tension between the "orthodox" idea and a deeply emotional personal expression. His organ music materializes between the two poles of traditional chorale and individual musical reflection. Even the musical setting in its correlation of the vocal line and chordal harmony expresses a kind of "syncretism," which finds its textual parallel in the contrast between free poetry and the Biblical word in certain vocal works.

These fundamental contrasts are essential to the concept of Bach's music, and it is here that the romantic spirit, with its predilection for the contradictory, found its special delight.

Bach's appeal to the 1820's may also explain the strange fate of his later life and of his works. Bach had died a lonely master. The harsh criticism of young Johann Adolph Scheibe accusing his compositions of being unnatural, extravagantly ornate, and artificial, as well as the continual discussions to which old Bach was subject, show clearly that he failed to appeal to the younger generation of his day.

And this was natural for such music in a time when the struggle between reason and ecclesiastical dogma had been won by reason and the newly born modern state had destroyed the faith in theocratic supernaturalism. This generation believed in Locke's Free Church in a Free State and in Leibniz's Systema Theologicum: the idea of a general religion and natural tolerance which had been anticipated in the ethics Spinoza taught and practiced. There was only one direction for the musician of these days to take: that which led out of the church. Handel and many other contemporaries followed it, but Bach resisted.

Towards the middle of the 18th century the spiritual development of Protestantism reached its culmination in the contrasting elements of orthodoxy and pietism. It is this spiritual evolution which was decisive for Bach, a musician who created "In nomine Jesu"—as he wrote on the exercise-book for his children—and to whom music was firstly "sweet harmony in the praise of the Lord." As long as pietism with its less specific dogma left intact the clerical basis of his music, Bach remained a truly modern composer.

Though he preserved church-music from destructive contemporary influences, nevertheless, at the same time, he continued to employ the splendor of the baroque operatic idiom in his cantatas. It is significant that he joined masters like Kuhnau, Buxtehude, or Pachelbel in sometimes composing Latin church-music. He appreciated and studied Catholic musical achievements and his "High Mass in B Minor" is one of the most inspired versions of the musical units in Catholic Mass.

Yet, despite the broad and conciliatory view indicated by all this, Bach proved to be fully aware of his true domain. Whenever he employed "modern" musical means they were spiritually transfigured. Even in the B Minor Mass he could not refrain from adapting the Sanctus and Agnus Dei to the modifications of the Protestant idea. Bach was inspired by the artistic possibilities offered by the Catholic Mass. He used its form, but never deviated from his own style: he even changed liturgical details when his feeling required it. The B Minor Mass actually roots in the same ideological which appears in all his works as a basic disposition.

The master tolerated contemporary ideas only as long as they could be integrated with his own general dogmatic-religious idea; never deviated from his own style: he even changed liturgical details when his feeling required it. Actually the B Minor Mass roots in the same ideological ground as all Bach's other works.

The master tolerated contemporary ideas only as long as they could be integrated into his own dogmatic-religious conceptions. But he could not support the increasingly rationalistic concept of pietism. Like Paul Gerhard, the orthodox cantor who preferred losing his position in Berlin to signing the edict of religious toleration of 1667, Bach almost deliberately withdrew from contemporary musical life.

This emphasizes Bach's connection with the past.

The century after the reformation had been torn by the threats of war. Contrasting pictures of utmost misery and richest pomp alternated rapidly before a background of hatred, destruction, and death. The war devoured everything, and where artists had thought to have reached "celestial heights," plagues, blazes, and robbery destroyed libraries, chapels, schools and choirs. Equally torn was the spiritual life. Instead of the sorely needed unity, Lutheran and Calvinist debate reached its climax. Lutheran orthodoxy had finally been established as a reaction to this struggle and unrest.

The contrasting elements of Protestant orthodoxy and a pious mysticism find their echo in musical expression. They imposed a new form on the important musical elements offered by the cosmopolitan baroque Italy. It is significant that despite the cultural defeat the North had suffered, the influence of the Gabrielis and Monteverdi caused no definite change. Only after the new material had been thoroughly assimilated did a genuine stilistic growth become possible. Born almost at the same time, Johann Hermann Schein, Samuel Scheidt and Heinrich Schuetz expressed the new idea in Protestant church-music.

Schein demonstrated the absorption of Italian elements as well as the growing influence of mysticism in music. Compared to Schein's excited Italianism, Scheidt seemed moderate and almost conservative. But it was the historic mission of Heinrich Schuetz to unite the contrasts expressed in the two younger masters. A spiritual aristocrat,

---

YORK VILLAGE, ME
OLD YORK
TRANSCRIPT
4/5/40

Among those who were in attendance when Mrs. Carl Dreyfus gave, at the Chilton Club in Boston recently, a lecture on "Serge Koussevitsky—A Personal Portrait," were Mrs. Robert Farley Clark and Mrs. Eben Stanwood. The lecture was given under the auspices of the Woman's Civic Federation of Massachusetts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MADEMOISELLE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
PR - 1940

9

The Malady Lingers On

with Oscar Levant

—who exposes the sad plight of young American composers, for their works are seen but rarely ever heard

HOULD YOU WANT TO LOCATE a promising young American composer in New York, go to Carnegie Hall on any Saturday afternoon when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony are in town. You'll find ten or twelve of them stuffed into Mrs. K's upper left-hand box, or the one adjacent to it, with another group overflowing into the standing room downstairs. Just what their means of access to this exalted position is, I don't know. At a recent concert I went out with half a dozen of them for the intermission Coca-Cola, and practically didn't get in again. None of them had a ticket stub, including me.

This was almost a disaster, for they would rather miss the second half of the concert than forego the session in the Green Room afterward. Here Koussevitzky, between greetings with ordinary well-wishers, is five times a winter anointed with the kudos of being the "Little White Father" of American music. The poor man is so harassed by the press of eager young composers about him (a tribute to which he is eminently entitled) that, as each goes up to shake his hand with that gleam of "How about my score?" in his eye, Mrs. Koussevitzky interposes herself as a kindly but determined buffer to keep the line moving. Considering the size of the Green Room in Carnegie Hall, twenty American composers in Indian file don't leave much Lebensraum for the mere social caller.

The problem of ingress and egress is complicated by the crush in the narrow hall outside, with Boston Symphony men rushing to catch the five o'clock train from Grand Central as the Philharmonic men march in for their rehearsal. Among the latter, on one recent Saturday, was Sol Goodman, the scarcely reprehensible tympanist and a veritable Dead End kid of the symphony, who clapped me on the back in friendly greeting with pulverizing vigor. When I had recovered, I said, "You played that pianissimo trill in the Beethoven Second Symphony the other night wonderfully." "That's nothing," he replied. "I am one of the few who play that rhythm in the larghetto—you know, dum, di-dum, di-dum—right." Whether he meant in the orchestra, or among all tympanists, I could not quite puzzle out. Before I had a chance to clear up this point, he continued, "I've got a question for you." Apparently he was oblivious to my anguished look, for he went on, "I bet you don't know what key Bach's Air on the G string is in." "Obviously," I said, "it's not going to be in G." This returned the baffle he had given me with the remark about the Beethoven Second, and provided for a fortunate inter- (Continued on page 150) ruption by an attendant of the hall who passed by with an armful of Philharmonic stands to replace the Boston ones, followed by two men dragging in a new set of levels for the stage.

THE MALADY LINGERS ON

(CONTINUED FROM PAGE 77)

"Damn it," he said, "if they just changed conductors and let the same orchestra play all the time it would save a hell of a lot of trouble for us"—a bit of musical criticism not to be dismissed lightly.

By this time the session in the Green Room was breaking up. I couldn't help feeling that it was, in a sense, a pathetic demonstration for which there is, however, a harsh, practical reason. Omitting the concerts given by the Boston Symphony, the contemporary American composer has been virtually unrepresented on programs given by professional orchestras in New York this winter. (I make this distinction not out of deference to the A.A.U. or with any snobbish intent, but merely to leave room for credit to Léon Barzin and the National Orchestral Association, which has done some valiant things.) Koussevitzky, indeed, had the temerity to initiate his season in New York with two concerts devoted wholly to works by Americans, in which was reviewed the accomplishment of men so diverse as Hanson and Harris, Thomson and Carpenter, William Schuman and Edward Burlingame Hill. Even more remarkable, these were two programs prepared by Koussevitzky for participation in the A.S.C.A.P. festival, from which he was forced to withdraw because of union objections. Thus, he didn't have to play American compositions if he didn't want to.

So far as the other conductors active in New York are concerned, they don't have to sponsor works by native composers and apparently they don't want to. Much was made of Toscanini's intention to play Roy Harris' second symphony with the NBC orchestra this winter, but when the programs were announced, lo!—a Beethoven festival led all the rest! I would be interested to know whether Toscanini reached this decision before or after looking at Harris' score. I understand, however, that the work will "definitely" be played during Toscanini's second series with the orchestra. There has been the usual Harl MacDonald performance from Ormandy and the Philadelphia, but Barbirolli has contented himself with music by the late Arthur Foote, John (Gone with the Woodwind) Powell and such present-day inheritors of that mantle as Robert Sanders. I am aware that a gala première of Bernard Herrmann's Moby Dick is scheduled this spring by the Philharmonic, and it doubtless will be an effective work. However, it has a full equipment of text, soloist and narrator, which rather takes it out of the experimental category.

This would be merely a repetition of an old beef if it were not that so much representative American music has been heard elsewhere this season than in Carnegie Hall and Studio 8H (which becomes a shrine

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
APR 5 - 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS BEETHOVEN'S "PASTORALE"

By Samuel Chotzinoff

At Carnegie Hall last night Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony played Beethoven's "Pastorale" symphony and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," the latter in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the Russian composer's birth, May 7. An enormous audience heard the Bostonians with every evidence of pleasure.

Words and Music

In the opinion of this reviewer, the "Pastorale" is distinctly not up Mr. Koussevitzky's alley. The symphony is a primitive landscape naively and tenderly conjured up by one who looked innocently at nature, and to recreate this landscape in its awful simplicity requires the completest identification of the imagination of the interpreter with that of the creator.

When such identification takes place the listener is sure to know it. He knows it by the curiously religious quality of the emotions that possess him. The scene that the first movement spreads before him must in no wise be actual, for it mirrors a countryside that exists only in the soul of Beethoven. The brook is no stream that has been watched by any human eye. It is a devout brook that may not lag or hurry, and its course is so healing that its waters may well be composed of penitential tears. Nor are these actual countryfolk that make merry in the sunshine and are scattered by thunderclaps and a torrential downpour. Both the people and the storm are ideal, the return of sunshine and peace are ideal, the shepherd and his song of sweet assurance are ideal.

Reality of Interpretation

Mr. Koussevitzky failed to realize Beethoven's vision of joyful Pantheism. Instead, he gave us reality; not the reality of nature, but the reality of an interpretation that could not discover an objective. The landscape that he unfolded was neither real nor ideal, the brook hurried along troubled and uncertain, the hymn of thanksgiving at the end was a long, meandering, profitless sermon. "More an expression of feeling than painting," Beethoven wrote on the title page of the score. Last night the "Pastorale" seemed neither.

In celebrating Tschaikowsky, Mr. Koussevitzky should have been more in his element. Indeed, the orchestra was a magnificent instrument in the "Pathetique," achieving brilliance and sonority that are marvelous even in these days of great orchestras. Yet the symphony speaks out with greater truth when it is not subjected to a very personal "reading." Not being a conductor, I cannot presume to question Mr. Koussevitzky's outwardly overpowering treatment of the score.

It seemed to me, however, that the Russian conductor disregarded many of the composer's plain injunctions as to tempi and dynamics. Of course, the strictest observance of a composer's markings does not constitute an interpretation. But there can be no doubt that it is an essential factor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MADEMOISELLE
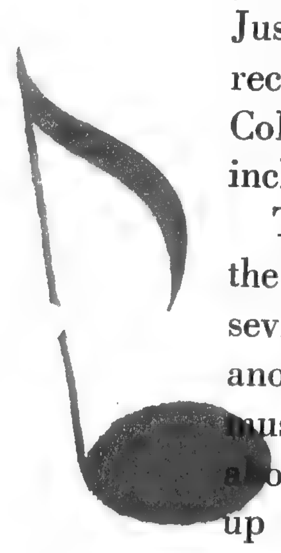
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR - 1940

9

The Malady Lingers On

with Oscar Levant

—who exposes the sad plight of young American composers, for their works are seen but rarely ever heard



SHOULD YOU WANT TO LOCATE a promising young American composer in New York, go to Carnegie Hall on any Saturday afternoon when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony are in town. You'll find ten or twelve of them stuffed into Mrs. K's upper left-hand box, or the one adjacent to it, with another group overflowing into the standing room downstairs. Just what their means of access to this exalted position is, I don't know. At a recent concert I went out with half a dozen of them for the intermission Coca-Cola, and practically didn't get in again. None of them had a ticket stub, including me.

This was almost a disaster, for they would rather miss the second half of the concert than forego the session in the Green Room afterward. Here Koussevitzky, between greetings with ordinary well-wishers, is five times a winter anointed with the kudos of being the "Little White Father" of American music. The poor man is so harassed by the press of eager young composers about him (a tribute to which he is eminently entitled) that, as each goes up to shake his hand with that gleam of "How about my score?" in his eye, Mrs. Koussevitzky interposes herself as a kindly but determined buffer to keep the line moving. Considering the size of the Green Room in Carnegie Hall, twenty American composers in Indian file don't leave much Lebensraum for the mere social caller.

The problem of ingress and egress is complicated by the crush in the narrow hall outside, with Boston Symphony men rushing to catch the five o'clock train from Grand Central as the Philharmonic men march in for their rehearsal. Among the latter, on one recent Saturday, was Sol Goodman, the scarcely reprehensible tympanist and a veritable Dead End kid of the symphony, who clapped me on the back in friendly greeting with pulverizing vigor. When I had recovered, I said, "You played that pianissimo trill in the Beethoven Second Symphony the other night wonderfully." "That's nothing," he replied. "I am one of the few who play that rhythm in the larghetto—you know, dum, di-dum, di-dum—right." Whether he meant in the orchestra, or among all tympanists, I could not quite puzzle out. Before I had a chance to clear up this point, he continued, "I've got a question for you." Apparently he was oblivious to my anguished look, for he went on, "I bet you don't know what key Bach's Air on the G string is in." "Obviously," I said, "it's not going to be in G." This returned the baffle he had given me with the remark about the Beethoven Second, and provided for a fortunate interruption by an attendant of the hall who passed by with an armful of Philharmonic stands to replace the Boston ones, followed by two men dragging in a new set of levels for the stage.

(Continued on page 150)

Mademoiselle

THE MALADY LINGERS ON

(CONTINUED FROM PAGE 77)

"Damn it," he said, "if they just changed conductors and let the same orchestra play all the time it would save a hell of a lot of trouble for us"—a bit of musical criticism not to be dismissed lightly.

By this time the session in the Green Room was breaking up. I couldn't help feeling that it was, in a sense, a pathetic demonstration for which there is, however, a harsh, practical reason. Omitting the concerts given by the Boston Symphony, the contemporary American composer has been virtually unrepresented on programs given by professional orchestras in New York this winter. (I make this distinction not out of deference to the A.A.U. or with any snobbish intent, but merely to leave room for credit to Léon Barzin and the National Orchestral Association, which has done some valiant things.) Koussevitzky, indeed, had the temerity to initiate his season in New York with two concerts devoted wholly to works by Americans, in which was reviewed the accomplishment of men so diverse as Hanson and Harris, Thomson and Carpenter, William Schuman and Edward Burlingame Hill. Even more remarkable, these were two programs prepared by Koussevitzky for participation in the A.S.C.A.P. festival, from which he was forced to withdraw because of union objections. Thus, he didn't have to play American compositions if he didn't want to.

So far as the other conductors active in New York are concerned, they don't have to sponsor works by native composers and apparently they don't want to. Much was made of Toscanini's intention to play Roy Harris' second symphony with the NBC orchestra this winter, but when the programs were announced, lo!—a Beethoven festival led all the rest! I would be interested to know whether Toscanini reached this decision before or after looking at Harris' score. I understand, however, that the work will "definitely" be played during Toscanini's second series with the orchestra. There has been the usual Harl MacDonald performance from Ormandy and the Philadelphia, but Barbirolli has contented himself with music by the late Arthur Foote, John (Gone with the Woodwind) Powell and such present-day inheritors of that mantle as Robert Sanders. I am aware that a gala première of Bernard Herrmann's Moby Dick is scheduled this spring by the Philharmonic, and it doubtless will be an effective work. However, it has a full equipment of text, soloist and narrator, which rather takes it out of the experimental category.

This would be merely a repetition of an old beef if it were not that so much representative American music has been heard elsewhere this season than in Carnegie Hall and Studio 8H (which becomes a shrine

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
APR 5 - 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS BEETHOVEN'S "PASTORALE"

By Samuel Chotzinoff

At Carnegie Hall last night Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony played Beethoven's "Pastorale" symphony and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," the latter in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the Russian composer's birth, May 7. An enormous audience heard the Bostonians with every evidence of pleasure.

Words and Music

In the opinion of this reviewer, the "Pastorale" is distinctly not up Mr. Koussevitzky's alley. The symphony is a primitive landscape naively and tenderly conjured up by one who looked innocently at nature, and to recreate this landscape in its awful simplicity requires the completest identification of the imagination of the interpreter with that of the creator.

When such identification takes place the listener is sure to know it. He knows it by the curiously religious quality of the emotions that possess him. The scene that the first movement spreads before him must in no wise be actual, for it mirrors a countryside that exists only in the soul of Beethoven. The brook is no stream that has been watched by any human eye. It is a devout brook that may not lag or hurry, and its course is so healing that its waters may well be composed of penitential tears. Nor are these actual countryfolk that make merry in the sunshine and are scattered by thunderclaps and a torrential downpour. Both the people and the storm are ideal, the return of sunshine and peace are ideal, the shepherd and his song of sweet assurance are ideal.

Reality of Interpretation

Mr. Koussevitzky failed to realize Beethoven's vision of joyful Pantheism. Instead, he gave us reality; not the reality of nature, but the reality of an interpretation that could not discover an objective. The landscape that he unfolded was neither real nor ideal, the brook hurried along troubled and uncertain, the hymn of thanksgiving at the end was a long, meandering, profitless sermon. "More an expression of feeling than painting," Beethoven wrote on the title page of the score. Last night the "Pastorale" seemed neither.

In celebrating Tschaikowsky, Mr. Koussevitzky should have been more in his element. Indeed, the orchestra was a magnificent instrument in the "Pathetique," achieving brilliance and sonority that are marvelous even in these days of great orchestras. Yet the symphony speaks out with greater truth when it is not subjected to a very personal "reading." Not being a conductor, I cannot presume to question Mr. Koussevitzky's outwardly overpowering treatment of the score.

It seemed to me, however, that the Russian conductor disregarded many of the composer's plain injunctions as to tempi and dynamics. Of course, the strictest observance of a composer's markings does not constitute an interpretation. But there can be no doubt that it is an essential factor.

10

THE MALADY LINGERS ON

(CONTINUED FROM PAGE 151)

sense, continuity, thematic aptness, and above all, a sure hand in scoring with ingenuity a very rare thing. That common sense in his music for The Great American Goof was expressed, incidentally, in a modern idiom . . . not a mean feat in itself.

I would be curious to hear how his other ballet score of this winter, City Portrait, sounds in the orchestra. When the Ballet Caravan did it, they used a two-piano version, since the budget for the engagement at the St. James did not provide for an orchestra. Certainly, the apprenticeship Brant served in doing such jobs as his orchestration of Alec Templeton's Bach Goes to Town for Benny Goodman's band has had fruitful results. One of them, indeed, was that very orchestration, which is a little masterpiece of craftsmanship and almost of Stokowskian splendor, with a touch of frenzy contributed by Goodman's band which is, to put it mildly, faintly irresistible.

My own apprenticeship (an interminable incubation which I seem to be constantly in the middle of) was served under somewhat different auspices. The California stage, which I like to look back upon fondly as a musical pubescence, was spent under the tutelage of Arnold Schönberg, whose distinction as a composer is exceeded only by his ability as a teacher and as an objective critic of music. Perhaps the most succinct commentary on the deep joy of being a composer was uttered by Schönberg when I brought him my first completed orchestral score several years ago, a work over which I had labored with the patience of a six-day bicycle-race referee. He examined its pages minutely and with impressive carefulness. Then he looked up, his face incandescent with a glow which warmed me in anticipation of a few commendatory words: "At the first performance," he said cheerily, "you'll feel desperate."

This coquettish crusher has for its parallel only one happening that I know of. It occurred shortly after the opening of Roberta, produced by Max Gordon before his White House tea period. He hovered in the lobby just as the first act ended, anxious to observe the reactions of the audience, for the reviews had been only tepid. (Smoke Gets in Your Eyes, which eventually carried the show to success, had not yet won the fancy of the public.) He was especially eager for the opinion of Noel Coward, a visitor of that evening, hopeful that the playwright would coin an approving phrase that could be used in the advertisements.

Coward walked toward Gordon, as brittle and impeccable as one of his plays, and his clipped British accent cut the lobby air crisply: "Max, darling," he said, "it stinks!"

Of that first production Schönberg spoke prophetically, as I later realized. An obliging amateur orchestra agreed to play the work and I undertook to conduct it myself, not through coercion or cajolery but because even the amateur conductor refused to study my me of the reaction I would have when the sounds on paper first reached my ear at close range, but I discovered it was like listening to the soundtrack of the earthquake in San Francisco without seeing the picture. How I longed for my old seat in the balcony! When I finished the first reading, he was present with the ineluctable commentary. In his most paternal manner he remarked, "It's a good thing it is an inferior orchestra. A good one wouldn't have stood for you."

We managed, nevertheless, to get a performance organized and the work was programmed for a public concert. At last I was able to pay back the numerous invitations to enjoy other people's work that I had accepted in the past from various friends, including the George Kaufmans, who were in California at the time, and Harpo Marx. Much was made of the flourish with which I presented them with the tickets in Row A, directly in front of the orchestra; of my sudden emergence as The Host type, until Kaufman happened to look at the price on the tickets—which was 40c. When the evening came, I walked onto the stage and tapped the baton timidly on the stand—more to attract my attention to what was going on than the orchestra's—whereupon the stand completely collapsed. As I fixed it, fumblingly, Harpo let out his big whistle, and thereafter I felt fine. I figured it was the kind of thing that should have happened to me.

Since then I have become accustomed to the resisting faces in the orchestra, the mute accolade of my friends, the good-natured penetration of the out-of-town critics that I was "not serious" in the piece they had just heard (as if the composer of even Parade of the Wooden Soldiers was not serious, in his own terms, when he wrote that piece) and—this is a nice sentence to leave suspended—anyway, I have become accustomed.

The "final irony" (to quote Ben Hecht, who was quoting David Belasco in Twentieth Century) occurred recently at a broadcast sponsored by the League of Composers in Philadelphia, at which I was present to accompany Roman Totenberg in a performance of two violin pieces I had written. The broadcast was part of a series of regional programs, this one devoted to composers born in Pennsylvania. At the rehearsal prior to the broadcast, it was discovered that the program ran a little short, and I offered to play a movement or two of my piano sonatina, which I had worked up for the WNYC festival. However, I didn't want to attempt it without music, so I sent a messenger with a dollar bill—my own—to buy a copy at a neighboring music store (secretly hoping that it wouldn't be in stock). The boy returned promptly with the copy, causing me to reflect that I will eventually receive ten cents' royalty from the sale, the first the work has earned—gained at a cost, to me, of ninety cents, net.

To show what the American composer is up against, Hitler, in his whimsical way, decided to make a speech that day from Munich, which was relayed over here. The consequent abbreviation of the broadcast period left no time for my sonatina.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOLDENVILLE, OKLA.
NEWS
APR 7 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LA GRANDE, ORE.
EVENING OBSERVER
APR 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
APR 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
APR 5 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUTLER, PA.
EAGLE
APR 8 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GREEN BAY, WIS.
PRESS-GAZETTE
APR 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE
APR 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM CELINA, OHIO
DAILY STANDARD
APR 2 - 1940

TODAY'S PROFILE

By UNITED PRESS

IN THE STUDY of his suburban home stand a bass viol and Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, is unable to play it.

With ears in his eyes the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra explains that he has been so busy for the past five years that he scarcely touches the instrument.

Generally conceded to be the country's leading symphonic conductor, Koussevitzky has trained his 110 players until they came to be known as the nation's finest orchestra. He joined the orchestra in 1924 and raised it from the musical doldrums with sharp, quick criticisms that brought fine playing as a response.

Born in Russia 76 years ago, Koussevitzky went to Moscow when a boy and won a scholarship for instruction on the bass viol. After becoming a virtuoso, he serenaded Natalya Konstantinova on the instrument. He later married her and she helped him finance an orchestra for him to conduct. Until 1920 Koussevitzky stayed in Russia. Then he came to America because he was out of sympthy with the Bolsheviks.

The preliminary work of the Boston Symphony is done by Koussevitzky in his study. Music litters the room, standing in stocks on the piano, tables and bureau. Diplomas and citations cover the walls.

Koussevitzky sits in an easy chair before a music stand to study the score of forthcoming concerts. However well he knows the music he is going to conduct, he always rehearshes at home before he rehearses the orchestra.

At actual performances the haughty, gray-haired Russian is distinguished in appearance in his dress clothes. At rehearsals, however, he becomes a tyrant hunching over in an old sweater, shouting, singing and waving frantically with his baton.

"You must zing," he shouts, "you must blay." His word is law because he can discharge members at will.

One legend says that Koussevitzky became disgusted with the sour notes one musician played. "You are fired. Ged out. Ged out!" the exasperated conductor shouted.

After the rehearsal the musician opened Koussevitzky's dressing room door and bellowed, "Nuts to you, Koussevitzky."

The conductor turned his head slowly and then snapped, "Ged out. It's too late to abologize."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
APR 1 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. TONAWANDA, N. Y.
EVENING NEWS
APR 15 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE
APR 15 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM LIBERAL, KANS.
SOUTHWEST TIMES
APR 15 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CATSKILL, N. Y.
MAIL
APR 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM ASHLAND, KY.
INDEPENDENT
APR 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. CLOUD, MINN.
TIMES-JOURNAL
APR 1 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
APR 10 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
APR 5 - 1940

BOSTONIANS PLAY TWO SYMPHONIES

Contrast Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Sixths may be much too elemental for the polytonalist, yet harmonize altogether agreeably for those simple souls who still find musical beauty in the symphonies of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky. It might be said that no two works of the symphonic species are further apart in spirit than the "Pastoral" of the German and the "Pathetic" of the Russian. But it was to be surmised that the success of the juxtaposition of the two sixths on last night's program of the Boston Symphony was not exclusively something of effective contrast, as between the jovial and the tragic.

The superb performances given these works by Serge Koussevitzky and his glowing ensemble clove to the essential genius of each, and genius in music is not solely something of mood. Beyond recognition of the technical mastery with which a Beethoven and, yes, a Tchaikovsky, turns his inspiration to account, there persists the hoary notion that inspiration of itself is of importance. All signs and portents at this concert tended to support the notion, and in so doing to establish a kinship between the two ostensibly opposite works, with their perennially fresh melodies, their apt and beautiful scoring, their sincere and direct utterance.

It is the kinship of musicality, which may, after all, be only another word for inspiration; but is, at any rate, the opposite of the juiceless, the cerebral, the manufactured, the sterile and the repellent. If some there are who regard the melodic ideas of the "Pathetic" as inferior and even banal, this reviewer can supply them with the names and addresses of well-grounded musicians and music lovers who will argue the same about the cherished "Pastoral." Every one to his taste, said the Queen as she kissed the cow.

What really concerns the record is that this was the last Thursday night concert of this season's series by the Bostonians in Carnegie Hall and that performances of the highest quality were rapturously received. In the case of the "Pathetic" there was a spontaneous outburst of applause after the march, which was of stunning brilliance as played. Equally a tribute to Mr. Koussevitzky's deeply moving achievement of the closing adagio lamentoso was the circumstance that only a few felt impelled to applaud at all.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
APR 5 - 1940

Koussevitzky Plays 'Pathetic' Symphony

By GRENA BENNETT.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony that gave a concert in Carnegie Hall last evening, has enrolled as one of the celebrants of the Tschaikovsky Centenary which will be observed early next month. Accordingly, he included in last night's program the great Russian composer's most popular work, the "Pathetic" symphony. Since its world premiere, a matter of three weeks before its melancholy composer's death, the symphony has been a favorite number with every important symphonic organization, a work of compelling substance, profound harmonies and intriguing instrumentation. Mr. Koussevitzky read it with imagination and distinction; a revelation of the structure and significance of its brooding mysteries; vital in tonal color and expression, and with deep emotional conviction.

Only two compositions comprised the program which began with Beethoven's beguiling "Pastoral" symphony, into which was read a fusion of beautiful tonal tints; phrases outlined and polished with a true sense of symmetry; and a general effect of perfect proportion and blending securely maintained.

The Bostonians will appear this evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music performing Beethoven's First Symphony, Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" and Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony. The last named work will have its third metropolitan presentation tomorrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
APR 4 - 1940

ALL-STRAVINSKY PROGRAM IS GIVEN BY PHILHARMONIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

Words and Music

Igor Stravinsky came back to the Philharmonic Symphony last night to finish his term as guest conductor. The program at Carnegie Hall was all-Stravinsky—the works, "Le Chant du Rossignol," "L'Oiseau de Feu" and "Le Sacre du Printemps."

The Russian composer's music has not languished this season. Both the public and students of music are now in a position to know exactly how this music should sound since Mr. Stravinsky, himself, has taken the trouble to disclose it to us.

We have heard, exactly how the famous ballets, the chamber music and the concerto for two pianos should go. Yet some who have heard Mr. Stravinsky conduct his works have found them less exciting than they are under more professional leadership.

Somehow, Mr. Stravinsky fails to animate his own compositions, though he must necessarily know more about them than Mr. Stokowski or Dr. Koussevitsky. We often lament the fact that it is not possible for us to hear Beethoven or Brahms interpret their symphonies. Yet it is possible that the contemporary audiences who heard Brahms and Beethoven conduct their own works preferred to listen to these masterpieces under other direction.

Like his master, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Mr. Stravinsky has beguiled the world with musical fairy tales. At the moment realities are so pressing that it should be pleasant to escape into Mr. Stravinsky's land of firebirds, nightingales and animated puppets. Yet, strange to say, this music lover succumbs to restlessness at an all-Stravinsky evening and longs for the breath of human emotion, of actual strife and sorrow, to remind him of a harsh and vital planet.

10

Mademoiselle

THE MALADY LINGERS ON

(CONTINUED FROM PAGE 151)

sense, continuity, thematic aptness, and above all, a sure hand in scoring with ingenuity—a very rare thing. That common sense in his music for The Great American Goof was expressed, incidentally, in a modern idiom . . . not a mean feat in itself.

I would be curious to hear how his other ballet score of this winter, City Portrait, sounds in the orchestra. When the Ballet Caravan did it, they used a two-piano version, since the budget for the engagement at the St. James did not provide for an orchestra. Certainly, the apprenticeship Brant served in doing such jobs as his orchestration of Alec Templeton's Bach Goes to Town for Benny Goodman's band has had fruitful results. One of them, indeed, was that very orchestration, which is a little masterpiece of craftsmanship and almost of Stokowskian splendor, with a touch of frenzy contributed by Goodman's band which is, to put it mildly, faintly irresistible.

My own apprenticeship (an interminable incubation which I seem to be constantly in the middle of) was served under somewhat different auspices. The California stage, which I like to look back upon fondly as a musical pubescence, was spent under the tutelage of Arnold Schönberg, whose distinction as a composer is exceeded only by his ability as a teacher and as an objective critic of music. Perhaps the most succinct commentary on the deep joy of being a composer was uttered by Schönberg when I brought him my first completed orchestral score several years ago, a work over which I had labored with the patience of a six-day bicycle-race referee. He examined its pages minutely and with impressive carefulness. Then he looked up, his face incandescent with a glow which warmed me in anticipation of a few commendatory words: "At the first performance," he said cheerily, "you'll feel desperate."

This coquettish crusher has for its parallel only one happening that I know of. It occurred shortly after the opening of Roberta, produced by Max Gordon before his White House tea period. He hovered in the lobby just as the first act ended, anxious to observe the reactions of the audience, for the reviews had been only tepid. (Smoke Gets in Your Eyes, which eventually carried the show to success, had not yet won the fancy of the public.) He was especially eager for the opinion of Noel Coward, a visitor of that evening, hopeful that the playwright would coin an approving phrase that could be used in the advertisements.

Coward walked toward Gordon, as brittle and impeccable as one of his plays, and his clipped British accent cut the lobby air crisply: "Max, darling," he said, "it stinks!"

Of that first production Schönberg spoke prophetically, as I later realized. An obliging amateur orchestra agreed to play the work and I undertook to conduct it myself, not through coercion or cajolery but because even the amateur conductor refused to study my

for April 1940

me of the reaction I would have when the sounds on paper first reached my ear at close range, but I discovered it was like listening to the soundtrack of the earthquake in San Francisco without seeing the picture. How I longed for my old seat in the balcony! When I finished the first reading, he was present with the ineluctable commentary. In his most paternal manner he remarked, "It's a good thing it is an inferior orchestra. A good one wouldn't have stood for you."

We managed, nevertheless, to get a performance organized and the work was programmed for a public concert. At last I was able to pay back the numerous invitations to enjoy other people's work that I had accepted in the past from various friends, including the George Kaufmans, who were in California at the time, and Harpo Marx. Much was made of the flourish with which I presented them with the tickets in Row A, directly in front of the orchestra; of my sudden emergence as The Host type, until Kaufman happened to look at the price on the tickets—which was 40c. When the evening came, I walked onto the stage and tapped the baton timidly on the stand—more to attract my attention to what was going on than the orchestra's—whereupon the stand completely collapsed. As I fixed it, fumblingly, Harpo let out his big whistle, and thereafter I felt fine. I figured it was the kind of thing that should have happened to me.

Since then I have become accustomed to the resisting faces in the orchestra, the mute accolade of my friends, the good-natured penetration of the out-of-town critics that I was "not serious" in the piece they had just heard (as if the composer of even Parade of the Wooden Soldiers was not serious, in his own terms, when he wrote that piece) and—this is a nice sentence to leave suspended—anyway, I have become accustomed.

The "final irony" (to quote Ben Hecht, who was quoting David Belasco in Twentieth Century) occurred recently at a broadcast sponsored by the League of Composers in Philadelphia, at which I was present to accompany Roman Totenberg in a performance of two violin pieces I had written. The broadcast was part of a series of regional programs, this one devoted to composers born in Pennsylvania. At the rehearsal prior to the broadcast, it was discovered that the program ran a little short, and I offered to play a movement or two of my piano sonatina, which I had worked up for the WNYC festival. However, I didn't want to attempt it without music, so I sent a messenger with a dollar bill—my own—to buy a copy at a neighboring music store (secretly hoping that it wouldn't be in stock). The boy returned promptly with the copy, causing me to reflect that I will eventually receive ten cents' royalty from the sale, the first the work has earned—gained at a cost, to me, of ninety cents, net.

To show what the American composer is up against, Hitler, in his whimsical way, decided to make a speech that day from Munich, which was relayed over here. The consequent abbreviation of the broadcast period left no time for my sonatina.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOLDENVILLE, OKLA.
NEWS
APR 7 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LA GRANDE, ORE.
EVENING OBSERVER
APR 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
APR 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
APR 5 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUTLER, PA.
EAGLE
APR 8 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GREEN BAY, WIS.
PRESS-GAZETTE
APR 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE
APR 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM CELINA, OHIO
DAILY STANDARD
APR 2 - 1940

TODAY'S PROFILE

By UNITED PRESS

IN THE STUDY of his suburban home stand a bass viol and Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, is unable to play it.

With ears in his cyes the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra explains that he has been so busy for the ~~past~~ five years that he scarcely touches the instrument.

Generally conceded to be the country's leading symphonic conductor, Koussevitzky has trained his 110 players until they came to be known as the nation's finest orchestra. He joined the orchestra in 1924 and raised it from the musical doldrums with sharp, quick criticisms that brought fine playing as a response.

Born in Russia 76 years ago, Koussevitzky went to Moscow when a boy and won a scholarship for instruction on the bass viol. After becoming a virtuoso, he serenaded Natalya Konstantinova on the instrument. He later married her and she helped him finance an orchestra for him to conduct. Until 1920 Koussevitzky stayed in Russia. Then he came to America because he was out of sympthy with the Bolsheviks.

The preliminary work of the Boston Symphony is done by Koussevitzky in his study. Music litters the room, standing in stocks on the piano, tables and bureau. Diplomas and citations cover the walls.

Koussevitzky sits in an easy chair before a music stand to study the score of forthcoming concerts. However well he knows the music he is going to conduct, he always rehearshes at home before he rehearses the orchestra.

At actual performances the haughty, gray-haired Russian is distinguished in appearance in his dress clothes. At rehearsals, however, he becomes a tyrant hunching over in an old sweater, shouting, singing and waving frantically with his baton.

"You must zing," he shouts, "you must blay." His word is law because he can discharge members at will.

One legend says that Koussevitzky became disgusted with the sour notes one musician played. "You are fired. Ged out. Ged out!" the exasperated conductor shouted.

After the rehearsal the musician opened Koussevitaky's dressing room door and bellowed, "Nuts to you, Koussevitzky."

The conductor turned his head slowly and then snapped, "Ged out. It's too late to abologize."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
APR 1 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. TONAWANDA, N. Y.
EVENING NEWS
APR 15 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE
APR 15 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM LIBERAL, KANS.
SOUTHWEST TIMES
APR 15 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CATSKILL, N. Y.
MAIL
APR 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM ASHLAND, KY.
INDEPENDENT
APR 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. CLOUD, MINN.
TIMES-JOURNAL
APR 1 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
APR 10 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
APR 5 - 1940

BOSTONIANS PLAY TWO SYMPHONIES

Contrast Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Sixths may be much too elemental for the polytonalist, yet harmonize altogether agreeably for those simple souls who still find musical beauty in the symphonies of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky. It might be said that no two works of the symphonic species are further apart in spirit than the "Pastoral" of the German and the "Pathetic" of the Russian. But it was to be surmised that the success of the juxtaposition of the two sixths on last night's program of the Boston Symphony was not exclusively something of effective contrast, as between the jovial and the tragic.

The superb performances given these works by Serge Koussevitzky and his glowing ensemble clove to the essential genius of each, and genius in music is not solely something of mood. Beyond recognition of the technical mastery with which a Beethoven and, yes, a Tchaikovsky, turns his inspiration to account, there persists the hoary notion that inspiration of itself is of importance. All signs and portents at this concert tended to support the notion, and in so doing to establish a kinship between the two ostensibly opposite works, with their perennially fresh melodies, their apt and beautiful scoring, their sincere and direct utterance.

It is the kinship of musicality, which may, after all, be only another word for inspiration; but is, at any rate, the opposite of the juiceless, the cerebral, the manufactured, the sterile and the repellent. If some there are who regard the melodic ideas of the "Pathetic" as inferior and even banal, this reviewer can supply them with the names and addresses of well-grounded musicians and music lovers who will argue the same about the cherished "Pastoral." Every one to his taste, said the Queen as she kissed the cow.

What really concerns the record is that this was the last Thursday night concert of this season's series by the Bostonians in Carnegie Hall and that performances of the highest quality were rapturously received. In the case of the "Pathetic" there was a spontaneous outburst of applause after the march, which was of stunning brilliance as played. Equally a tribute to Mr. Koussevitzky's deeply moving achievement of the closing adagio lamentoso was the circumstance that only a few felt impelled to applaud at all.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
APR 5 - 1940

Koussevitzky Plays 'Pathetic' Symphony

By GRENA BENNETT.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony that gave a concert in Carnegie Hall last evening, has enrolled as one of the celebrants of the Tschaikovsky Centenary which will be observed early next month. Accordingly, he included in last night's program the great Russian composer's most popular work, the "Pathetic" symphony. Since its world premiere, a matter of three weeks before its melancholy composer's death, the symphony has been a favorite number with every important symphonic organization, a work of compelling substance, profound harmonies and intriguing instrumentation. Mr. Koussevitzky read it with imagination and distinction; a revelation of the structure and significance of its brooding mysteries; vital in tonal color and expression, and with deep emotional conviction.

Only two compositions comprised the program which began with Beethoven's beguiling "Pastoral" symphony, into which was read a fusion of beautiful tonal tints; phrases outlined and polished with a true sense of symmetry; and a general effect of perfect proportion and blending securely maintained.

The Bostonians will appear this evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music performing Beethoven's First Symphony, Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" and Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony. The last named work will have its third metropolitan presentation tomorrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
APR 4 - 1940

ALL-STRAVINSKY PROGRAM IS GIVEN BY PHILHARMONIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

Words and Music

Igor Stravinsky came back to the Philharmonic Symphony last night to finish his term as guest conductor. The program at Carnegie Hall was all-Stravinsky—the works, "Le Chant du Rossignol," "L'Oiseau de Feu" and "Le Sacre du Printemps."

The Russian composer's music has not languished this season. Both the public and students of music are now in a position to know exactly how this music should sound since Mr. Stravinsky, himself, has taken the trouble to disclose it to us.

We have heard, exactly how the famous ballets, the chamber music and the concerto for two pianos should go. Yet some who have heard Mr. Stravinsky conduct his works have found them less exciting than they are under more professional leadership.

Somehow, Mr. Stravinsky fails to animate his own compositions, though he must necessarily know more about them than Mr. Stokowski or Dr. Koussevitsky. We often lament the fact that it is not possible for us to hear Beethoven or Brahms interpret their symphonies. Yet it is possible that the contemporary audiences who heard Brahms and Beethoven conduct their own works preferred to listen to these masterpieces under other direction.

Like his master, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Mr. Stravinsky has beguiled the world with musical fairy tales. At the moment realities are so pressing that it should be pleasant to escape into Mr. Stravinsky's land of firebirds, nightingales and animated puppets. Yet, strange to say, this music lover succumbs to restlessness at an all-Stravinsky evening and longs for the breath of human emotion, of actual strife and sorrow, to remind him of a harsh and vital planet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

APR 4 - 1940

Conductor Is Congratulated

Dr. Robert C. Clothier, president of Rutgers University, congratulates Dr. Serge Koussevitzky just before his departure after the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. The performance, last in the university series, drew the largest audience of music lovers to attend an event at the gymnasium. Dr. Koussevitzky is an honorary alumnus of Rutgers. He was presented with a degree after a concert several years ago.

Record Audience at Rutgers Hears Koussevitzky Conduct

3,600 Cheer Program of Boston Symphony Orchestra; Beethoven and Tschaikowsky Symphonies Played

By MARY PURNELL

Last night's audience of 3,600 at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Rutgers gymnasium gave double applause to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, as if to show enthusiasm for the performance and at the same time welcome him after an absence of two years. Dr. Koussevitzky was prevented by illness from directing last year.

Extra chairs were placed in regular sections of seats to accommodate the largest audience which has attended any of the concerts to date.

A happy program of familiar composers played by the favorite musical group of the local audience was also responsible for the prolonged cheers which greeted the orchestra and conductor after the final concert in the Rutgers series.

Works presented were the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" by Mozart; Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Op. 60, marked Adagio-Allegro vivace, Adagio, Allegro vivace-Trio: un poco meno allegro and Finale: Allegro, ma non troppo; Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64, marked Andante-Allegro con anima, Andante cantabile con alcuna licenza, Valse (Allegro moderato), Finale (Andante maestoso)—Allegro vivace.

Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" opened the program auspiciously with its vivacity and gay spirit. Overshadowed in retrospect by larger frames and more exuberant harmonies of the symphonies, it was nevertheless among the highest pleasures of the evening by reason of its jocund vitality.

The B-flat Major symphony was a refreshing addition to the program. Whatever may be lacking in vast intellectual import is compensated for in adroitness of treatment and an easy enjoyability.

Beethoven Symphony

Dr. Koussevitzky and members of the orchestra appreciatively evoked a Beethoven waggish and gay in the lively phrases. The emphatic change from brittle pizzicato in the introduction to the boldness of full orchestral chords in the enunciation of the first theme of the first movement; the provocative rhythm of strings and then of kettle drums matched in the second movement against passages of exquisite lyricism; the skill of the scherzo—all these bespoke Beethoven in characteristic style, in spite of the unusually lighthearted subject matter. The final movement sparkled with spontaneity. Unceasing in drive, except for the telling little descending figure just before the final chords, this movement showed itself temperamentally—although not technically—akin to the scherzo.

For most of the audience of course, the Tschaikowsky symphony was the supreme delight, interpreted as it was by these experts in Russian music. (Perhaps if Tschaikowsky could first have heard this work with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, instead of under the composer's own somewhat ineffective baton, he might have felt kindlier toward his Fifth Symphony.)

The appeal of the symphony was the same as ever: the strings in the first movement sang with overwhelming emotion; the Andante cantabile gave forth its compelling melodies; the facile waltz unfolded beneath its spiraling ornamentations; the great pinnacles of sound emerged in the torrential finale.

Added to this familiar charm, however, were the superb handling of instruments—the brasses were dazzling—and the inspired attention to details of tone and interpretation. This care and perfection were typical of the entire program.

Although last night's concert was the final one of the Rutgers series, another event of unusual interest to local music lovers has been arranged. Nelson Eddy will sing at the gymnasium on April 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 5 - 1940

NOTABLE PROGRAM BY KOUSSEVITZKY

He Directs Boston Symphony in Works of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky

ANNIVERSARY OF LATTER

His 'Pathetic' Symphony Played 100 Years After Birth—Also Beethoven's 'Pastoral'

By OLIN DOWNES

The program given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall consisted of two very familiar masterpieces—none the less significant and engrossing for that fact — the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony and Tchaikovsky's "Symphonie Pathétique."

The latter work and the Russian composer's Fifth symphony, which will be heard tomorrow, have been given places on the Boston Symphony programs of the week in this city, in observance of the one-hundredth anniversary of Tchaikovsky's birth, the exact date of which was May 7, 1840. The juxtaposition of the two symphonies last night, aside from superlative features of their performance, was cunning program-making. Nothing could have thrown Tchaikovsky's score into stronger relief, or provided a more welcome foil to its intensities, than Beethoven's simple, clear, seren tone-picture of nature. And the "Pastoral" symphony was wonderfully played, with the beauty and transparency of tone, the fineness of phrasing, the deep feeling and genuine simplicity which matched its conception and style.

Then Dr. Koussevitzky proceeded with the unique and incomparable symphony of Tchaikovsky, which has withstood the ravages of the worst foes of an art work—immense popularity and the mistreatments of second-class interpreters who find that they cannot make a failure with this passionate, sincere, inspired music. The "Pathetic" symphony has outlived these persecutions by inferior minds, as the most popular works of Verdi, Beethoven, Chopin and Wagner have survived them. For it is a masterpiece universally comprehensible and proof against any detraction. How often has Tchaikovsky, particularly in the instance of this symphony, been held up to scorn by the purists and intellectuals, who drew their skirts away in horror at his unconcealed and uninhibited emotionalism, the directness of his melodic style, and what they were pleased to call his hysteria, extravagance, exhibitionism and self-pity. By every test of inspiration and craftsmanship, the "Pathetic" symphony is a masterpiece, irresistibly appealing.

Tchaikovsky's Method

Tchaikovsky alters the symphonic form to his purposes no less audaciously than Beethoven adapted it to his. Witness the return to the recapitulation, by means of the tremendous climax that works downwards over the great F-sharp "pedal," and the masterly elision of the first theme, in the opening movement; the unprecedented rhythmic treatment and the curious trio of the succeeding section; the entire form and development of the frantic scherzo-march, conception wholly unparalleled and original with Tchaikovsky, and the great lamentation for man and the end of his desires in his noble and tragic finale.

It is of course Tchaikovsky's greatest symphony, the one which most potently commends him to immortality. This is said with due respect to significant pages and movements of the Tchaikovsky symphony to be heard tomorrow. So much is this the case that in some respects the "Pathetic" could be called the composer's first complete self-expression in the symphonic form, one which brings to summation all that Tchaikovsky had attempted in previous works, and that marks new paths which that unfortunate man of genius would have followed had it not been for his most untimely taking off—one of the greatest tragedies of modern music—at the age of 53. Schubert, Mozart, Chopin, Weber—these men had found themselves long before they died. Tchaikovsky, after terrific struggles with his creative angel, was on the threshold of his greatness.

Audience Profoundly Impressed

The audience last night was impressed profoundly and anew with these creative qualities as they listened to the great threnody. Certain of its pages had unexpected light thrown upon them by Dr. Koussevitzky. Some might disagree with details of his conception. They might say, for example, of the first movement that they preferred their Tchaikovsky projected with more frankness and less restraint. Dr. Koussevitzky saw the music, apparently, in a far more introspective and less theatrical light. The movement in many places was toned down, although this did not rob it of its poignancy and beauty and the sable splendor of the instrumental dress.

The wailing middle section of the second movement, in the five-four rhythm, was taken conspicuously slower than the rest of it, and with remarkable effect, over the pounding drum. But the sardonic and fantastical march, battle-drunk, couched in terms of triumph, actually terrible in its recklessness, its elemental power and utter despair, was loosed from the instruments with an irresistible fury.

At this point, quite properly, and despite the ridiculous affectation which now obtains at our orchestral concerts, whereby there shall be no applause between movements, the audience disregarded the conductor's back and broke into excited applause.—a gratifying exhibition of normal musical instinct and natural responsiveness to a thrilling sensation. No symphony in the repertory is a better illustration than this one of the wholly illogical convention by which the listeners can applaud after the finale of the "Pathetic" symphony, which casts a spell of tragedy but cannot follow its well-founded impulse to release its enthusiasm at the end of the brilliant preceding movement.

As a matter of fact, the conductor did contrive, by his own un-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

APR 6 - 1940

WHICH story is correct? One recent article published in a well-known periodical said that Sergei Alenandrovitch Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was 76 years of age. Then shortly afterwards we read another which said he was 66 this year. Somehow that dynamic musician's actual years do not show and he seems more like 46 years old. The musical encyclopedia states that one "Serge Koussevitzky was born in Vishni Volochok, Russia, in 1874. In our arithmatical figuring he does not exceed the 66-year post on life's road.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PLAINSFIELD, N. J.
COURIER-NEWS

APR 6 - 1940

Boston Symphony Closes Rutgers Concert Series

By G. C.

A large number of Plainfield devotees of orchestral music were present last Wednesday evening at the concert given by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the final event in the subscription series offered by Rutgers University. Three numbers: "Overture" to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro"; Beethoven's "Symphony No. 4," and Tchaikowsky's "Symphony No. 5," made up the program, and an audience that filled every seat in the gymasium applauded the music, the conductor, and the orchestra with a high degree of ethusiasm.

The offering of these particular Beethoven and Tchaikowsky Symphonies during the same evening attest the conductor's insight as a program-builder. The Beethoven, at this late date, seems so sparing in its orchestration, and impresses contemporary listeners with the fact that the composer was, in this case above all else, a master craftsman, writing with deftness of counterpoint and correctness of form, let the music be what it may. The Tchaikowsky, on the other hand, so lavish in its orchestration with its singing 'cellos, melancholy horns, and tympani that beat out the very heart-throbs of life subjugates everything to the musical expression, let the craftsmanship and form be what they will thereafter.

Although Dr. Koussevitsky was not in his most inspired mood, both symphonies and the Mozart overture were played with much of the spirit and all of the finesse for which the Boston Orchestra is noted, and next season's concert by this famous symphonic organization, already announced, will be eagerly awaited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 5 - 1940

Koussevitzky Leads Season's Final Concert

Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Played on Last Program of Boston Symphony Here

By Jerome D. Bohm

Serge Koussevitzky is ordinarily the most adventurous of our orchestral program makers. But last night at the fifth and final evening concert of the season of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall he followed in conventional paths and chose to set forth two of the most familiar symphonies — Beethoven's Sixth, the "Pastoral" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth, the "Pathetique." Since Tchaikovsky was born on May 7, 1840, this performance of his most popular symphony may be regarded as in the nature of a commemorative one.

There is a deceptive simplicity about Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, which makes it one of the composer's most difficult creations to interpret convincingly. The enchantingly naive quality of its bucolic melodies and the devotional attributes of the closing pages are difficult to capture and convey to present-day listeners. Especially elusive is the "Scene am Bach," which in the hands of most conductors assumes Mississippian lengths. However, Mr. Koussevitzky proved an uncommonly persuasive discourser of this music. His pacing was at all times just, and the transparently glowing tonal sheen with which the score was invested was wholly apposite and beguiling. There were a few infelicitous moments contributed by the horns in the final movement. Otherwise the performance was an irreproachable one.

The oftener one hears Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony the greater grows the conviction that his genius was essentially that of an adolescent who never matured. Its first and last movements give voice to the "Weltschmerz" of a man in his fifties who suffered the emotions of an hysterical youth. The quick movements are at best inflated ballet music.

There could be no question as to

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 6 - 1940

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concludes Season at Academy

Concert Attended by Capacity Audience—Koussevitzky Conducts

By PAUL J. BROWN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, last night at the Academy of Music, concluded with a figurative burst of glory its five-concert, fifty-ninth Brooklyn season. The concert was attended by a capacity audience that was most enthusiastic and unusually attentive.

While the entire program was of a very high order, most appropriately it was the work which concluded that program and therefore the reason that was of commanding stature, of itself and in its presentation. To continue the progression, although that final work, Tchaikowsky's sixth (Pathetic) symphony, was played excellently in its entirety, the very lively third movement and the fourth, show and "lamentosi" were best of all. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men seem to play the Tchaikowsky Sixth, with all its beauty, mood and sorority, beyond themselves.

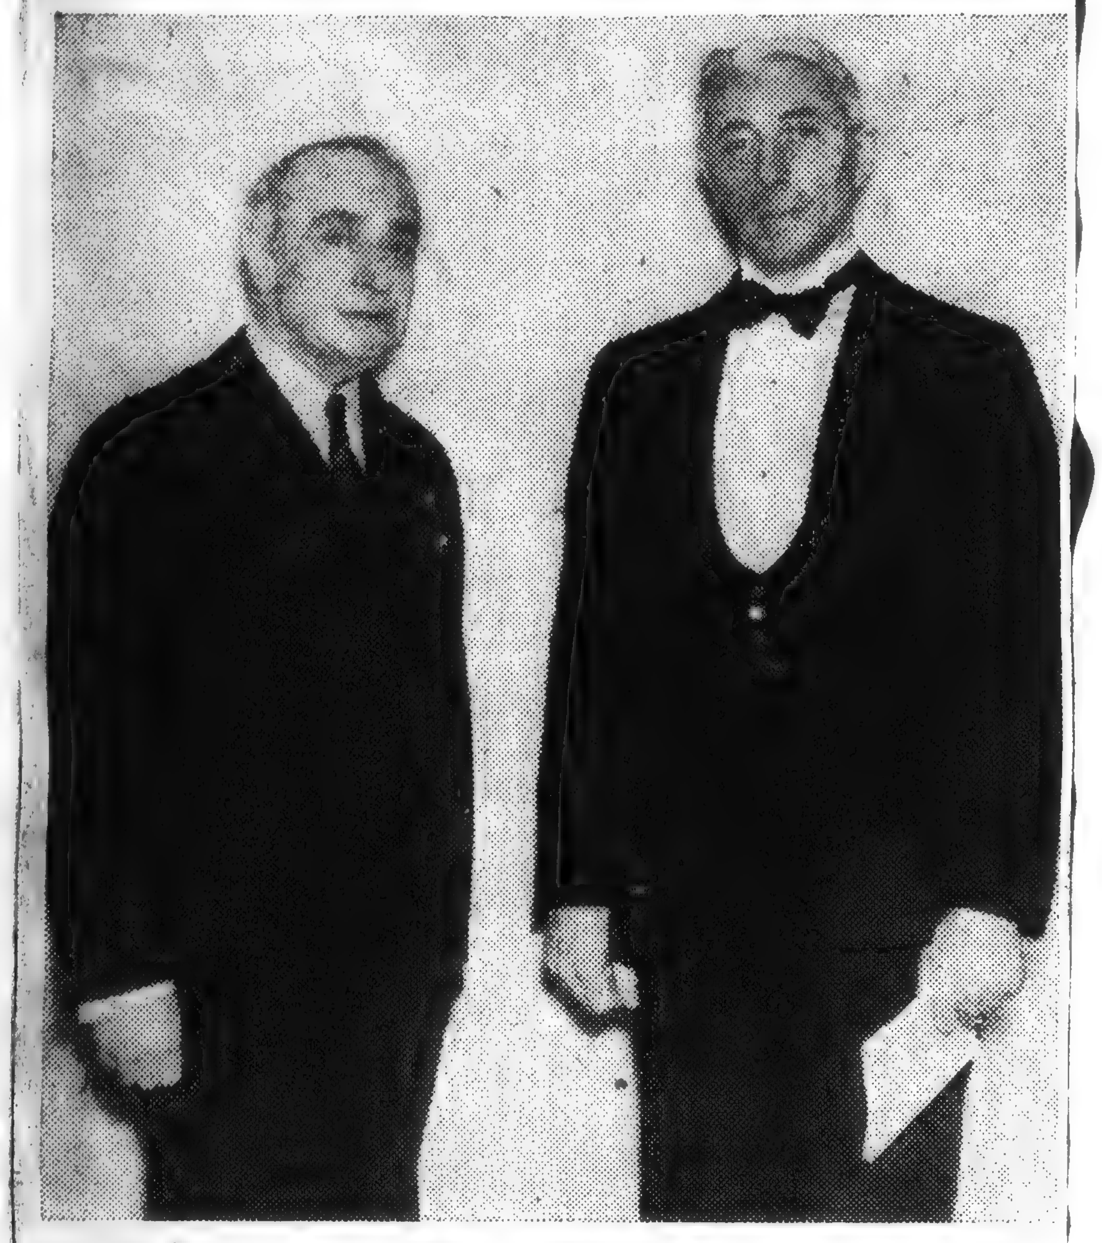
The program opened with Beethoven's First Symphony, which for all its musical value, never will outlive the "opprobrium" of being minor Beethoven. The orchestra did not excel in its presentation, but it did much better in playing the Second Suite fro mRavel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its sixtieth Brooklyn concert series next season. The dates announced last night for the 1940-41 concerts, will be Nov. 22, Jan. 18 Feb. 13, March 14 and April 4.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

APR 4 - 1940

Conductor Is Congratulated



Dr. Robert C. Clothier, president of Rutgers University, congratulates Dr. Serge Koussevitzky just before his departure after the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. The performance, last in the university series, drew the largest audience of music lovers to attend an event at the gymnasium. Dr. Koussevitzky is an honorary alumnus of Rutgers. He was presented with a degree after a concert several years ago.

Record Audience at Rutgers Hears Koussevitzky Conduct

3,600 Cheer Program of Boston Symphony Orchestra; Beethoven and Tschaikowsky Symphonies Played

By MARY PURNELL

Last night's audience of 3,600 at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Rutgers gymnasium gave double applause to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, as if to show enthusiasm for the performance and at the same time welcome him after an absence of two years. Dr. Koussevitzky was prevented by illness from directing last year.

Extra chairs were placed in regular sections of seats to accommodate the largest audience which has attended any of the concerts to date.

A happy program of familiar composers played by the favorite musical group of the local audience was also responsible for the prolonged cheers which greeted the orchestra and conductor after the final concert in the Rutgers series.

Works presented were the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" by Mozart; Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Op. 60, marked Adagio-Allegro vivace, Adagio, Allegro vivace-Trio: un poco meno allegro and Finale: Allegro, ma non troppo; Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64, marked Andante-Allegro con anima, Andante cantabile con alcuna licenza, Valse (Allegro moderato), Finale (Andante maestoso)—Allegro vivace.

Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" opened the program auspiciously with its vivacity and gay spirit. Overshadowed in retrospect by larger frames and more exuberant harmonies of the symphonies, it was nevertheless among the highest pleasures of the evening by reason of its jocund vitality.

The B-flat Major symphony was a refreshing addition to the program. Whatever may be lacking in vast intellectual import is compensated for in adroitness of treatment and an easy enjoyability.

Beethoven Symphony

Dr. Koussevitzky and members of the orchestra appreciatively evoked a Beethoven waggish and gay in the lively phrases. The emphatic change from brittle pizzicato in the introduction to the boldness of full orchestral chords in the enunciation of the first theme of the first movement; the provocative rhythm of strings and then of kettle drums matched in the second movement against passages of exquisite lyricism; the skill of the scherzo—all these bespoke Beethoven in characteristic style, in spite of the unusually lighthearted subject matter. The final movement sparkled with spontaneity. Unceasing in drive, except for the telling little descending figure just before the final chords, this movement showed itself temperamentally—although not technically—akin to the scherzo.

For most of the audience of course, the Tschaikowsky symphony was the supreme delight, interpreted as it was by these experts in Russian music. (Perhaps if Tschaikowsky could first have heard this work with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, instead of under the composer's own somewhat ineffective baton, he might have felt kindlier toward his Fifth Symphony.)

The appeal of the symphony was the same as ever: the strings in the first movement sang with overwhelming emotion; the Andante cantabile gave forth its compelling melodies; the facile waltz unfolded beneath its spiraling ornamentations; the great pinnacles of sound emerged in the torrential finale.

Added to this familiar charm, however, were the superb handling of instruments—the brasses were dazzling—and the inspired attention to details of tone and interpretation. This care and perfection were typical of the entire program.

Although last night's concert was the final one of the Rutgers series, another event of unusual interest to local music lovers has been arranged. Nelson Eddy will sing at the gymnasium on April 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 5 - 1940

NOTABLE PROGRAM BY KOUSSEVITZKY

He Directs Boston Symphony in Works of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky

ANNIVERSARY OF LATTER

His 'Pathetic' Symphony Played 100 Years After Birth—Also Beethoven's 'Pastoral'

By OLIN DOWNES

The program given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall consisted of two very familiar masterpieces—none the less significant and engrossing for that fact — the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony and Tchaikovsky's "Symphonie Pathétique."

The latter work and the Russian composer's Fifth symphony, which will be heard tomorrow, have been given places on the Boston Symphony programs of the week in this city, in observance of the one-hundredth anniversary of Tchaikovsky's birth, the exact date of which was May 7, 1840. The juxtaposition of the two symphonies last night, aside from superlative features of their performance, was cunning program-making. Nothing could have thrown Tchaikovsky's score into stronger relief, or provided a more welcome foil to its intensities, than Beethoven's simple, clear, seren tone-picture of nature. And the "Pastoral" symphony was wonderfully played, with the beauty and transparency of tone, the fineness of phrasing, the deep feeling and genuine simplicity which matched its conception and style.

Then Dr. Koussevitzky proceeded with the unique and incomparable symphony of Tchaikovsky, which has withstood the ravages of the worst foes of an art work—immense popularity and the mistreatments of second-class interpreters who find that they cannot make a failure with this passionate, sincere, inspired music. The "Pathetic" symphony has outlived these persecutions by inferior minds, as the most popular works of Verdi, Beethoven, Chopin and Wagner have survived them. For it is a masterpiece universally comprehensible and proof against any detraction. How often has Tchaikovsky, particularly in the instance of this symphony, been held up to scorn by the purists and intellectuals, who drew their skirts away in horror at his unconcealed and uninhibited emotionalism, the directness of his melodic style, and what they were pleased to call his hysteria, extravagance, exhibitionism and self-pity. By every test of inspiration and craftsmanship, the "Pathetic" symphony is a masterpiece, irresistibly appealing.

Tchaikovsky's Method

Tchaikovsky alters the symphonic form to his purposes no less audaciously than Beethoven adapted it to his. Witness the return to the recapitulation, by means of the tremendous climax that works downwards over the great F-sharp "pedal," and the masterly elision of the first theme, in the opening movement; the unprecedented rhythmic treatment and the curious trio of the succeeding section; the entire form and development of the frantic scherzo-march, conception wholly unparalleled and original with Tchaikovsky, and the great lamentation for man and the end of his desires in his noble and tragic finale.

It is of course Tchaikovsky's greatest symphony, the one which most potently commends him to immortality. This is said with due respect to significant pages and movements of the Tchaikovsky symphony to be heard tomorrow. So much is this the case that in some respects the "Pathetic" could be called the composer's first complete self-expression in the symphonic form, one which brings to summation all that Tchaikovsky had attempted in previous works, and that marks new paths which that unfortunate man of genius would have followed had it not been for his most untimely taking off—one of the greatest tragedies of modern music—at the age of 53. Schubert, Mozart, Chopin, Weber—these men had found themselves long before they died. Tchaikovsky, after terrific struggles with his creative angel, was on the threshold of his greatness.

Audience Profoundly Impressed

The audience last night was impressed profoundly and anew with these creative qualities as they listened to the great threnody. Certain of its pages had unexpected light thrown upon them by Dr. Koussevitzky. Some might disagree with details of his conception. They might say, for example, of the first movement that they preferred their Tchaikovsky projected with more frankness and less restraint. Dr. Koussevitzky saw the music, apparently, in a far more introspective and less theatrical light. The movement in many places was toned down, although this did not rob it of its poignancy and beauty and the sable splendor of the instrumental dress.

The wailing middle section of the second movement, in the five-four rhythm, was taken conspicuously slower than the rest of it, and with remarkable effect, over the pounding drum. But the sardonic and fantastical march, battle-drunk, couched in terms of triumph, actually terrible in its recklessness, its elemental power and utter despair, was loosed from the instruments with an irresistible fury.

At this point, quite properly, and despite the ridiculous affectation which now obtains at our orchestral concerts, whereby there shall be no applause between movements, the audience disregarded the conductor's back and broke into excited applause.—a gratifying exhibition of normal musical instinct and natural responsiveness to a thrilling sensation. No symphony in the repertory is a better illustration than this one of the wholly illogical convention by which the listeners can applaud after the finale of the "Pathetic" symphony, which casts a spell of tragedy but cannot follow its well-founded impulse to release its enthusiasm at the end of the brilliant preceding movement.

As a matter of fact, the conductor did contrive, by his own unchanged attitude and averted face, to enforce a moment of complete silence as the last notes of the symphony faded into nothingness after an extraordinary performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

APR 6 - 1940

WHICH story is correct? One recent article published in a well-known periodical said that Sergei Alenandrovitch Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was 76 years of age. Then shortly afterwards we read another which said he was 66 this year. Somehow that dynamic musician's actual years do not show and he seems more like 46 years old. The musical encyclopedia states that one "Serge Koussevitzky was born in Vishni Volochok, Russia, in 1874. In our arithmatical figuring he does not exceed the 66-year post on life's road.

---

phony Orchestra as the final event in the subscription series offered by Rutgers University. Three numbers: "Overture" to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro"; Beethoven's "Symphony No. 4," and Tchaikowsky's "Symphony No. 5," made up the program, and an audience that filled every seat in the gymasium applauded the music, the conductor, and the orchestra with a high degree of ethusiasm.

The offering of these particular Beethoven and Tchaikowsky Symphonies during the same evening attest the conductor's insight as a program-builder. The Beethoven, at this late date, seems so sparing in its orchestration, and impresses contemporary listeners with the fact that the composer was, in this case above all else, a master craftsman, writing with deftness of counterpoint and correctness of form, let the music be what it may. The Tchaikowsky, on the other hand, so lavish in its orchestration with its singing 'cellos, melancholy horns, and tympani that beat out the very heart-throbs of life subjugates everything to the musical expression, let the craftsmanship and form be what they will thereafter.

Although Dr. Koussevitsky was not in his most inspired mood, both symphonies and the Mozart overture were played with much of the spirit and all of the finesse for which the Boston Orchestra is noted, and next season's concert by this famous symphonic organization, already announced, will be eagerly awaited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 5 - 1940

Koussevitzky Leads Season's Final Concert

Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Played on Last Program of Boston Symphony Here

By Jerome D. Bohm

Serge Koussevitzky is ordinarily the most adventurous of our orchestral program makers. But last night at the fifth and final evening concert of the season of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall he followed in conventional paths and chose to set forth two of the most familiar symphonies — Beethoven's Sixth, the "Pastoral" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth, the "Pathetique." Since Tchaikovsky was born on May 7, 1840, this performance of his most popular symphony may be regarded as in the nature of a commemorative one.

There is a deceptive simplicity about Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, which makes it one of the composer's most difficult creations to interpret convincingly. The enchantingly naive quality of its bucolic melodies and the devotional attributes of the closing pages are difficult to capture and convey to present-day listeners. Especially elusive is the "Scene am Bach," which in the hands of most conductors assumes Mississippian lengths. However, Mr. Koussevitzky proved an uncommonly persuasive discourser of this music. His pacing was at all times just, and the transparently glowing tonal sheen with which the score was invested was wholly apposite and beguiling. There were a few infelicitous moments contributed by the horns in the final movement. Otherwise the performance was an irreproachable one.

The oftener one hears Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony the greater grows the conviction that his genius was essentially that of an adolescent who never matured. Its first and last movements give voice to the "Weltschmerz" of a man in his fifties who suffered the emotions of an hysterical youth. The quick movements are at best inflated ballet music.

There could be no question as to Mr. Koussevitzky's sympathies with his countryman's product. Burning sincerity characterized his interpretation of every measure of the symphony. Yet the publication thereof was a less consentaneous one than that accorded the Beethoven symphony. The customary huge audience attended and there was no want of expressions of approval.

---

ra, ky, sic, urst of glory inth
Brooklyn season. The conc was attended by a capacity audience that was most enthusiastic and unusually attentive.

While the entire program was of a very high order, most appropriately it was the work which concluded that program and therefore the reason that was of commanding stature, of itself and in its presentation. To continue the progression, although that final work, Tchaikowsky's sixth (Pathetic) symphony, was played excellently in its entirety, the very lively third movement and the fourth, show and "lamentosi" were best of all. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men seem to play the Tchaikowsky Sixth, with all its beauty, mood and sorority, beyond themselves.

The program opened with Beethoven's First Symphony, which for all its musical value, never will outlive the "opprobrium" of being minor Beethoven. The orchestra did not excel in its presentation, but it did much better in playing the Second Suite fro mRavel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its sixtieth Brooklyn concert series next season. The dates announced last night for the 1940-41 concerts, will be Nov. 22, Jan. 18 Feb. 13, March 14 and April 4.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 5 - 1940

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Two Sixths can make a whole when the Boston Symphony Orchestra devotes an entire evening to playing Beethoven's Sixth Symphony and Tchaikowsky's Sixth Symphony. To add to the alliterative nature of the program, it is only necessary to point out that both works have titles beginning with "P" since the Beethoven work is known as the "Pastoral" and the Tchaikowsky as the "Pathetic." One might add still further that both works appear to be extremely personal utterances of their respective composers. Perhaps at that point similarity ends.

The concert in Carnegie Hall last night was a memorable finale to a brilliant season for the visitors' Thursday evening series. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men were much in the vein and the superlative qualities of the orchestra and its master conductor were as much in evidence as ever before.

If the performance of the music did not completely suffice for the listener, he was afforded an excellent opportunity to speculate on the character of two symphonies representing the two poles of the nineteenth century. There was the Beethoven, written in 1808, revealing the great love that the composer had for nature and expressing that feeling with a certain classic restraint; there was the Tchaikowsky, written in 1893, revealing the great lover that the composer had for human nature and expressing that feeling with glowing wholeheartedness. Both composers were master craftsmen after their kind: one had the "classic" orchestra capable of limited tonal color, the other had the "modern" orchestra capable of the gamut of tonal color. But these are only surface contracts; there are many others which might have occurred to a speculative music lover.

The performance of the Tchaikowsky may be shared by still another audience, for this work will conclude the Boston Symphony's concert at the Academy of Music tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 6 - 1940

Koussevitzky Leads Season's Final Concert

Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Played on Last Program of Boston Symphony Here

By Jerome D. Bohm

Serge Koussevitzky is ordinarily the most adventurous of our orchestral program makers. But Thursday night, at the fifth and final evening concert of the season of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall, he followed in conventional paths and chose to set forth two of the most familiar symphonies — Beethoven's Sixth, the "Pastoral," and Tchaikovsky's Sixth, the "Pathetique." Since Tchaikovsky was born on May 7, 1840, this performance of his most popular symphony may be regarded as in the nature of a commemorative one.

There is a deceptive simplicity about Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony which makes it one of the composer's most difficult creations to interpret convincingly. The enchantingly naive quality of its bucolic melodies and the devotional attributes of the closing pages are difficult to capture and convey to present-day listeners. Especially elusive is the "Scene am Bach," which in the hands of most conductors assumes Mississippian lengths. However, Mr. Koussevitzky proved an uncommonly persuasive discourser of this music. His pacing was at all times just, and the transparently glowing tonal sheen with which the score was invested was wholly apposite and beguiling. There were a few infelicitous moments contributed by the horns in the final movement. Otherwise the performance was an irreproachable one.

The oftener one hears Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony the greater grows the conviction that his genius was essentially that of an adolescent who never matured. Its first and last movements give voice to the "Weltschmerz" of a man in his fifties who suffered the emotions of a hysterical youth. The quick movements are, at best, inflated ballet music.

There could be no question as to Mr. Koussevitzky's sympathies with his countryman's product. Burning sincerity characterized his interpretation of every measure of the symphony. Yet the publication thereof was a less consentaneous one than that accorded the Beethoven symphony. The customary huge audience attended and there was no want of expressions of approval.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT RADIOSCOPE, SATURDAY, APRIL 6, 1940

Guest Conducts Philharmonic

Igor Stravinsky, world-famous composer, who will direct the New York Philharmonic in a program of his own music. Sunday (WEEI, 3 P.M.).

Stravinsky to Direct His 'Petroushka' Suite

The distinguished Russian composer Igor Stravinsky, will appear as guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society tomorrow afternoon at 3 over Station WEEI, playing suites from his "Petroushka," "Fire Bird" and "Rite of Spring" ballets.

The "Petroushka" ballet Mr. Montagu-Nathan has excellently described as follows: "Prior to the raising of the first curtain the music has an expectant character and the varied rhythmic treatment of a melodic figure which has a distinct folk-tune flavor has all the air of inviting conjecture as to what is about to happen. Once the curtain goes up we are immediately aware that we are in the midst of a carnival, and are prepared for some strange sights. The music describes the nature of the crowd magnificently. . . . Presently the showman begins to attract his audience, and, preparatory to opening his curtain, plays a few mildly florid passages on his flute. With his final flourish he animates his puppets. They have been endowed by the showman with human feelings and emotions. Petroushka is ugly and consequently the most sensitive. He endeavors to console himself for his master's cruelty by exciting the sympathy and winning the love of his fellow doll, the Ballerina, but in this he is less successful than the callous and brutal Moor, the remaining unit in the trio of puppets."

After the Russian Dance which the puppets perform at their master's bidding, a roll on the side drum leads into the next scene. "The unsuccessful courtship is now enacted and then the scene is again changed to the Moor's apartment, where, after a monotonous droning dance, the captivation of the Ballerina takes place. There are from time to time musical figures recalling the showman's flute flourishes . . . the scene ends with the summary ejection of that unfortunate (Petroushka), and the drum once more bridges the change of scene.

In the last tableau the Carnival, with its consecutive common chords, is resumed. The nurses' dance which is of folk origin, is one of several items of decorative music, some of them, like the episode of the man with the bear, and the merchant's accordion, being fragmentary. . . .

"When the fun is at its height, it is suddenly interrupted by Petroushka's frenzied flight from the little theater. He is pursued by the Moor, whom the cause of their jealousy tries vainly to hold in check. To the consternation of the spectators, Petroushka is slain by a stroke of the cruel Moor's sword, and a tap on the tambour de Basque.

"The showman has demonstrated to the satisfaction of the gay crowd that Petroushka is only a doll."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 6 - 1940

Mrs. Prince Dinner Hostess; Party Precedes Final Concert By Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mrs. Benjamin Prince of No. 876 Park avenue, Manhattan, gave a dinner at her home last evening preceding the season's nal concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Later the group occupied Mrs. Prince's box at the concert. In the party were Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald, Mr. and Mrs. Eric Hall Haight, Eugene W. Bolling and Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikalenkoff.

Among the others who entertained at the concert was Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, who was hostess in the box of Mrs. David C. Johnson. The guests were Mr. and Mrs. Francis O. Affeld Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Almet R. Latson, Jr., Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mr. Goodfellow and Alfred S. Haeussler.

Mrs. Dean C. Osborne entertained in her box for Mr. and Mrs. Donald G. Sinclair, Justice Lewis L. Fawcett, Mrs. A. L. Fawcett, Mrs. James M. Fawcett and Mrs. Theodore Frohne.

The Navy box was occupied by Captain and Mrs. C. W. O. Bunker, Captain and Mrs. C. G. Mayo and Captain and Mrs. T. B. Richey.

The Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association were represented in another box by Miss Adeline Pettit, Miss Emma Jessie Ogg, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Parker, Mr. and Mrs. Seymour Beardsley and Mr. and Mrs. William Slater.

Mrs. Oliver Goldsmith Carter, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Theodore Vosseler, Mrs. Edwin Patterson, Mrs. Jason Davis, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Frederick W. Burbank, occupied the box of the Brooklyn Woman's Club.

This concert was the final in a series of five given here this season by the orchestra, under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts of which Mr. Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport executive chairman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 6 - 1940

AMUSEMENTS

Boston Symphony Concludes Series

Koussevitzky Devotes Final Program To Beethoven, Ravel, Tschaikowsky

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Ravel came between Beethoven and Tchaikowsky in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night, thus setting the foreign note of the twentieth century in the midst of nineteenth century music. Otherwise Dr. Koussevitzky adhered closely to the two composers which appear to be his special concern during this final visit with the orchestra for this season. It was the Beethoven First, not the Sixth, that was heard on this program along with the Tchaikowsky Sixth, which was played in Manhattan on Thursday evening.

It was an evening of contrasts, for the Ravel presented an entirely different idiom from the symphonies, while they were in themselves poles apart in everything but the technical aspect of form. Those contrasts were made all the more apparent by the differentiation in the performances, since the entire evening was one to make an audience aware of what a wonderful musical instrument this great orchestra is. Beethoven, Ravel, Tchaikowsky—each one stood out in relief under the penetrating mastery of Koussevitzky.

The performance of the Beethoven was one to cherish not only for the classic purity of the earlier movements but also the rare delicacy of the Finale. The Ravel was a marvel of color not only in the music itself but also in the performance. In such a transparent reading one became aware of the fact that Ravel in such a work holds no kinship to the other impressionist, Debussy, but stands on his own feet as a composer in his own right. By way of record, it should be pointed out that the applause of the audience after the Ravel was as much a tribute to its own responsiveness as to the musicians' playing.

But the towering achievement of the evening was the Tchaikowsky. The love Koussevitzky bears to this music heightened the effect of a magnificent performance. If this music remains "an enigma" for want of a program, it may possibly be that the composer took life to be his province. The symphony starts in darkness in an off-key relationship, only to end in darkness at the close of the last movement. Could it be that the music represents an abstraction of the human soul in its progress out of eternity, through life, back into eternity? A closer analysis of the music bears out the idea as the groping beginning leads into the dramatic Allegro, with its storm and stress eventually giving way to the Andante cantabile. In turn, the third triumphant movement would represent the achievement of a lifetime; the fourth, old age and the return to eternity. Certainly in listening to its evolution in two successive performances such ideas gain credence.

While the impact of the third movement creates the greatest stir in an audience, it is in the other movements that the conductor reveals his greatness, especially where he appears through sheer magnetism to draw such richness of tone from the strings. One appreciates what the composer's "ppppp's" meant when Koussevitzky conducts and what intensity there is to those yearning measures of despair which are the main theme of the Finale. One believes in this symphony all the more after such a performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 7 - 1940

Serge Koussevitzky, the best interpreter of Sibelius' music extant, offers the contemporary master's fourth symphony at the Friday night-Saturday afternoon pair this week in Symphony Hall, Boston. Also programmed is Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 6 - 1940

MUSIC

WITHIN a few days New Yorkers had opportunities to experience those tonal wonders of the age—the playing of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky ~~and that of~~ the Philadelphia under Stokowski. The two conductors are extraordinary virtuosos in their medium; but there the similarity ends. The surprising continence of Koussevitzky's performance of Beethoven's First was a measure of his growth as a musician, the greater refinement of his taste in the presentation of older music; whereas Stokowski's increasingly lurid performances are a measure of his deterioration. And it was Koussevitzky's passionate love of music, his passionate desire to make the points in Strauss's "Don Quixote" as effective as possible, that caused him to kill them with overemphasis; but the hash Stokowski made of the Good Friday music of "Parsifal," among other things, represented his insensitiveness and indifference to anything in music but the opportunities it offers to produce gorgeous sounds and stunning effects with lush movements of his hands.

Stokowski at least offers the excitement of virtuosity, such as one gets from Horowitz on the piano or Heifetz on the violin; but Barbirolli does not offer even that to compensate for the musical defects of his performances and the wretchedness of his programs. If a director of an art gallery were to exhibit its collection defaced by his retouching the public clamor would cause him to be thrown out within a week. But Barbirolli, for four seasons, has been defacing Beethoven, Brahms, and in fact all the music in which he does not feel the restrictions imposed by the style of Haydn and Mozart; the press has been sour; even placid Friday afternoon dowagers have been moved to cancel subscriptions; yet he has been reengaged for two years, and the great New York Philharmonic Orchestra will celebrate its hundredth anniversary by exhibiting to an unadmiring world the mediocrity it has descended to under his direction.

LATEST
RECORDS
IMPORTED
RUSSIAN RECORDS!
BY Modern Russian Composers
Song of the Plains
Red Moscow
Kalinka
From Border to Border
Cossack's Song
and many others
SEND FOR COMPLETE LIST N
●
Phone CH 2-6744 OPEN EVENINGS
O. PAGANI & BRO.
289 Bleecker Street, corner 7th Avenue
New York, N. Y.

Nor is the reengagement more surprising, more conscienceless than the first engagement. Barbirolli was brought here to share the season of 1936-37 with several other conductors, but was engaged as sole permanent conductor after only a few weeks, before Enesco and Rodzinski had been heard and had demonstrated their overwhelming superiority; and this happened not because of any irresistible brilliance that Barbirolli exhibited in those few weeks, but because it did not take the manager of the orchestra, the directors, and the orchestra itself longer to discover that he was a man who in various ways made life pleasant for them—pleasanter for the orchestra, for example, than Rodzinski, who when he took charge later in the season had occasion not only to speak sharply about the deterioration in its playing but, worse still, to act vigorously about it and to make the orchestra ously. Barbirolli may do terrib to music; but one can well u how to Mr. Judson, to Mr.
Mrs. Pratt, and to the orchestra be more important that life pleasant for them than that well treated.

In his new 'Cello Concerto—given its first American perf
by Piatigorsky and the Boston S
—Prokofiev uses all the resour technique as ways of going elaborate motions of saying a when he is saying absolutely
And it is not surprising that th mannered pretense should im
Soviet Russian critic Kuznetzov quoted in the program notes a disapproved of the "salon spirit charming "Peter and the W having demanded of a comp
Prokofiev's stature nothing le
"earnestness and fidelity to h and as having observed that the concerto "re-creates successively the main stages of Prokofiev's inner evolution. This is not a panorama, but a synthesized, integrated picture. . . . The present Prokofiev is not yet as clearly discernible as the 'early Prokofiev' or the 'middle-of-the-road' Prokofiev. The Violoncello Concerto bears testimony of this. Its strongest points are in retrospection, totalizing the stages passed by the composer, rather than in its forward perspective. Prokofiev's creative crisis has not been solved, and it cannot be solved without protracted and concentrated effort."

Terms like "main stages of . . . evolution," "retrospection, totalizing the stages," "forward perspective," "crisis" refer to nothing in Prokofiev's music and to nothing that can be said in description or judgment of it; they are merely terms which are considered proper for criticism in Russia, because of the proper ideas about the close relation of art to economics (they recall a Daily Worker article some years ago on "A. F. of L.-ism in Music"). As such they are ways of going through required motions; and in this respect they are like the "formalism," "scholasticism," "didacticism" that were applied to Eisenstein, and also like the revolting epithets applied by workers in factories and scientists in laboratories to the Finns, or the revolting hymns of praise to "the peace policy of the Soviet Union, which always respects the rights of small nations." I refer to these political manifestations to make clear what is of concern to me as

---

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York

1842-1878
CONSOLIDATED 1928

1939 - NINETY-EIGHTH SEASON - 1940

CARNEGIE HALL

Wednesday Evening, April 3, 1940
AT EIGHT FORTY-FIVE

Friday Afternoon, April 5, 1940
AT TWO-THIRTY

3626TH AND 3627TH CONCERTS

Under the Direction of
IGOR STRAVINSKY
Guest Composer-Conductor

STRAVINSKY PROGRAM

1. Symphonic Poem, "Le Chant du Rossignol" ("The Nightingale's Song")
2. Suite from the Danced Story "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Firebird")
    - I. Introduction: The Firebird and her Dance
    - II. Dance of the Princesses
    - III. Infernal Dance of Kastcheï
    - IV. Berceuse
    - V. Finale

INTERMISSION

3. "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Consecration of the Spring"), Pictures of Pagan Russia
    - I. The Adoration of the Earth.
      Introduction—Harbingers of Spring—Dance of the Adolescents—Abduction—Spring Rounds—Games of the Rival Cities—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man)—Dance of the Earth.
    - II. The Sacrifice.
      Introduction—Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents—Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors—Ritual of the Ancestors—The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

---

* Instead of Thursday Evening Concert

ARTHUR JUDSON, Manager BRUNO ZIRATO, Assistant Manager
THE STEINWAY is the Official Piano of The Philharmonic-Symphony Society
VICTOR RECORDS

ORCHESTRA PENSION FUND—It is requested that subscribers who are unable to use their tickets, kindly return them to the Philharmonic-Symphony Offices, 113 West 57th Street, or to the Box Office, Carnegie Hall, to be sold for the benefit of the Orchestra Pension Fund. All tickets received will be acknowledged.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 6 - 1940

13

MUSIC

WITHIN a few days New Yorkers had opportunities to experience those tonal wonders of the age—the playing of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky ~~and that of~~ the Philadelphia under Stokowski. The two conductors are extraordinary virtuosos in their medium; but there the similarity ends. The surprising continence of Koussevitzky's performance of Beethoven's First was a measure of his growth as a musician, the greater refinement of his taste in the presentation of older music; whereas Stokowski's increasingly lurid performances are a measure of his deterioration. And it was Koussevitzky's passionate love of music, his passionate desire to make the points in Strauss's "Don Quixote" as effective as possible, that caused him to kill them with overemphasis; but the hash Stokowski made of the Good Friday music of "Parsifal," among other things, represented his insensitiveness and indifference to anything in music but the opportunities it offers to produce gorgeous sounds and stunning effects with lush movements of his hands.

Stokowski at least offers the excitement of virtuosity, such as one gets from Horowitz on the piano or Heifetz on the violin; but Barbirolli does not offer even that to compensate for the musical defects of his performances and the wretchedness of his programs. If a director of an art gallery were to exhibit its collection defaced by his retouching the public clamor would cause him to be thrown out within a week. But Barbirolli, for four seasons, has been defacing Beethoven, Brahms, and in fact all the music in which he does not feel the restrictions imposed by the style of Haydn and Mozart; the press has been sour; even placid Friday afternoon dowagers have been moved to cancel subscriptions; yet he has been reengaged for two years, and the great New York Philharmonic Orchestra will celebrate its hundredth anniversary by exhibiting to an unadmiring world the mediocrity it has descended to under his direction.

Nor is the reengagement more surprising, more conscienceless than the first engagement. Barbirolli was brought here to share the season of 1936-37 with several other conductors, but was engaged as sole permanent conductor after only a few weeks, before Enesco and Rodzinski had been heard and had demonstrated their overwhelming superiority; and this happened not because of any irresistible brilliance that Barbirolli exhibited in those few weeks, but because it did not take the manager of the orchestra, the directors, and the orchestra itself longer to discover that he was a man who in various ways made life pleasant for them—pleasanter for the orchestra, for example, than Rodzinski, who when he took charge later in the season had occasion not only to speak sharply about the deterioration in its playing but, worse still, to act vigorously about and as having observed that the concerto "re-creates successively the main stages of Prokofiev's inner evolution. This is not a panorama, but a synthesized, integrated picture. . . . The present Prokofiev is not yet as clearly discernible as the 'early Prokofiev' or the 'middle-of-the-road' Prokofiev. The Violoncello Concerto bears testimony of this. Its strongest points are in retrospection, totalizing the stages passed by the composer, rather than in its forward perspective. Prokofiev's creative crisis has not been solved, and it cannot be solved without protracted and concentrated effort."

Terms like "main stages of . . . evolution," "retrospection, totalizing the stages," "forward perspective," "crisis" refer to nothing in Prokofiev's music and to nothing that can be said in description or judgment of it; they are merely terms which are considered proper for criticism in Russia, because of the proper ideas about the close relation of art to economics (they recall a Daily Worker article some years ago on "A. F. of L.-ism in Music"). As such they are ways of going through required motions; and in this respect they are like the "formalism," "scholasticism," "didacticism" that were applied to Eisenstein, and also like the revolting epithets applied by workers in factories and scientists in laboratories to the Finns, or the revolting hymns of praise to "the peace policy of the Soviet Union, which always respects the rights of small nations." I refer to these political manifestations to make clear what is of concern to me as

ATES

Those who wish to obtain scores of any of the works on this program for home study should apply at the Music Branch of the New York Public Library, 121 East 58th St., which has a large collection of music available for circulation.

NOTES ON THE PROGRAM

By PITTS SANBORN

SYMPHONIC POEM, "LE CHANT DU ROSSIGNOL" ("The Nightingale's Song")..IGOR FEODOROVITCH STRAVINSKY

In 1908 Mr. Stravinsky composed the first of the three acts of his fairy opera "Le Rossignol" ("The Nightingale"). Here, as in the case of "Le Baiser de La Fée", a story by Hans Christian Andersen supplied the subject. The libretto, written by the composer in collaboration with his friend Stepan Mitoussoff, may be summarized as follows:

A nightingale is brought to the court of the Emperor of China in the hope that the bird's singing will rouse him from the dejection into which he has fallen. So gratifying are the results that the Emperor declares he will grant the bird any favor it desires. The nigtingale replies that the tears shed by the Emperor in his happiness over his recovery are reward enough.

Just then envoys from the Emperor of Japan arrive bearing the Emperor of China the gift of an artificial nightingale. The Chinese ruler is so much pleased by the song of the mechanism that the real nightingale takes offense and flies away. Greatly annoyed, the Emperor officially banishes the bird.

And now his illness returns. Death sits upon the imperial bed, takes possession of crown and sceptre, and lays an icy hand upon the Emperor's forehead. But before Death has secured his prey, the compassionate nightingale flies back and by the eloquence of his singing wins the imperial trophies from the grasp of Death, who quietly vanishes. When the courtiers enter, believing their Emperor dead, they find him restored to health and in full regalia.

The course of composition ran by no means smoothly. Work on smaller pieces, together with the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff, diverted Mr. Stravinsky's attention from "Le Rossignol", which he did not take up again till the summer of 1909 But once more conditions were unfavorable. "By the end of the summer," he says in his autobiography, "the orchestration of the first act was finished, and. . . . I meant to go on with the rest. But a telegram then arrived to upset all my plans. Diaghileff. . . . asked me to write the music for 'L'Oiseau de Feu' for the Russian Ballet season at the Paris Opera House in the spring of 1910."

Only after "Le Sacre du Printemps" had been produced, in May, 1913, did the composer go back to "Le Rossignol". Then the newly founded Théâtre Libre of Moscow requested him to complete the opera. "Only the Prologue—that is to say, Act I—was in existence. It had been written four years earlier, and my musical language had been appreciably modified since then. I feared that in view of my new manner the subsequent scenes would clash with that Prologue." After trying vainly to persuade the Théâtre Libre to be content with the Prologue alone, Mr. Stravinsky acceded to their wishes and went on with the other acts.

"As there is no action until the second act," he explains, "I told myself that it would not be unreasonable if the music of the Prologue bore a somewhat different character from that of the rest. And, indeed, the forest, with its nightingale, the pure soul of the child who falls in love with its song, all this gentle poetry of Hans Andersen's could not be expressed in the same way as the baroque luxury of the Chinese court, with its bizarre etiquette, its palace fêtes, its thousands of little bells and lanterns, and the grotesque humming of the mechanical Japanese nightingale, in short all this exotic fantasy obviously demanded a different musical idiom."

While Mr. Stravinsky was busy completing the score, the Théâtre Libre of Moscow went out of existence. Diaghileff, however, jumped at the chance to obtain "Le Rossignol" for his next season at the Paris Opéra, and there it was produced on May 26, 1914. "Benois created sumptuous scenery and costumes", the composer relates, "and, conducted by Monteux, the opera was performed with the utmost perfection."

Two or three years later Diaghileff proposed to put on "Le Rossignol" as a ballet. "I rejoined with a counter-proposition. I had been thinking of making a symphonic poem for the orchestra by combining the music of the second and third acts of 'Le Rossignol', which were homogeneous, and I told Diaghileff that I would place that at his disposal if he cared to make a ballet of it. He warmly welcomed the suggestion, and I adapted a scenario from Andersen's fairy story to serve the purpose."

The symphonic poem derived from the opera and scored for a smaller orchestra dates from 1919. On November 1, 1923, Walter Damrosch introduced it to New York at a concert of the Symphony Society in Carnegie Hall (the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski conducting, had given it an American première a few days before in Philadelphia). In the course of that season the work was played in New York so often that in March, 1924, there were actually four performances in Carnegie Hall within the compass of two days—at concerts of the Symphony Society on a Thursday afternoon and a Friday evening and of the Philharmonic Society on a Thursday evening and a Friday afternoon.

On March 6, 1926, the opera was staged for the first time in the United States at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, in a double bill with a similar première for Manuel de Falla's Spanish opera "La Vida Breve". Marion Talley sang the nightingale, Ralph Errolle the fisherman, Adamo Didur the Emperor of China. Tullio Serafin conducted. French was officially the language employed, the brand dispensed by the cast being "probably quite exact enough for the land of Pidgin English."

In the symphonic poem the nightingale becomes a flute instead of a soprano and the fisherman with his lay a trumpet instead of a tenor. The mechanical nightingale is always represented by a clarinet.

SUITE FROM THE BALLET ("DANCED STORY") "L'OISEAU DE FEU" ("THE FIREBIRD")........................IGOR FEODOROVITCH STRAVINSKY

First of the ballets written by Mr. Stravinsky for the Diaghileff Ballets Russes, "The Firebird" was brought out by that organization at

THIS CLIPPING FROM NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
13
APR 6 - 1940

MUSIC

WITHIN a few days New Yorkers had opportunities to experience those tonal wonders of the age—the playing of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky ~~and that of~~ the Philadelphia under Stokowski. The two conductors are extraordinary virtuosos in their medium; but there the similarity ends. The surprising continence of Koussevitzky's performance of Beethoven's First was a measure of his growth as a musician, the greater refinement of his taste in the presentation of older music; whereas Stokowski's increasingly lurid performances are a measure of his deterioration. And it was Koussevitzky's passionate love of music, his passionate desire to make the points in Strauss's "Don Quixote" as effective as possible, that caused him to kill them with overemphasis; but the hash Stokowski made of the Good Friday music of "Parsifal," among other things, represented his insensitiveness and indifference to anything in music but the opportunities it offers to produce gorgeous sounds and stunning effects with lush movements of his hands.

Stokowski at least offers the excitement of virtuosity, such as one gets from Horowitz on the piano or Heifetz on the violin; but Barbirolli does not offer even that to compensate for the musical defects of his performances and the wretchedness of his programs. If a director of an art gallery were to exhibit its collection defaced by his retouching the public clamor would cause him to be thrown out within a week. But Barbirolli, for four seasons, has been defacing Beethoven, Brahms, and in fact all the music in which he does not feel the restrictions imposed by the style of Haydn and Mozart; the press has been sour; even placid Friday afternoon dowagers have been moved to cancel subscriptions; yet he has been reengaged for two years, and the great New York Philharmonic Orchestra will celebrate its hundredth anniversary by exhibiting to an unadmiring world the mediocrity it has descended to under his direction.

Nor is the reengagement more surprising, more conscienceless than the first engagement. Barbirolli was brought here to share the season of 1936-37 with several other conductors, but was engaged as sole permanent conductor after only a few weeks, before Enesco and Rodzinski had been heard and had demonstrated their overwhelming superiority; and this happened not because of any irresistible brilliance that Barbirolli exhibited in those few weeks, but because it did not take the manager of the orchestra, the directors, and the orchestra itself longer to discover that he was a man who in various ways made life pleasant for them—pleasanter for the orchestra, for example, than Rodzinski, who when he took charge later in the season had occasion not only to speak sharply about the deterioration in its playing but, worse still, to act vigorously about and as having observed that the concerto "re-creates successively the main stages of Prokofiev's inner evolution. This is not a panorama, but a synthesized, integrated picture. . . . The present Prokofiev is not yet as clearly discernible as the 'early Prokofiev' or the 'middle-of-the-road' Prokofiev. The Violoncello Concerto bears testimony of this. Its strongest points are in retrospection, totalizing the stages passed by the composer, rather than in its forward perspective. Prokofiev's creative crisis has not been solved, and it cannot be solved without protracted and concentrated effort."

ATES

Terms like "main stages of . . . evolution," "retrospection, totalizing the stages," "forward perspective," "crisis" refer to nothing in Prokofiev's music and to nothing that can be said in description or judgment of it; they are merely terms which are considered proper for criticism in Russia, because of the proper ideas about the close relation of art to economics (they recall a Daily Worker article some years ago on "A. F. of L.-ism in Music"). As such they are ways of going through required motions; and in this respect they are like the "formalism," "scholasticism," "didacticism" that were applied to Eisenstein, and also like the revolting epithets applied by workers in factories and scientists in laboratories to the Finns, or the revolting hymns of praise to "the peace policy of the Soviet Union, which always respects the rights of small nations." I refer to these political manifestations to make clear what is of concern to me as the Paris Opéra on June 25, 1910. Michel Fokine, who had derived the scenario from several Russian fairy tales and had provided the choreography, took the role of Ivan Tsarevitch; Thamar Karsavina was the Bird of Fire, Vera Fokina the Beautiful Tsarevna, and Enrico Cecchetti Kastcheï the Immortal. Gabriel Pierné conducted.

---

The following description of the work is condensed from the "Complete Book of Ballets" by Cyril W. Beaumont: "The ballet commences with an overture which soon creates an atmosphere of witchcraft, goblins, and attendant magic. There are low mutterings, mysterious long-drawn wails, the tramp of gnomes underground, strange rustlings, and above all can be heard the tremulous whirr of the wings of a bird soaring in circular flight.

"When the curtain rises all is dark save only in the centre, where bathed in a circle of amber light, grows a tree, its branches laden with golden fruit. Presently a bird, gleaming with orange radiance, flashes across the background of foliage. Now it is possible to discern a high wall to the right, over which a youth in hunting-dress clambers. It is Ivan Tsarevitch. The whirr of wings is heard and the Bird of Fire flits to the tree. The Prince raises his weapon, takes aim, and looses the bolt, but he misses and the startled bird flies away into the depths of the forest.

"The Prince remains concealed and soon the bird returns. He approaches and catches it in his arms. The bird offers him a golden feather for ransom. Ivan allows it to go free. Through the trees runs a light palisade, ending in two gates, through which is visible a flight of steps. A plaintive melody is heard, and twelve maidens wind their way across a sloping eminence and down the steps. The Prince steps into the shadow.

"The gates open and the maidens go toward the tree, where they are presently joined by another whose rich dress proclaims her rank. They shake the tree so that the apples fall and roll in all directions. The maidens career in pursuit, and each casts her prize high in the air. Ivan comes from his hiding-place, but the leader of the maidens warns him to depart, for he is before the castle of Kastcheï, an enchanter of mighty power, who captures all who trespass on his domains. The Prince, however, already in love with the maiden, wishes to stay.

"Suddenly there sounds a discordant note. The startled maidens run through the gates. The Prince is about to take his departure when darkness descends and he is unable to find an outlet. He runs to and fro in terror and turns to the gates and shakes them. They fly open, the forest blazes with light, and down the eminence pours a motley horde of demons and goblins. They fall on the Prince and hold him fast to await the coming of Kastcheï.

"He glares at his victim and strives to cast a spell upon him, but Ivan remembers the golden feather and waves it aloft. To his aid flies the glorious Bird of Fire, who begins a dance of closely increasing measure. The demons are compelled to follow her until exhausted they sink to the ground and fall into a deep slumber. The Bird of Fire bids Ivan take the chief of the maidens to a place of safety, then shows him a root which marks the base of a hollow tree. He crawls inside to reappear with an iron-bound casket.

"He raises the lid and withdraws an enormous egg, which he throws into the air and catches as it falls, while Kastcheï, who knows that it contains his soul, trembles with fear and apprehension. In desperation he clutches at the precious object, but Ivan dashes it to the ground. There is a deafening crash and darkness falls.

"Presently the stage lightens. Kastcheï, his court, and the Bird of Fire have vanished. In their place a group of young men, dressed richly, pay homage to Ivan. Down the steps comes a beautiful Princess, the maiden to whom he pledged his troth, and in her train a group of nobles and fair dames, now freed from enchantment by the death of Köstchei. They are followed by a procession of pages, who bear in their midst a crown, sceptre, and ermine robe. Ivan is invested with these symbols of power, and the assembly acclaim him as their deliverer and sovereign lord."

It is interesting to recall that the young and unknown Stravinsky was not the composer whom Michel Fokine had in mind when he devised the scenario of "The Firebird". The man of his choice was Anatol Liadoff, of "Music Box" fame. But Liadoff delayed, and eventually the assignment went to the fledgling whose orchestral piece "Fireworks", composed for the wedding of Rimsky-Korsakoff's daughter Nadeshda, who became the wife of Maximilian Steinberg, had impressed connoisseurs in 1908. (The recurrence of the "Fire" element apparently had no significance beyond the coincidental!) Mr. Stravinsky finished the score of the ballet in May, 1910, the month preceding the world première.

"The Firebird" was presented for the first time in America at the Century Theatre, New York, on January 17, 1916, when the Diaghileff Ballets Russes made their initial visit to this country. The conductor was Ernest Ansermet and the cast included Xenia Maclezova as the Bird of Fire, Leonide Massine as Ivan Tsarevitch, Lubov Tchernicheva as the beautiful Tsarevna, and once more Enrico Cecchetti as Kastcheï the Immortal.

The suite performed at these concerts comprises five numbers: I. Introduction: The Firebird and her Dance; II. Dance of the Princesses; III. Infernal Dance of Kastcheï; IV. Berceuse; V. Finale (the disappearance of Kastcheï and his crew and the general rejoicing). There is no pause between sections I. and II. and IV. and V. The theme of the "Dance of the Princesses" is a folk-song from the Government of Novgorod, "As in the Little Green Garden". The horn theme heard in the Finale is another folk-song, "Near the Gate the Pine Was Waving".

In deference to the practical uses of the concert hall the vast array of instruments for which the ballet is scored has in the case of the suite been reduced. The instruments called for here by Mr. Stravinsky are two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, xylophone, harp, piano, and strings.

"LE SACRE DU PRINTEMPS" ("The Consecration of the Spring"):
PICTURES OF PAGAN RUSSIA, IN TWO PARTS
IGOR FEODOROVITCH STRAVINSKY

The initial performance of "Le Sacre du Printemps" took place in Paris at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées on May 29, 1913, in the course of the season of the Diaghileff Ballets Russes, and the response of the audience to what it heard scarcely stopped short of massacre. Pierre

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 6 - 1940

13

MUSIC

WITHIN a few days New Yorkers had opportunities to experience those tonal wonders of the age—the playing of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky ~~and that of~~ the Philadelphia under Stokowski. The two conductors are extraordinary virtuosos in their medium; but there the similarity ends. The surprising continence of Koussevitzky's performance of Beethoven's First was a measure of his growth as a musician, the greater refinement of his taste in the presentation of older music; whereas Stokowski's increasingly lurid performances are a measure of his deterioration. And it was Koussevitzky's passionate love of music, his passionate desire to make the points in Strauss's "Don Quixote" as effective as possible, that caused him to kill them with overemphasis; but the hash Stokowski made of the Good Friday music of "Parsifal," among other things, represented his insensitiveness and indifference to anything in music but the opportunities it offers to produce gorgeous sounds and stunning effects with lush movements of his hands.

Stokowski at least offers the excitement of virtuosity, such as one gets from Horowitz on the piano or Heifetz on the violin; but Barbirolli does not offer even that to compensate for the musical defects of his performances and the wretchedness of his programs. If a director of an art gallery were to exhibit its collection defaced by his retouching the public clamor would cause him to be thrown out within a week. But Barbirolli, for four seasons, has been defacing Beethoven, Brahms, and in fact all the music in which he does not feel the restrictions imposed by the style of Haydn and Mozart; the press has been sour; even placid Friday afternoon dowagers have been moved to cancel subscriptions; yet he has been reengaged for two years, and the great New York Philharmonic Orchestra will celebrate its hundredth anniversary by exhibiting to an unadmiring world the mediocrity it has descended to under his direction.

Nor is the reengagement more surprising, more conscienceless than the first engagement. Barbirolli was brought here to share the season of 1936-37 with several other conductors, but was engaged as sole permanent conductor after only a few weeks, before Enesco and Rodzinski had been heard and had demonstrated their overwhelming superiority; and this happened not because of any irresistible brilliance that Barbirolli exhibited in those few weeks, but because it did not take the manager of the orchestra, the directors, and the orchestra itself longer to discover that he was a man who in various ways made life pleasant for them—pleasanter for the orchestra, for example, than Rodzinski, who when he took charge later in the season had occasion not only to speak sharply about the deterioration in its playing but, worse still, to act vigorously about and as having observed that the concerto "re-creates successively the main stages of Prokofiev's inner evolution. This is not a panorama, but a synthesized, integrated picture. . . . The present Prokofiev is not yet as clearly discernible as the 'early Prokofiev' or the 'middle-of-the-road' Prokofiev. The Violoncello Concerto bears testimony of this. Its strongest points are in retrospection, totalizing the stages passed by the composer, rather than in its forward perspective. Prokofiev's creative crisis has not been solved, and it cannot be solved without protracted and concentrated effort."

Terms like "main stages of . . . evolution," "retrospection, totalizing the stages," "forward perspective," "crisis" refer to nothing in Prokofiev's music and to nothing that can be said in description or judgment of it; they are merely terms which are considered proper for criticism in Russia, because of the proper ideas about the close relation of art to economics (they recall a Daily Worker article some years ago on "A. F. of L.-ism in Music"). As such they are ways of going through required motions; and in this respect they are like the "formalism," "scholasticism," "didacticism" that were applied to Eisenstein, and also like the revolting epithets applied by workers in factories and scientists in laboratories to the Finns, or the revolting hymns of praise to "the peace policy of the Soviet Union, which always respects the rights of small nations." I refer to these political manifestations to make clear what is of concern to me as

---

Monteux conducted. The music was introduced to this country at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia, under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, on March 3, 1922. Mr. Monteux, who meantime had become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the work in Boston at the orchestra's concert of January 25, 1924. On the following January 31 Mr. Monteux and the Boston orchestra made the music known to New York at their regular concert in Carnegie Hall. Under the auspices of the League of Composers, "Le Sacre du Printemps" was staged for the first time in this country on April 11, 1930, at the Metropolitan Opera House, Philadelphia. On April 22 the production was shown at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Stokowski, officiated. The dancer of the Chosen One on these occasions was Martha Graham.

* * *

Mr. Stravinsky tells in his autobiography of the inception of the "Sacre": "One day, when I was finishing the last pages of 'L'Oiseau de Feu' in St. Petersburg, I had a fleeting vision which came to me as a complete surprise, my mind at the moment being full of other things. I saw in imagination a solemn pagan rite: sage elders, seated in a circle, watched a young girl dance herself to death. They were sacrificing her to propitiate the god of spring. Such was the theme of the 'Sacre du Printemps'. I must confess that this vision made a deep impression on me, and I at once described it to my friend Nicholas Roerich, he being a painter who had specialized in pagan subjects. He welcomed my inspiration with enthusiasm and became my collaborator in this creation. In Paris I told Diaghileff about it, and he was at once carried away by the idea."

From the first "Le Sacre" has been a matter for deep and learned discussion. According to Edith Sitwell, it "gives us the beginning of energy, the enormous and terrible shaping of the visible and invisible world through movement." And Miss Sitwell further observes: "Life is energy, and the very fact of that life will eventually push us over the abyss into the waiting and intolerable darkness."

Lazare Saminsky, in "Music of Our Day", places "Le Sacre" among the "most valuable" of Stravinsky's contributions. "The imagination of Stravinsky," he goes on, "perceives things and presents them musically in terms of noises immanent to those things, eternally present in them. He is curiously and characteristically deaf to the inner music of things—to their spiritual pulse. Let us recall the sharp and cold glitter of the kermesses from 'Petrouchka', the spring-roundels from the 'Sacre', the Chinese march from the 'Rossignol', those glowing pages of tone-decor. In the creating anew of the inborn noises of things, of their resonance and physical boiling, lies the whole of Stravinsky's talent, magnificent of its kind.

"He is the father of the rebarbarization in music. He has transformed music into a collection of qualified noises, but fascinatingly colored, irresistible. He has reduced melody to the primitive, inarticulate refrain of a Zulu and has converted the orchestra into a gigantic rattle, the toy and mouthpiece of the new savage."

If here a primitive element in Stravinsky's music is emphasized, the unique Erik Satie dwells with no less assurance on the "transparency" of its sound. "This is a quality," he declares, "that one always finds in the purists, who never leave any 'residuum' in their sonority, that residuum which you will ever encounter in the musical fabric of impressionistic composers and also, alas! even in that of the Romantics.

"Palestrina makes us 'hear' this sonorous 'transparency'; he was an expert manipulator of it and seems to have been the first to import this phenomenon into music.

"The exquisite Mozart used it in a way that defies analysis. One stands confounded before such mastery, such a subtle 'clairvoyance' of sound, a phonic lucidity so calm and so perfect.

"Any one of Igor Stravinsky's works will cause you to perceive with extraordinary clearness this vibratory 'transparency' of which I speak. 'Le Sacre du Printemps' is full of it; and it is perhaps in this work that it will appear to you with the most persuasiveness; you will be prodigiously bathed in it, deeply saturated."

That doughty champion, Boris de Schloezer, touches on the subject of Stravinsky's melody: "Whatever be the historic origins of song, even if one admit that it began as the howl, i.e., direct, as you might say, physiological expression of emotion, its development is indisputably due to detaching it from its physiological sources and to organizing it according to acoustic and aesthetic principles. Melody is the creation of human intelligence standing up against nature. . . . There is an intellectual part in every melody, and for that reason it demands comprehension from the auditor. . . .

"As for the great public's taste for melody, it is a matter of only a certain kind of melody to which it has been trained and habituated and which it likes to recognize; once you depart from that type we are all more or less disoriented, for the most difficult thing of all to seize is a melody that follows an unexpected course. Thus the first judgment people deliver on a work that they have not understood is that it lacks melody; they said this of Mozart and they say it today of Ravel, Debussy, and Stravinsky.

"If the 'Sacre' finally imposed itself, this was in spite of melodic structure and thanks to the hallucinating power of its rhythm, to its glittering timbres, and to its cyclopean chords. But even today the polyphonic idiom of 'Sacre' remains, in all probability, a closed book to many of its auditors. . . . It needed Stravinsky's genius, his radicalism intolerant of compromise, his love of risk, and this absence of aesthetic aristocratism which we have observed in most Russian artists to bring in the renaissance of a classic art and to reconstitute a style in the midst of this 'war of everyone against everyone else' which modern musical life had become."

Thus, in the words of the late Philip Hale, might Captain Lemuel Gulliver have heard learned professors discussing at the Academy of Legado.

* * *

The large orchestra employed in this score comprises two piccolos, two flutes, flute in G, four oboes (one interchangeable with a second English horn), English horn, three clarinets (one interchangeable with a second bass clarinet), clarinet in E-flat, bass clarinet, four bassoons (one interchangeable with a second double-bassoon), double-bassoon, eight horns (two interchangeable with Bayreuth tubas), four trumpets, trumpet in D, bass trumpet, three trombones, two tubas, four kettledrums, small kettledrums, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, antique cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, rape guero (scratcher), and strings.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 6 - 1940

13

MUSIC

WITHIN a few days New Yorkers had opportunities to experience those tonal wonders of the age—the playing of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky ~~and that of~~ the Philadelphia under Stokowski. The two conductors are extraordinary virtuosos in their medium; but there the similarity ends. The surprising continence of Koussevitzky's performance of Beethoven's First was a measure of his growth as a musician, the greater refinement of his taste in the presentation of older music; whereas Stokowski's increasingly lurid performances are a measure of his deterioration. And it was Koussevitzky's passionate love of music, his passionate desire to make the points in Strauss's "Don Quixote" as effective as possible, that caused him to kill them with overemphasis; but the hash Stokowski made of the Good Friday music of "Parsifal," among other things, represented his insensitiveness and indifference to anything in music but the opportunities it offers to produce gorgeous sounds and stunning effects with lush movements of his hands.

Stokowski at least offers the excitement of virtuosity, such as one gets from Horowitz on the piano or Heifetz on the violin; but Barbirolli does not offer even that to compensate for the musical defects of his performances and the wretchedness of his programs. If a director of an art gallery were to exhibit its collection defaced by his retouching the public clamor would cause him to be thrown out within a week. But Barbirolli, for four seasons, has been defacing Beethoven, Brahms, and in fact all the music in which he does not feel the restrictions imposed by the style of Haydn and Mozart; the press has been sour; even placid Friday afternoon dowagers have been moved to cancel subscriptions; yet he has been reengaged for two years, and the great New York Philharmonic Orchestra will celebrate its hundredth anniversary by exhibiting to an unadmiring world the mediocrity it has descended to under his direction.

Nor is the reengagement more surprising, more conscienceless than the first engagement. Barbirolli was brought here to share the season of 1936-37 with several other conductors, but was engaged as sole permanent conductor after only a few weeks, before Enesco and Rodzinski had been heard and had demonstrated their overwhelming superiority; and this happened not because of any irresistible brilliance that Barbirolli exhibited in those few weeks, but because it did not take the manager of the orchestra, the directors, and the orchestra itself longer to discover that he was a man who in various ways made life pleasant for them—pleasanter for the orchestra, for example, than Rodzinski, who when he took charge later in the season had occasion not only to speak sharply about the deterioration in its playing but, worse still, to act vigorously about it and to make the orchestra act vigorously. Barbirolli may do terrible things to music; but one can well understand how to Mr. Judson, to Mr. Field and Mrs. Pratt, and to the orchestra it would be more important that life be made pleasant for them than that music be well treated.

In his new 'Cello Concerto—recently given its first American performances by Piatigorsky and the Boston Symphony—Prokofiev uses all the resources of his technique as ways of going through elaborate motions of saying a great deal when he is saying absolutely nothing. And it is not surprising that this grand-mannered pretense should impress the Soviet Russian critic Kuznetzov who is quoted in the program notes as having disapproved of the "salon spirit" of the charming "Peter and the Wolf," as having demanded of a composer of Prokofiev's stature nothing less than "earnestness and fidelity to himself," and as having observed that the concerto "re-creates successively the main stages of Prokofiev's inner evolution. This is not a panorama, but a synthesized, integrated picture. . . . The present Prokofiev is not yet as clearly discernible as the 'early Prokofiev' or the 'middle-of-the-road' Prokofiev. The Violoncello Concerto bears testimony of this. Its strongest points are in retrospection, totalizing the stages passed by the composer, rather than in its forward perspective. Prokofiev's creative crisis has not been solved, and it cannot be solved without protracted and concentrated effort."

Terms like "main stages of . . . evolution," "retrospection, totalizing the stages," "forward perspective," "crisis" refer to nothing in Prokofiev's music and to nothing that can be said in description or judgment of it; they are merely terms which are considered proper for criticism in Russia, because of the proper ideas about the close relation of art to economics (they recall a Daily Worker article some years ago on "A. F. of L.-ism in Music"). As such they are ways of going through required motions; and in this respect they are like the "formalism," "scholasticism," "didacticism" that were applied to Eisenstein, and also like the revolting epithets applied by workers in factories and scientists in laboratories to the Finns, or the revolting hymns of praise to "the peace policy of the Soviet Union, which always respects the rights of small nations." I refer to these political manifestations to make clear what is of concern to me as a critic: the fact that the same enslavement and degradation of the mind (in a country in which no man may own a factory or a bank, so that other men's minds may not be enslaved and degraded) produce writing about the arts for which—if one is sensitive to intellectual rigor and integrity, and to their opposites—one needs the same strong stomach.

B. H. HAGGIN

LATEST
RECORDS
IMPORTED
RUSSIAN RECORDS!
BY Modern Russian Composers
Song of the Plains
Red Moscow
Kalinka
From Border to Border
Cossack's Song
and many others
SEND FOR COMPLETE LIST N
Phone CH 2-6744 OPEN EVENINGS
O. PAGANI & BRO.
289 Bleecker Street, corner 7th Avenue
New York, N. Y.

In Early Issues of
THE Nation
Mr. Pitt and America's Birthright
BY J. C. LONG
Reviewed by Rustem Vambery
The French Yellow Book
Reviewed by Robert Dell

R STRAVINSKY

dor Stravinsky planned a legal career for his son g Stravinsky met Rimsky-Korsakoff in Germany he decided to devote his life to music. A few , this time with Serge Diaghileff, had two further the center of Mr. Stravinsky's activity and it er of marked individuality. From 1910 to 1917 d", "Petrouchka", "Le Sacre du Printemps", and " followed in 1920 and "Apollon Musagète" in sky used such unconventional rhythms and harenter of esthetic controversy. Among his other du Soldat", "Symphonies of Wind Instruments a "Mavra", the secular oratorio "Oedipus Rex", iolin concerto, a piano sonata, a piano concerto, ". In 1937 he added "Jeu de Cartes" to his ount of conditions in Russia Mr. Stravinsky has

ONIC-SYMPHONY CONCERTS
RNEGIE HALL

er the Direction of STRAVINSKY
Composer-Conductor

CONCERT (Students')
ENING, APRIL 6, AT 8:45
RNOON, APRIL 7, AT 3:00

VINSKY PROGRAM
trouchka"
ory "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Firebird")
" ("The Consecration of the Spring"),
ssia

er the Direction of BARBIROLLI

ENING, APRIL 11, AT 8:45
NOON, APRIL 12, AT 2:30
RNOON, APRIL 14, AT 3:00

...........Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito"
..Symphony in D major, B. & H. No. 104
'Moby Dick", A Cantata for Male Chorus,
ra. Text selected and arranged from the elville, by W. Clark Harrington.
irst performance)
..................................WILLIAM HAIN
................................ROBERT WEEDE
..............................WILLIAM HORNE
....PHILIP REEP
.............................GEAN GREENWELL
the WESTMINSTER CHOIR
y Williamson, Conductor

THIS CLIPPING FROM NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
3
APR 6 - 1940

MUSIC

WITHIN a few days New Yorkers had opportunities to experience those tonal wonders of the age—the playing of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky ~~and that of~~ the Philadelphia under Stokowski. The two conductors are extraordinary virtuosos in their medium; but there the similarity ends. The surprising continence of Koussevitzky's performance of Beethoven's First was a measure of his growth as a musician, the greater refinement of his taste in the presentation of older music; whereas Stokowski's increasingly lurid performances are a measure of his deterioration. And it was Koussevitzky's passionate love of music, his passionate desire to make the points in Strauss's "Don Quixote" as effective as possible, that caused him to kill them with overemphasis; but the hash Stokowski made of the Good Friday music of "Parsifal," among other things, represented his insensitiveness and indifference to anything in music but the opportunities it offers to produce gorgeous sounds and stunning effects with lush movements of his hands.

Stokowski at least offers the excitement of virtuosity, such as one gets from Horowitz on the piano or Heifetz on the violin; but Barbirolli does not offer even that to compensate for the musical defects of his performances and the wretchedness of his programs. If a director of an art gallery were to exhibit its collection defaced by his retouching the public clamor would cause him to be thrown out within a week. But Barbirolli, for four seasons, has been defacing Beethoven, Brahms, and in fact all the music in which he does not feel the restrictions imposed by the style of Haydn and Mozart; the press has been sour; even placid Friday afternoon dowagers have been moved to cancel subscriptions; yet he has been reengaged for two years, and the great New York Philharmonic Orchestra will celebrate its hundredth anniversary by exhibiting to an unadmiring world the mediocrity it has descended to under his direction.

Nor is the reengagement more surprising, more conscienceless than the first engagement. Barbirolli was brought here to share the season of 1936-37 with several other conductors, but was engaged as sole permanent conductor after only a few weeks, before Enesco and Rodzinski had been heard and had demonstrated their overwhelming superiority; and this happened not because of any irresistible brilliance that Barbirolli exhibited in those few weeks, but because it did not take the manager of the orchestra, the directors, and the orchestra itself longer to discover that he was a man who in various ways made life pleasant for them—pleasanter for the orchestra, for example, than Rodzinski, who when he took charge later in the season had occasion not only to speak sharply about the deterioration in its playing but, worse still, to act vigorously about it and to make the orchestra act vigorously. Barbirolli may do terrible things to music; but one can well understand how to Mr. Judson, to Mr. Field and Mrs. Pratt, and to the orchestra it would be more important that life be made pleasant for them than that music be well treated.

In his new 'Cello Concerto—recently given its first American performances by Piatigorsky and the Boston Symphony—Prokofiev uses all the resources of his technique as ways of going through elaborate motions of saying a great deal when he is saying absolutely nothing. And it is not surprising that this grand-mannered pretense should impress the Soviet Russian critic Kuznetzov who is quoted in the program notes as having disapproved of the "salon spirit" of the charming "Peter and the Wolf," as having demanded of a composer of Prokofiev's stature nothing less than "earnestness and fidelity to himself," and as having observed that the concerto "re-creates successively the main stages of Prokofiev's inner evolution. This is not a panorama, but a synthesized, integrated picture. . . . The present Prokofiev is not yet as clearly discernible as the 'early Prokofiev' or the 'middle-of-the-road' Prokofiev. The Violoncello Concerto bears testimony of this. Its strongest points are in retrospection, totalizing the stages passed by the composer, rather than in its forward perspective. Prokofiev's creative crisis has not been solved, and it cannot be solved without protracted and concentrated effort."

Terms like "main stages of . . . evolution," "retrospection, totalizing the stages," "forward perspective," "crisis" refer to nothing in Prokofiev's music and to nothing that can be said in description or judgment of it; they are merely terms which are considered proper for criticism in Russia, because of the proper ideas about the close relation of art to economics (they recall a Daily Worker article some years ago on "A. F. of L.-ism in Music"). As such they are ways of going through required motions; and in this respect they are like the "formalism," "scholasticism," "didacticism" that were applied to Eisenstein, and also like the revolting epithets applied by workers in factories and scientists in laboratories to the Finns, or the revolting hymns of praise to "the peace policy of the Soviet Union, which always respects the rights of small nations." I refer to these political manifestations to make clear what is of concern to me as a critic: the fact that the same enslavement and degradation of the mind (in a country in which no man may own a factory or a bank, so that other men's minds may not be enslaved and degraded) produce writing about the arts for which—if one is sensitive to intellectual rigor and integrity, and to their opposites—one needs the same strong stomach.

B. H. HAGGIN

LATEST RECORDS
IMPORTED
RUSSIAN RECORDS!
BY Modern Russian Composers
Song of the Plains
Red Moscow
Kalinka
From Border to Border
Cossack's Song
and many others
SEND FOR COMPLETE LIST N
Phone CH 2-6744 OPEN EVENINGS
O. PAGANI & BRO.
289 Bleecker Street, corner 7th Avenue
New York, N. Y.

In Early Issues of
THE Nation
Mr. Pitt and America's Birthright
BY J. C. LONG
Reviewed by Rustem Vambery
The French Yellow Book
Reviewed by Robert Dell

R STRAVINSKY
dor Stravinsky planned a legal career for his son g Stravinsky met Rimsky-Korsakoff in Germany he decided to devote his life to music. A few
, this time with Serge Diaghileff, had two further the center of Mr. Stravinsky's activity and it er of marked individuality. From 1910 to 1917 d", "Petrouchka", "Le Sacre du Printemps", and ' followed in 1920 and "Apollon Musagète" in sky used such unconventional rhythms and har-enter of esthetic controversy. Among his other du Soldat", "Symphonies of Wind Instruments a "Mavra", the secular oratorio "Oedipus Rex", iolin concerto, a piano sonata, a piano concerto,
". In 1937 he added "Jeu de Cartes" to his ount of conditions in Russia Mr. Stravinsky has

ONIC-SYMPHONY CONCERTS
RNEGIE HALL
er the Direction of STRAVINSKY
Composer-Conductor
CONCERT (Students')
ENING, APRIL 6, AT 8:45
RNOON, APRIL 7, AT 3:00
INSKY PROGRAM
rouchka"
ory "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Firebird")
" ("The Consecration of the Spring"),
ssia
er the Direction of
BARBIROLLI
ENING, APRIL 11, AT 8:45
NOON, APRIL 12, AT 2:30
RNOON, APRIL 14, AT 3:00
...........Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito"
..Symphony in D major, B. & H. No. 104
Moby Dick", A Cantata for Male Chorus,
ra. Text selected and arranged from the elville, by W. Clark Harrington.
irst performance)
..............................WILLIAM HAIN
.............................ROBERT WEEDE
...........................WILLIAM HORNE
...................................PHILIP REEP
.......................GEAN GREENWELL
the WESTMINSTER CHOIR
Williamson, Conductor

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York

1842-1878
CONSOLIDATED 1928

1939 - NINETY-EIGHTH SEASON - 1940

POPULAR CONCERT
(STUDENTS')

AT

CARNEGIE HALL

Saturday Evening, April 6, 1940
AT EIGHT FORTY-FIVE
3628TH CONCERT

Under the Direction of
IGOR STRAVINSKY
Guest Composer-Conductor

STRAVINSKY PROGRAM

1. Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka"
   Russian Dance—Petrouchka at Home—The Fair in Festival Week—Dance of the Nurses—The Peasant and the Bear—The Merchant and the Gypsies—Dance of the Coachmen and Grooms—The Masqueraders.
2. Suite from the Danced Story "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Firebird")
   - I. Introduction: The Firebird and her Dance
   - II. Dance of the Princesses
   - III. Infernal Dance of Köstchei
   - IV. Berceuse
   - V. Finale

INTERMISSION

3. "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Consecration of the Spring"), Pictures of Pagan Russia
   - I. The Adoration of the Earth.
     Introduction—Harbingers of Spring—Dance of the Adolescents—Abduction—Spring Rounds—Games of the Rival Cities—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man)—Dance of the Earth.
   - II. The Sacrifice.
     Introduction—Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents—Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors— Ritual of the Ancestors—The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

ARTHUR JUDSON, Manager BRUNO ZIRATO, Assistant Manager
THE STEINWAY is the Official Piano of The Philharmonic-Symphony Society
VICTOR RECORDS

ORCHESTRA PENSION FUND—It is requested that subscribers who are unable to use their tickets, kindly return them to the Philharmonic-Symphony Offices, 113 West 57th Street, or to the Box Office, Carnegie Hall, to be sold for the benefit of the Orchestra Pension Fund. All tickets received will be acknowledged.

N Y ~~Times~~ apr 7 40

14

CULLED FROM THE MAIL POUCH

Our Receptivity to New Music—Other Matters

One View of Mr. Britten's Ideas

To the Music Editor:

AS a visiting composer reporting his impressions of American musical life, Mr. Britten's observations in last Sunday's usic section are not wholly accu- ate. Within the last two years I ave traveled across this country ore than ten times. I have attended ncerts by major orchestras in all rts of the country, listened to oadcasts of the better serious sic, commissioned works, festi- , etc. I can therefore consider self one of the better-equipped teners interested in the finest merican music can offer.

Mr. Britten cannot deny the fact— he is really interested in what e American composer is up ainst—that men like Koussevitzky e few and far between, that the ore vital and important works by mericans are completely ignored. ow many of our younger compo- rs receive the same opportunities r performance of their works as r. Britten received? He mentions e variety of opportunities which ist for the production of new usic in this country, but he has idently not investigated the in- rnal politics and kowtowing to nservative public taste which is rampant in this country's musi- l life.

Had Mr. Britten really been just his appraisal of our magnificent pportunities, he would have taken to consideration the absence of orks like the forceful symphony Roger Sessions, the "Symphonic de" by Copland, the symphonies Harris. And what of our other n — Piston, Hanson, Rogers? ow often are their works heard? nd the younger men of promise nd originality: David Diamond, urely e of the most important sing names, whose virile and ex- ting Psalm for Orchestra I heard in St. Louis under Gelschmann, and, as far as I know, has not been given since? And what of Robert McBride, Mark Wessel, Burril Phillips, Hunter Johnson, to mention only a few? Mr. Britten might well examine Mr. Barbirolli's "imaginative" programs since he assumed the conductorship of the orchestra within our city. He will too soon find just what the real state of music is like in America.

There exists no real interest, courage or desire on the part of European conductors in America to seek out the best, the most stimulating that the American composer has to offer. The number of premières given third-rate works by Frenchmen, Rumanians, Austrians and Germans is astounding, considering that we do have the aforementioned Americans and the new works of Stravinsky, Bartók, Hindemith and Berg.

ROBERT MAYER.

New York, March 25, 1940.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUNDAY JOURNAL & AMERICAN
APR 7 - 1940

Boston Symphony Ends Series Here

By GREN A BENNETT

The New York series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was completed yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with a Beethoven-Tschaikovsky program. The Fifth symphony by the last-named composer was in line with the celebration of the centenary of the great Slavic melodist, who was born 100 years ago on May 5.

Serge Koussevitzky occupied his customary place at the conductor's desk and directed his men with his well-known authority. It was not his fault that the horns played with occasional insecurity in Beethoven's ingratiating Symphony No. 4, for the indications to the men were the acme of security and lucidity. Otherwise, the beguiling pages of the composer's romantic work (a composition which some historians claim was a tribute to the mysterious "Immortal Beloved" whose real identity has never been definitely solved, was interpreted with the "grace and beauty" and the "mastery of movement" that are acknowledged by famous commentators.

In contrast to the above mentioned work was the Tschaikovsky Symphony, whose brooding and sombre motifs set in magnificent harmonies were communicated to the large and enthusiastic audience with profound and eloquent musicianship.

* * *

The "standing room only" announcement at the Metropolitan Opera House continued to be displayed at both of yesterday's performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. The matinee program was devoted to "Les Sylphides," "Petrouchka," "The Bluebird" and "Prince Igor." In the evening "Rouge et Noir," "Bogatyri," "Bacchanale" and "Capriccio Espagnole" were presented. This evening's offering of "Swan Lake," "Rouge et Noir," "Bachanale" and "Capriccio Espagnole" will inaugurate the final week of the engagement.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York

1842-1878
CONSOLIDATED 1928

1939 - NINETY-EIGHTH SEASON - 1940

CARNEGIE HALL

Sunday Afternoon, April 7, 1940
AT THREE
3629TH CONCERT

Under the Direction of
IGOR STRAVINSKY
Guest Composer-Conductor

STRAVINSKY PROGRAM

1. Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka"
   Russian Dance—Petrouchka at Home—The Fair in Festival Week—Dance of the Nurses—The Peasant and the Bear—The Merchant and the Gypsies—Dance of the Coachmen and Grooms—The Masqueraders.
2. Suite from the Danced Story "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Firebird")
   - I. Introduction: The Firebird and her Dance
   - II. Dance of the Princesses
   - III. Infernal Dance of Köstchei
   - IV. Berceuse
   - V. Finale

INTERMISSION

3. "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Consecration of the Spring"), Pictures of Pagan Russia
   - I. The Adoration of the Earth.
     Introduction—Harbingers of Spring—Dance of the Adolescents—Abduction—Spring Rounds—Games of the Rival Cities—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man)—Dance of the Earth.
   - II. The Sacrifice.
     Introduction—Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents—Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors— Ritual of the Ancestors—The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

ARTHUR JUDSON, Manager BRUNO ZIRATO, Assistant Manager
THE STEINWAY is the Official Piano of The Philharmonic-Symphony Society
VICTOR RECORDS

ORCHESTRA PENSION FUND—It is requested that subscribers who are unable to use their tickets, kindly return them to the Philharmonic-Symphony Offices, 113 West 57th Street, or to the Box Office, Carnegie Hall, to be sold for the benefit of the Orchestra Pension Fund. All tickets received will be acknowledged.

Those who wish to obtain scores of any of the works on this program for home study should apply at the Music Branch of the New York Public Library, 121 East 58th St., which has a large collection of music available for circulation.

NOTES ON THE PROGRAM

By Pitts Sanborn

Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka"

Igor Feodorovitch Stravinsky

(Born at Oranienbaum, near Leningrad, June 5, 1882; now living in Boston)

Of all Mr. Stravinsky's works for the theatre, whether ballet or opera, the most familiar and the best liked is undoubtedly "Petrouchka". There is no need here of relating the plot in detail. The piece might be conveniently described as a sort of tragic burlesque of "Pagliacci", with the Admiralty Square at St. Petersburg in the winter of 1830 as the locale.

To the motley Shrovetide crowd an old mountebank offers a puppet show concerned with a dancing girl who is beloved by both the tragic harlequin Petrouchka and a romantic Moor. To the horror of the crowd the Moor kills Petrouchka. The mountebank endeavors to reassure the people by telling them that Petrouchka was nothing but a big doll stuffed with sawdust. Alas for the mountebank! Back comes the ghost of Petrouchka to threaten him from the roof of the booth. This is too much for the guilty charlatan. Terror-stricken, he takes flight.

The ballet is scored for four flutes (two interchangeable with piccolo), four oboes (one interchangeable with English horn), four clarinets (one interchangeable with bass clarinet), four bassoons (one interchangeable with double-bassoon), four horns, two trumpets, two cornets-à-pistons, three trombones, bass tuba, kettledrums, side drum, tambour de Provence, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, xylophone, gong, celesta, piano, harp, and strings.

There have been conflicting stories about the origin of Petrouchka. According to the authoritative Beaumont, Mr. Stravinsky in 1909 conceived the idea of a ballet based on a primitive pagan rite, which he decided to call "Le Sacre du Printemps". He told Diaghileff of his conception; Diaghileff was enthusiastic and urged him to begin work.

"The composer, however, decided that he would first write a short composition which had been taking shape in his mind for some little time; it was to express a kind of burlesque duel between an animated puppet and an orchestra only, in which the puppet was finally slain by a terrific burst of cacophony. This piece he intended to call 'Petrouchka'.

"When Diaghileff visited Stravinsky he was greatly taken aback to be greeted with some of the themes of 'Petrouchka' instead of the airs for the promised 'Sacre du Printemps'. But he delighted in the novelty of the 'Petrouchka' music, which he saw as material for a fascinating ballet."

The scenario of "Petrouchka" is attributed officially to Mr. Stravinsky and Alexandre Benois, but Mr. Stravinsky himself has declared that his conversations with Diaghileff had much to do with the development of the action, thus admitting as collaborator the eminent director. The choreographer was Michel Fokine.

Diaghileff produced the work at the Théâtre du Châtelet, Paris, on June 13, 1911. Pierre Monteux conducted and the cast included Vaslav Nijinsky in the title role, Thamar Karsavina as the Ballerina, Alexander Orloff as the Moor, and Enrico Cecchetti as the mountebank. When on January 24, 1916, the Diaghileff Ballets Russes introduced "Petrouchka" to this country at the Century Theatre, New York, Leonide Massine impersonated Petrouchka, Adolf Bolm the Moor, and Lydia Lopokova the Ballerina, while Cecchetti resumed his original role.

Suite from the Ballet ("Danced Story") "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Firebird")........................Igor Feodorovitch Stravinsky

First of the ballets written by Mr. Stravinsky for the Diaghileff Ballets Russes, "The Firebird" was brought out by that organization at the Paris Opéra on June 25, 1910. Michel Fokine, who had derived the scenario from several Russian fairy tales and had provided the choreography, took the role of Ivan Tsarevitch; Thamar Karsavina was the Bird of Fire, Vera Fokina the Beautiful Tsarevna, and Enrico Cecchetti Köstchei the Immortal. Gabriel Pierné conducted.

The following description of the work is condensed from the "Complete Book of Ballets" by Cyril W. Beaumont: "The ballet commences with an overture which soon creates an atmosphere of witchcraft, goblins, and attendant magic. There are low mutterings, mysterious long-drawn wails, the tramp of gnomes underground, strange rustlings, and above all can be heard the tremulous whirr of the wings of a bird soaring in circular flight.

"When the curtain rises all is dark save only in the centre, where bathed in a circle of amber light, grows a tree, its branches laden with golden fruit. Presently a bird, gleaming with orange radiance, flashes across the background of foliage. Now it is possible to discern a high wall to the right, over which a youth in hunting-dress clambers. It is Ivan Tsarevitch. The whirr of wings is heard and the Bird of Fire flits to the tree. The Prince raises his weapon, takes aim, and looses the bolt, but he misses and the startled bird flies away into the depths of the forest.

"The Prince remains concealed and soon the bird returns. He approaches and catches it in his arms. The bird offers him a golden feather for ransom. Ivan allows it to go free. Through the trees runs a light palisade, ending in two gates, through which is visible a flight of steps. A plaintive melody is heard, and twelve maidens wind their way across a sloping eminence and down the steps. The Prince steps into the shadow.

"The gates open and the maidens go toward the tree, where they are presently joined by another whose rich dress proclaims her rank. They shake the tree so that the apples fall and roll in all directions. The maidens career in pursuit, and each casts her prize high in the air. Ivan comes from his hiding-place, but the leader of the maidens warns him to depart, for he is before the castle of Köstchei, an enchanter of mighty power, who captures all who trespass on his domains. The Prince, however, already in love with the maiden, wishes to stay.

"Suddenly there sounds a discordant note. The startled maidens run through the gates. The Prince is about to take his departure when

---

CULLED FROM THE MAIL

NY Times Apr 7 40

One View of Mr. Britten's Ideas

To the Music Editor:

As a visiting composer reporting his impressions of American musical life, Mr. Britten's observations in last Sunday's music section are not wholly accurate. Within the last two years I have traveled across this country more than ten times. I have attended concerts by major orchestras in all parts of the country, listened to broadcasts of the better serious music, commissioned works, festival, etc. I can therefore consider myself one of the better-equipped listeners interested in the finest American music can offer.

Mr. Britten cannot deny the fact—if he is really interested in what the American composer is up against—that men like Koussevitzky are few and far between, that the more vital and important works by Americans are completely ignored. How many of our younger composers receive the same opportunities for performance of their works as Mr. Britten received? He mentions the variety of opportunities which exist for the production of new music in this country, but he has evidently not investigated the internal politics and kowtowing to conservative public taste which is so rampant in this country's musical life.

Had Mr. Britten really been just in his appraisal of our magnificent opportunities, he would have taken into consideration the absence of works like the forceful symphony by Roger Sessions, the "Symphonic Ode" by Copland, the symphonies of Harris. And what of our other men — Piston, Hanson, Rogers? How often are their works heard? And the younger men of promise and originality: David Diamond, surely [illegible]e of the most important rising names, whose virile and exciting Psalm for Orchestra I heard in St. Louis under Golschmann, and, as far as I know, has not been given since? And what of Robert McBride, Mark Wessel, Burril Phillips, Hunter Johnson, to mention only a few? Mr. Britten might well examine Mr. Barbirolli's "imaginative" programs since he assumed the conductorship of the orchestra within our city. He will too soon find just what the real state of music is like in America.

Our Receptivity to New Music—Other Matters

There exists no real interest, courage or desire on the part of European conductors in America to seek out the best, the most stimulating that the American composer has to offer. The number of premières given third-rate works by Frenchmen, Rumanians, Austrians and Germans is astounding, considering that we do have the aforementioned Americans and the new works of Stravinsky, Bartók, Hindemith and Berg.

Robert Mayer.

New York, March 25, 1940.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUNDAY JOURNAL
& AMERICAN
APR 7 - 1940

Boston Symphony Ends Series Here

By GREN A BENNETT

The New York series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was completed yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with a Beethoven-Tschaikovsky program. The Fifth symphony by the last-named composer was in line with the celebration of the centenary of the great Slavic melodist, who was born 100 years ago on May 5.

Serge Koussevitzky occupied his customary place at the conductor's desk and directed his men with his well-known authority. It was not his fault that the horns played with occasional insecurity in Beethoven's ingratiating Symphony No. 4, for the indications to the men were the acme of security and lucidity. Otherwise, the beguiling pages of the composer's romantic work (a composition which some historians claim was a tribute to the mysterious "Immortal Beloved" whose real identity has never been definitely solved, was interpreted with the "grace and beauty" and the "mastery of movement" that are acknowledged by famous commentators.

In contrast to the above mentioned work was the Tschaikovsky Symphony, whose brooding and sombre motifs set in magnificent harmonies were communicated to the large and enthusiastic audience with profound and eloquent musicianship.

* * *

The "standing room only" announcement at the Metropolitan Opera House continued to be displayed at both of yesterday's performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. The matinee program was devoted to "Les Sylphides," "Petrouchka," "The Bluebird" and "Prince Igor." In the evening "Rouge et Noir," "Bogatyri," "Bacchanale" and "Capriccio Espagnole" were presented. This evening's offering of "Swan Lake," "Rouge et Noir," "Bachanale" and "Capriccio Espagnole" will inaugurate the final week of the engagement.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York

1842-1878
CONSOLIDATED 1928

1939 - NINETY-EIGHTH SEASON - 1940

CARNEGIE HALL

Sunday Afternoon, April 7, 1940
AT THREE
3629TH CONCERT

Under the Direction of
IGOR STRAVINSKY
Guest Composer-Conductor

STRAVINSKY PROGRAM

1. Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka"
   Russian Dance—Petrouchka at Home—The Fair in Festival Week—Dance of the Nurses—The Peasant and the Bear—The Merchant and the Gypsies—Dance of the Coachmen and Grooms—The Masqueraders.
2. Suite from the Danced Story "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Firebird")
   - I. Introduction: The Firebird and her Dance
   - II. Dance of the Princesses
   - III. Infernal Dance of Köstchei
   - IV. Berceuse
   - V. Finale

INTERMISSION

3. "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Consecration of the Spring"), Pictures of Pagan Russia
   - I. The Adoration of the Earth.
     Introduction—Harbingers of Spring—Dance of the Adolescents—Abduction—Spring Rounds—Games of the Rival Cities—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man)—Dance of the Earth.
   - II. The Sacrifice.
     Introduction—Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents—Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors— Ritual of the Ancestors—The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

ARTHUR JUDSON, Manager BRUNO ZIRATO, Assistant Manager
THE STEINWAY is the Official Piano of The Philharmonic-Symphony Society
VICTOR RECORDS

ORCHESTRA PENSION FUND—It is requested that subscribers who are unable to use their tickets, kindly return them to the Philharmonic-Symphony Offices, 113 West 57th Street, or to the Box Office, Carnegie Hall, to be sold for the benefit of the Orchestra Pension Fund. All tickets received will be acknowledged.

darkness descends and he is unable to find an outlet. He runs to and fro in terror and turns to the gates and shakes them. They fly open, the forest blazes with light, and down the eminence pours a motley horde of demons and goblins. They fall on the Prince and hold him fast to await the coming of Köstchei.

"He glares at his victim and strives to cast a spell upon him, but Ivan remembers the golden feather and waves it aloft. To his aid flies the glorious Bird of Fire, who begins a dance of closely increasing measure. The demons are compelled to follow her until exhausted they sink to the ground and fall into a deep slumber. The Bird of Fire bids Ivan take the chief of the maidens to a place of safety, then shows him a root which marks the base of a hollow tree. He crawls inside to reappear with an iron-bound casket.

"He raises the lid and withdraws an enormous egg, which he throws into the air and catches as it falls, while Köstchei, who knows that it contains his soul, trembles with fear and apprehension. In desperation he clutches at the precious object, but Ivan dashes it to the ground. There is a deafening crash and darkness falls.

"Presently the stage lightens. Köstchei, his court, and the Bird of Fire have vanished. In their place a group of young men, dressed richly, pay homage to Ivan. Down the steps comes a beautiful Princess, the maiden to whom he pledged his troth, and in her train a group of nobles and fair dames, now freed from enchantment by the death of Köstchei. They are followed by a procession of pages, who bear in their midst a crown, sceptre, and ermine robe. Ivan is invested with these symbols of power, and the assembly acclaim him as their deliverer and sovereign lord."

It is interesting to recall that the young and unknown Stravinsky was not the composer whom Michel Fokine had in mind when he devised the scenario of "The Firebird". The man of his choice was Anatol Liadoff, of "Music Box" fame. But Liadoff delayed, and eventually the assignment went to the fledgling whose orchestral piece "Fireworks", composed for the wedding of Rimsky-Korsakoff's daughter Nadeshda, who became the wife of Maximilian Steinberg, had impressed connoisseurs in 1908. (The recurrence of the "Fire" element apparently had no significance beyond the coincidental!) Mr. Stravinsky finished the score of the ballet in May, 1910, the month preceding the world première.

"The Firebird" was presented for the first time in America at the Century Theatre, New York, on January 17, 1916, when the Diaghileff Ballets Russes made their initial visit to this country. The conductor was Ernest Ansermet and the cast included Xenia Maclezova as the Bird of Fire, Leonide Massine as Ivan Tsarevitch, Lubov Tchernicheva as the beautiful Tsarevna, and once more Enrico Cecchetti as Köstchei the Immortal.

The suite performed at these concerts comprises five numbers: I. Introduction: The Firebird and her Dance; II. Dance of the Princesses; III. Infernal Dance of Köstchei; IV. Berceuse; V. Finale (the disappearance of Köstchei and his crew and the general rejoicing). There is no pause between sections I. and II. and IV. and V. The theme of the "Dance of the Princesses" is a folk-song from the Government of Novgorod, "As in the Little Green Garden". The horn theme heard in the Finale is another folk-song, "Near the Gate the Pine Was Waving".

In deference to the practical uses of the concert hall the vast array of instruments for which the ballet is scored has in the case of the suite been reduced. The instruments called for here by Mr. Stravinsky are two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, xylophone, harp, piano, and strings.

"LE SACRE DU PRINTEMPS" ("The Consecration of the Spring"): PICTURES OF PAGAN RUSSIA, IN TWO PARTS

IGOR FEODOROVITCH STRAVINSKY

The initial performance of "Le Sacre du Printemps" took place in Paris at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées on May 29, 1913, in the course of the season of the Diaghileff Ballets Russes, and the response of the audience to what it heard scarcely stopped short of massacre. Pierre Monteux conducted. The music was introduced to this country at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia, under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, on March 3, 1922. Mr. Monteux, who meantime had become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the work in Boston at the orchestra's concert of January 25, 1924. On the following January 31 Mr. Monteux and the Boston orchestra made the music known to New York at their regular concert in Carnegie Hall. Under the auspices of the League of Composers, "Le Sacre du Printemps" was staged for the first time in this country on April 11, 1930, at the Metropolitan Opera House, Philadelphia. On April 22 the production was shown at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Stokowski, officiated. The dancer of the Chosen One on these occasions was Martha Graham.

* * *

Mr. Stravinsky tells in his autobiography of the inception of the "Sacre": "One day, when I was finishing the last pages of 'L'Oiseau de Feu' in St. Petersburg, I had a fleeting vision which came to me as a complete surprise, my mind at the moment being full of other things. I saw in imagination a solemn pagan rite: sage elders, seated in a circle, watched a young girl dance herself to death. They were sacrificing her to propitiate the god of spring. Such was the theme of the 'Sacre du Printemps'. I must confess that this vision made a deep impression on me, and I at once described it to my friend Nicholas Roerich, he being a painter who had specialized in pagan subjects. He welcomed my inspiration with enthusiasm and became my collaborator in this creation. In Paris I told Diaghileff about it, and he was at once carried away by the idea."

From the first "Le Sacre" has been a matter for deep and learned discussion. According to Edith Sitwell, it "gives us the beginning of energy, the enormous and terrible shaping of the visible and invisible world through movement." And Miss Sitwell further observes: "Life is energy, and the very fact of that life will eventually push us over the abyss into the waiting and intolerable darkness."

Lazare Saminsky, in "Music of Our Day", places "Le Sacre" among the "most valuable" of Stravinsky's contributions. "The imagination of Stravinsky," he goes on, "perceives things and presents them musically in terms of noises immanent to those things, eternally present in them. He is curiously and characteristically deaf to the inner music of things—to their spiritual pulse. Let us recall the sharp and cold

---

N Y Times Apr 7 40

CULLED FROM THE MAIL

One View of Mr. Britten's Ideas

To the Music Editor:

As a visiting composer reporting his impressions of American musical life, Mr. Britten's observations in last Sunday's music section are not wholly accurate. Within the last two years I have traveled across this country more than ten times. I have attended concerts by major orchestras in all parts of the country, listened to broadcasts of the better serious music, commissioned works, festival, etc. I can therefore consider myself one of the better-equipped listeners interested in the finest American music can offer.

Mr. Britten cannot deny the fact—if he is really interested in what the American composer is up against—that men like Koussevitzky are few and far between, that the more vital and important works by Americans are completely ignored. How many of our younger composers receive the same opportunities for performance of their works as Mr. Britten received? He mentions the variety of opportunities which exist for the production of new music in this country, but he has evidently not investigated the internal politics and kowtowing to conservative public taste which is so rampant in this country's musical life.

Had Mr. Britten really been just in his appraisal of our magnificent opportunities, he would have taken into consideration the absence of works like the forceful symphony by Roger Sessions, the "Symphonic Ode" by Copland, the symphonies of Harris. And what of our other men — Piston, Hanson, Rogers? How often are their works heard? And the younger men of promise and originality: David Diamond, surely one of the most important rising names, whose virile and exciting Psalm for Orchestra I heard in St. Louis under Gelschmann, and, as far as I know, has not been given since? And what of Robert McBride, Mark Wessel, Burril Phillips, Hunter Johnson, to mention only a few? Mr. Britten might well examine Mr. Barbirolli's "imaginative" programs since he assumed the conductorship of the orchestra within our city. He will too soon find just what the real state of music is like in America.

Our Receptivity to New Music—Other Matters

There exists no real interest, courage or desire on the part of European conductors in America to seek out the best, the most stimulating that the American composer has to offer. The number of premières given third-rate works by Frenchmen, Rumanians, Austrians and Germans is astounding, considering that we do have the aforementioned Americans and the new works of Stravinsky, Bartók, Hindemith and Berg.

ROBERT MAYER.

New York, March 25, 1940.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUNDAY JOURNAL
& AMERICAN
APR 7 - 1940

Boston Symphony Ends Series Here

By GREN A BENNETT

The New York series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was completed yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with a Beethoven-Tschaikovsky program. The Fifth symphony by the last-named composer was in line with the celebration of the centenary of the great Slavic melodist, who was born 100 years ago on May 5.

Serge Koussevitzky occupied his customary place at the conductor's desk and directed his men with his well-known authority. It was not his fault that the horns played with occasional insecurity in Beethoven's ingratiating Symphony No. 4, for the indications to the men were the acme of security and lucidity. Otherwise, the beguiling pages of the composer's romantic work (a composition which some historians claim was a tribute to the mysterious "Immortal Beloved" whose real identity has never been definitely solved, was interpreted with the "grace and beauty" and the "mastery of movement" that are acknowledged by famous commentators.

In contrast to the above mentioned work was the Tschaikovsky Symphony, whose brooding and sombre motifs set in magnificent harmonies were communicated to the large and enthusiastic audience with profound and eloquent musicianship.

* * *

The "standing room only" announcement at the Metropolitan Opera House continued to be displayed at both of yesterday's performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. The matinee program was devoted to "Les Sylphides," "Petrouchka," "The Bluebird" and "Prince Igor." In the evening "Rouge et Noir," "Bogatyri," "Bacchanale" and "Capriccio Espagnole" were presented. This evening's offering of "Swan Lake," "Rouge et Noir," "Bachanale" and "Capriccio Espagnole" will inaugurate the final week of the engagement.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York

1842-1878
CONSOLIDATED 1928

1939 - NINETY-EIGHTH SEASON - 1940

CARNEGIE HALL

Sunday Afternoon, April 7, 1940
AT THREE
3629TH CONCERT

Under the Direction of
IGOR STRAVINSKY
Guest Composer-Conductor

STRAVINSKY PROGRAM

1. Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka"
   Russian Dance—Petrouchka at Home—The Fair in Festival Week—Dance of the Nurses—The Peasant and the Bear—The Merchant and the Gypsies—Dance of the Coachmen and Grooms—The Masqueraders
2. Suite from the Danced Story "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Firebird")
   - I. Introduction: The Firebird and her Dance
   - II. Dance of the Princesses
   - III. Infernal Dance of Köstchei
   - IV. Berceuse
   - V. Finale

INTERMISSION

3. "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Consecration of the Spring"), Pictures of Pagan Russia
   - I. The Adoration of the Earth.
     Introduction—Harbingers of Spring—Dance of the Adolescents—Abduction—Spring Rounds—Games of the Rival Cities—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man)—Dance of the Earth.
   - II. The Sacrifice.
     Introduction—Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents—Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors— Ritual of the Ancestors—The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One

ARTHUR JUDSON, Manager BRUNO ZIRATO, Assistant Manager
THE STEINWAY is the Official Piano of The Philharmonic-Symphony Society
VICTOR RECORDS

ORCHESTRA PENSION FUND—It is requested that subscribers who are unable to use their tickets, kindly return them to the Philharmonic-Symphony Offices 113 West 57th Street, or to the Box Office, Carnegie Hall, to be sold for the benefit of the Orchestra Pension Fund. All tickets received will be acknowledged glitter of the kermesses from 'Petrouchka', the spring-roundels from the 'Sacre', the Chinese march from the 'Rossignol', those glowing pages of tone-decor. In the creating anew of the inborn noises of things, of their resonance and physical boiling, lies the whole of Stravinsky's talent, magnificent of its kind.

"He is the father of the rebarbarization in music. He has transformed music into a collection of qualified noises, but fascinatingly colored, irresistible. He has reduced melody to the primitive, inarticulate refrain of a Zulu and has converted the orchestra into a gigantic rattle, the toy and mouthpiece of the new savage."

If here a primitive element in Stravinsky's music is emphasized, the unique Erik Satie dwells with no less assurance on the "transparency" of its sound. "This is a quality," he declares, "that one always finds in the purists, who never leave any 'residuum' in their sonority, that residuum which you will ever encounter in the musical fabric of impressionistic composers and also, alas! even in that of the Romantics.

"Palestrina makes us 'hear' this sonorous 'transparency'; he was an expert manipulator of it and seems to have been the first to import this phenomenon into music.

"The exquisite Mozart used it in a way that defies analysis. One stands confounded before such mastery, such a subtle 'clairvoyance' of sound, a phonic lucidity so calm and so perfect.

"Any one of Igor Stravinsky's works will cause you to perceive with extraordinary clearness this vibratory 'transparency' of which I speak. 'Le Sacre du Printemps' is full of it; and it is perhaps in this work that it will appear to you with the most persuasiveness; you will be prodigiously bathed in it, deeply saturated."

That doughty champion, Boris de Schloezer, touches on the subject of Stravinsky's melody: "Whatever be the historic origins of song, even if one admit that it began as the howl, i.e., direct, as you might say, physiological expression of emotion, its development is indisputably due to detaching it from its physiological sources and to organizing it according to acoustic and aesthetic principles. Melody is the creation of human intelligence standing up against nature. . . . There is an intellectual part in every melody, and for that reason it demands comprehension from the auditor. . . .

"As for the great public's taste for melody, it is a matter of only a certain kind of melody to which it has been trained and habituated and which it likes to recognize; once you depart from that type we are all more or less disoriented, for the most difficult thing of all to seize is a melody that follows an unexpected course. Thus the first judgment people deliver on a work that they have not understood is that it lacks melody; they said this of Mozart and they say it today of Ravel, Debussy, and Stravinsky.

"If the 'Sacre' finally imposed itself, this was in spite of melodic structure and thanks to the hallucinating power of its rhythm, to its glittering timbres, and to its cyclopean chords. But even today the polyphonic idiom of 'Sacre' remains, in all probability, a closed book to many of its auditors. . . . It needed Stravinsky's genius, his radicalism intolerant of compromise, his love of risk, and this absence of aesthetic aristocratism which we have observed in most Russian artists to bring in the renaissance of a classic art and to reconstitute a style in the midst of this 'war of everyone against everyone else' which modern musical life had become."

Thus, in the words of the late Philip Hale, might Captain Lemuel Gulliver have heard learned professors discussing at the Academy of Legado.

* * *

The large orchestra employed in this score comprises two piccolos, two flutes, flute in G, four oboes (one interchangeable with a second English horn), English horn, three clarinets (one interchangeable with a second bass clarinet), clarinet in E-flat, bass clarinet, four bassoons (one interchageable with a second double-bassoon), double-bassoon, eight horns (two interchangeable with Bayreuth tubas), four trumpets, trumpet in D, bass trumpet, three trombones, two tubas, four kettledrums, small kettledrums, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, antique cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, rape guero (scratcher), and strings.

IGOR STRAVINSKY

Himself an opera singer, Feodor Stravinsky planned a legal career for his son Igor. In 1902, however, the young Stravinsky met Rimsky-Korsakoff in Germany and was so deeply impressed that he decided to devote his life to music. A few years later another crucial meeting, this time with Serge Diaghileff, had two further important results: it made Paris the center of Mr. Stravinsky's activity and it launched him as a ballet composer of marked individuality. From 1910 to 1917 appeared successively "The Firebird", "Petrouchka", "Le Sacre du Printemps", and "The Nightingale". "Les Noces" followed in 1920 and "Apollon Musagète" in 1928. In "Le Sacre" Mr. Stravinsky used such unconventional rhythms and harmonies that he became a storm-center of esthetic controversy. Among his other compositions have been "Histoire du Soldat", "Symphonies of Wind Instruments in Memory of Debussy", the opera "Mavra", the secular oratorio "Oedipus Rex", "The Symphony of Psalms", a violin concerto, a piano sonata, a piano concerto, and the ballet-opera "Persephone". In 1937 he added "Jeu de Cartes" to his long list of ballet scores. On account of conditions in Russia Mr. Stravinsky has become a French citizen.

COMING PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT CARNEGIE HALL

Under the Direction of

JOHN BARBIROLLI

THURSDAY EVENING, APRIL 11, AT 8:45
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 12, AT 2:30
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 14, AT 3:00

1. MOZART..Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito"
2. HAYDN................................Symphony in D major, B. & H. No. 104
3. BERNARD HERRMANN......"Moby Dick", A Cantata for Male Chorus, Soloists and Orchestra. Text selected and arranged from the novel by Herman Melville, by W. Clark Harrington.

(First performance)

Ishmael	WILLIAM HAIN
Ahab	ROBERT WEEDE
Starbuck	WILLIAM HORNE
Pip	PHILIP REEP
Bass	GEAN GREENWELL

Male Chorus of the WESTMINSTER CHOIR
John Finley Williamson, Conductor

NY Times Apr 7 '40

CULLED FROM THE MAIL

One View of Mr. Britten's Ideas

To the Music Editor:

As a visiting composer reporting his impressions of American musical life, Mr. Britten's observations in last Sunday's music section are not wholly accurate. Within the last two years I have traveled across this country more than ten times. I have attended concerts by major orchestras in all parts of the country, listened to broadcasts of the better serious music, commissioned works, festival, etc. I can therefore consider myself one of the better-equipped listeners interested in the finest American music can offer.

Mr. Britten cannot deny the fact—if he is really interested in what the American composer is up against—that men like Koussevitzky are few and far between, that the more vital and important works by Americans are completely ignored. How many of our younger composers receive the same opportunities for performance of their works as Mr. Britten received? He mentions the variety of opportunities which exist for the production of new music in this country, but he has evidently not investigated the internal politics and kowtowing to conservative public taste which is so rampant in this country's musical life.

Had Mr. Britten really been just in his appraisal of our magnificent opportunities, he would have taken into consideration the absence of works like the forceful symphony by Roger Sessions, the "Symphonic Ode" by Copland, the symphonies of Harris. And what of our other men — Piston, Hanson, Rogers? How often are their works heard? And the younger men of promise and originality: David Diamond, surely one of the most important rising names, whose virile and exciting Psalm for Orchestra I heard in St. Louis under Golschmann, and, as far as I know, has not been given since? And what of Robert McBride, Mark Wessel, Burril Phillips, Hunter Johnson, to mention only a few? Mr. Britten might well examine Mr. Barbirolli's "imaginative" programs since he assumed the conductorship of the orchestra within our city. He will too soon find just what the real state of music is like in America.

Our Receptivity to New Music—Other Matters

There exists no real interest, courage or desire on the part of European conductors in America to seek out the best, the most stimulating that the American composer has to offer. The number of premières given third-rate works by Frenchmen, Rumanians, Austrians and Germans is astounding, considering that we do have the aforementioned Americans and the new works of Stravinsky, Bartók, Hindemith and Berg.

ROBERT MAYER.

New York, March 25, 1940.

THIS CLIPPING FROM:
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUNDAY JOURNAL & AMERICAN
APR 7 - 1940

Boston Sumphony Ends Series Here

By GREN A BENNETT

The New York series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was completed yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with a Beethoven-Tschaikovsky program. The Fifth symphony by the last-named composer was in line with the celebration of the centenary of the great Slavic melodist, who was born 100 years ago on May 5.

Serge Koussevitzky occupied his customary place at the conductor's desk and directed his men with his well-known authority. It was not his fault that the horns played with occasional insecurity in Beethoven's ingratiating Symphony No. 4, for the indications to the men were the acme of security and lucidity. Otherwise, the beguiling pages of the composer's romantic work (a composition which some historians claim was a tribute to the mysterious "Immortal Beloved" whose real identity has never been definitely solved, was interpreted with the "grace and beauty" and the "mastery of movement" that are acknowledged by famous commentators.

In contrast to the above mentioned work was the Tschaikovsky Symphony, whose brooding and sombre motifs set in magnificent harmonies were communicated to the large and enthusiastic audience with profound and eloquent musicianship.

* * *

The "standing room only" announcement at the Metropolitan Opera House continued to be displayed at both of yesterday's performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. The matinee program was devoted to "Les Sylphides," "Petrouchka," "The Bluebird" and "Prince Igor." In the evening "Rouge et Noir," "Bogatyri," "Bacchanale" and "Capriccio Espagnole" were presented. This evening's offering of "Swan Lake," "Rouge et Noir," "Bachanale" and "Capriccio Espagnole" will inaugurate the final week of the engagement.

---

lharmonic-Symphony Society of New York

1842-1878
CONSOLIDATED 1928

1939 - NINETY-EIGHTH SEASON - 1940

CARNEGIE HALL

Sunday Afternoon, April 7, 1940
AT THREE
3629TH CONCERT

Under the Direction of

IGOR STRAVINSKY
Guest Composer-Conductor

STRAVINSKY PROGRAM

1. Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka"
   Russian Dance—Petrouchka at Home—The Fair in Festival Week—Dance of the Nurses—The Peasant and the Bear—The Merchant and the Gypsies—Dance of the Coachmen and Grooms—The Masqueraders.
2. Suite from the Danced Story "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Firebird")
   - I. Introduction: The Firebird and her Dance
   - II. Dance of the Princesses
   - III. Infernal Dance of Köstchei
   - IV. Berceuse
   - V. Finale

INTERMISSION

3. "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Consecration of the Spring"), Pictures of Pagan Russia
   - I. The Adoration of the Earth.
     Introduction—Harbingers of Spring—Dance of the Adolescents—Abduction—Spring Rounds—Games of the Rival Cities—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man)—Dance of the Earth.
   - II. The Sacrifice.
     Introduction—Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents—Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors— Ritual of the Ancestors—The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

ARTHUR JUDSON, Manager BRUNO ZIRATO, Assistant Manager
THE STEINWAY is the Official Piano of The Philharmonic-Symphony Society
VICTOR RECORDS

ORCHESTRA PENSION FUND—It is requested that subscribers who are unable to use their tickets, kindly return them to the Philharmonic-Symphony Offices, 113 West 57th Street, or to the Box Office, Carnegie Hall, to be sold for the benefit of the Orchestra Pension Fund. All tickets received will be acknowledged.

etrouchka', the spring-roundels from the the 'Rossignol', those glowing pages of w of the inborn noises of things, of their , lies the whole of Stravinsky's talent, ebarbarization in music. He has trans-of qualified noises, but fascinatingly duced melody to the primitive, inarticu-converted the orchestra into a gigantic f the new savage."

in Stravinsky's music is emphasized, the no less assurance on the "transparency"
," he declares, "that one always finds in 'residuum' in their sonority, that resiounter in the musical fabric of impresas! even in that of the Romantics.
this sonorous 'transparency'; he was an ms to have been the first to import this d it in a way that defies analysis. One mastery, such a subtle 'clairvoyance' of

and so perfect.
sky's works will cause you to perceive is vibratory 'transparency' of which I
' is full of it; and it is perhaps in this with the most persuasiveness; you will eply saturated."
ris de Schloezer, touches on the subject ver be the historic origins of song, even e howl, i.e., direct, as you might say, ion, its development is indisputably due ical sources and to organizing it accordrinciples. Melody is the creation of against nature. . . . There is an intel-d for that reason it demands compreaste for melody, it is a matter of only a it has been trained and habituated and you depart from that type we are all most difficult thing of all to seize is a cted course. Thus the first judgment ey have not understood is that it lacks and they say it today of Ravel, Debussy, sed itself, this was in spite of melodic lucinating power of its rhythm, to its pean chords. But even today the poly-

, in all probability, a closed book to ded Stravinsky's genius, his radicalism e of risk, and this absence of aesthetic rved in most Russian artists to bring in nd to reconstitute a style in the midst everyone else' which modern musical

Thus, in the words of the late Philip Hale, might Captain Lemuel Gulliver have heard learned professors discussing at the Academy of Legado.

* * *

The large orchestra employed in this score comprises two piccolos, two flutes, flute in G, four oboes (one interchangeable with a second English horn), English horn, three clarinets (one interchangeable with a second bass clarinet), clarinet in E-flat, bass clarinet, four bassoons (one interchageable with a second double-bassoon), double-bassoon, eight horns (two interchangeable with Bayreuth tubas), four trumpets, trumpet in D, bass trumpet, three trombones, two tubas, four kettledrums, small kettledrums, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, antique cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, rape guero (scratcher), and strings.

IGOR STRAVINSKY

Himself an opera singer, Feodor Stravinsky planned a legal career for his son Igor. In 1902, however, the young Stravinsky met Rimsky-Korsakoff in Germany and was so deeply impressed that he decided to devote his life to music. A few years later another crucial meeting, this time with Serge Diaghileff, had two further important results: it made Paris the center of Mr. Stravinsky's activity and it launched him as a ballet composer of marked individuality. From 1910 to 1917 appeared successively "The Firebird", "Petrouchka", "Le Sacre du Printemps", and "The Nightingale". "Les Noces" followed in 1920 and "Apollon Musagète" in 1928. In "Le Sacre" Mr. Stravinsky used such unconventional rhythms and harmonies that he became a storm-center of esthetic controversy. Among his other compositions have been "Histoire du Soldat", "Symphonies of Wind Instruments in Memory of Debussy", the opera "Mavra", the secular oratorio "Oedipus Rex", "The Symphony of Psalms", a violin concerto, a piano sonata, a piano concerto, and the ballet-opera "Persephone". In 1937 he added "Jeu de Cartes" to his long list of ballet scores. On account of conditions in Russia Mr. Stravinsky has become a French citizen.

COMING PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT CARNEGIE HALL

Under the Direction of
JOHN BARBIROLLI

THURSDAY EVENING, APRIL 11, AT 8:45
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 12, AT 2:30
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 14, AT 3:00

1. MOZART....................Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito"
2. HAYDN....................Symphony in D major, B. & H. No. 104
3. BERNARD HERRMANN......"Moby Dick", A Cantata for Male Chorus, Soloists and Orchestra. Text selected and arranged from the novel by Herman Melville, by W. Clark Harrington.

(First performance)

Ishmael	WILLIAM HAIN
Ahab	ROBERT WEEDE
Starbuck	WILLIAM HORNE
Pip	PHILIP REEP
Bass	GEAN GREENWELL

Male Chorus of the WESTMINSTER CHOIR
John Finley Williamson, Conductor

CULLED FROM THE MAIL POUCH

NY Times Apr 7 40

14

One View of Mr. Britten's Ideas

To the Music Editor:

As a visiting composer reporting his impressions of American musical life, Mr. Britten's observations in last Sunday's music section are not wholly accurate. Within the last two years I have traveled across this country more than ten times. I have attended concerts by major orchestras in all parts of the country, listened to broadcasts of the better serious music, commissioned works, festival, etc. I can therefore consider myself one of the better-equipped listeners interested in the finest American music can offer.

Mr. Britten cannot deny the fact—if he is really interested in what the American composer is up against—that men like Koussevitzky are few and far between, that the more vital and important works by Americans are completely ignored. How many of our younger composers receive the same opportunities for performance of their works as Mr. Britten received? He mentions the variety of opportunities which exist for the production of new music in this country, but he has evidently not investigated the internal politics and kowtowing to conservative public taste which is so rampant in this country's musical life.

Had Mr. Britten really been just in his appraisal of our magnificent opportunities, he would have taken into consideration the absence of works like the forceful symphony by Roger Sessions, the "Symphonic Ode" by Copland, the symphonies of Harris. And what of our other men — Piston, Hanson, Rogers? How often are their works heard? And the younger men of promise and originality: David Diamond, surely [illegible] of the most important rising names, whose virile and exciting Psalm for Orchestra I heard in St. Louis under Golschmann, and, as far as I know, has not been given since? And what of Robert McBride, Mark Wessel, Burril Phillips, Hunter Johnson, to mention only a few? Mr. Britten might well examine Mr. Barbirolli's "imaginative" programs since he assumed the conductorship of the orchestra within our city. He will too soon find just what the real state of music is like in America.

Our Receptivity to New Music—Other Matters

There exists no real interest, courage or desire on the part of European conductors in America to seek out the best, the most stimulating that the American composer has to offer. The number of premières given third-rate works by Frenchmen, Rumanians, Austrians and Germans is astounding, considering that we do have the aforementioned Americans and the new works of Stravinsky, Bartók, Hindemith and Berg.

ROBERT MAYER.

New York, March 25, 1940.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUNDAY JOURNAL
& AMERICAN
APR 7 - 1940

Boston Symphony Ends Series Here

By GREN A BENNETT

The New York series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was completed yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with a Beethoven-Tschaikovsky program. The Fifth symphony by the last-named composer was in line with the celebration of the centenary of the great Slavic melodist, who was born 100 years ago on May 5.

Serge Koussevitzky occupied his customary place at the conductor's desk and directed his men with his well-known authority. It was not his fault that the horns played with occasional insecurity in Beethoven's ingratiating Symphony No. 4, for the indications to the men were the acme of security and lucidity. Otherwise, the beguiling pages of the composer's romantic work (a composition which some historians claim was a tribute to the mysterious "Immortal Beloved" whose real identity has never been definitely solved, was interpreted with the "grace and beauty" and the "mastery of movement" that are acknowledged by famous commentators.

In contrast to the above mentioned work was the Tschaikovsky Symphony, whose brooding and sombre motifs set in magnificent harmonies were communicated to the large and enthusiastic audience with profound and eloquent musicianship.

* * *

The "standing room only" announcement at the Metropolitan Opera House continued to be displayed at both of yesterday's performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. The matinee program was devoted to "Les Sylphides," "Petrouchka," "The Bluebird" and "Prince Igor." In the evening "Rouge et Noir," "Bogatyri," "Bacchanale" and "Capriccio Espagnole" were presented. This evening's offering of "Swan Lake," "Rouge et Noir," "Bachanale" and "Capriccio Espagnole" will inaugurate the final week of the engagement.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York

1842-1878
CONSOLIDATED 1928

1939 - NINETY-EIGHTH SEASON - 1940

CARNEGIE HALL

Sunday Afternoon, April 7, 1940
AT THREE
3629TH CONCERT

Under the Direction of
IGOR STRAVINSKY
Guest Composer-Conductor

STRAVINSKY PROGRAM

1. Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka"
   Russian Dance—Petrouchka at Home—The Fair in Festival Week—Dance of the Nurses—The Peasant and the Bear—The Merchant and the Gypsies—Dance of the Coachmen and Grooms—The Masqueraders.
2. Suite from the Danced Story "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Firebird")
   - I. Introduction: The Firebird and her Dance
   - II. Dance of the Princesses
   - III. Infernal Dance of Köstchei
   - IV. Berceuse
   - V. Finale

INTERMISSION

3. "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Consecration of the Spring"), Pictures of Pagan Russia
   - I. The Adoration of the Earth.
     Introduction—Harbingers of Spring—Dance of the Adolescents—Abduction—Spring Rounds—Games of the Rival Cities—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man)—Dance of the Earth.
   - II. The Sacrifice.
     Introduction—Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents—Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors— Ritual of the Ancestors—The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

ARTHUR JUDSON, Manager
BRUNO ZIRATO, Assistant Manager
THE STEINWAY is the Official Piano of The Philharmonic-Symphony Society
VICTOR RECORDS

ORCHESTRA PENSION FUND—It is requested that subscribers who are unable to use their tickets, kindly return them to the Philharmonic-Symphony Offices, 113 West 57th Street, or to the Box Office, Carnegie Hall, to be sold for the benefit of the Orchestra Pension Fund. All tickets received will be acknowledged.

'Petrouchka', the spring-roundels from the om the 'Rossignol', those glowing pages of new of the inborn noises of things, of their ng, lies the whole of Stravinsky's talent, rebarbarization in music. He has transon of qualified noises, but fascinatingly reduced melody to the primitive, inarticu-s converted the orchestra into a gigantic of the new savage."

t in Stravinsky's music is emphasized, the no less assurance on the "transparency" ty," he declares, "that one always finds in ny 'residuum' in their sonority, that resi-counter in the musical fabric of impres-alas! even in that of the Romantics.
r' this sonorous 'transparency'; he was an eems to have been the first to import this sed it in a way that defies analysis. One mastery, such a subtle 'clairvoyance' of m and so perfect.

insky's works will cause you to perceive this vibratory 'transparency' of which I ps' is full of it; and it is perhaps in this u with the most persuasiveness; you will deeply saturated."
Boris de Schloezer, touches on the subject tever be the historic origins of song, even the howl, i.e., direct, as you might say, otion, its development is indisputably due ogical sources and to organizing it accord-principles. Melody is the creation of p against nature. . . . There is an inteland for that reason it demands compretaste for melody, it is a matter of only a h it has been trained and habituated and ce you depart from that type we are all he most difficult thing of all to seize is a pected course. Thus the first judgment they have not understood is that it lacks rt and they say it today of Ravel, Debussy,

posed itself, this was in spite of melodic hallucinating power of its rhythm, to its clopean chords. But even today the poly-ins, in all probability, a closed book to eeded Stravinsky's genius, his radicalism love of risk, and this absence of aest' served in most Russian artists to bri and to reconstitute a style in the r st everyone else' which modern mu

Thus, in the words of the late Philip Hale, might Captain Lemuel Gulliver have heard learned professors discussing at the Academy of Legado.

* * *

The large orchestra employed in this score comprises two piccolos, two flutes, flute in G, four oboes (one interchangeable with a second English horn), English horn, three clarinets (one interchangeable with a second bass clarinet), clarinet in E-flat, bass clarinet, four bassoons (one interchageable with a second double-bassoon), double-bassoon, eight horns (two interchangeable with Bayreuth tubas), four trumpets, trumpet in D, bass trumpet, three trombones, two tubas, four kettledrums, small kettledrums, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, antique cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, rape guero (scratcher), and strings.

IGOR STRAVINSKY

Himself an opera singer, Feodor Stravinsky planned a legal career for his son Igor. In 1902, however, the young Stravinsky met Rimsky-Korsakoff in Germany and was so deeply impressed that he decided to devote his life to music. A few years later another crucial meeting, this time with Serge Diaghileff, had two further important results: it made Paris the center of Mr. Stravinsky's activity and it launched him as a ballet composer of marked individuality. From 1910 to 1917 appeared successively "The Firebird", "Petrouchka", "Le Sacre du Printemps", and "The Nightingale". "Les Noces" followed in 1920 and "Apollon Musagète" in 1928. In "Le Sacre" Mr. Stravinsky used such unconventional rhythms and harmonies that he became a storm-center of esthetic controversy. Among his other compositions have been "Histoire du Soldat", "Symphonies of Wind Instruments in Memory of Debussy", the opera "Mavra", the secular oratorio "Oedipus Rex", "The Symphony of Psalms", a violin concerto, a piano sonata, a piano concerto, and the ballet-opera "Persephone". In 1937 he added "Jeu de Cartes" to his long list of ballet scores. On account of conditions in Russia Mr. Stravinsky has become a French citizen.

COMING PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT CARNEGIE HALL

Under the Direction of

JOHN BARBIROLLI

THURSDAY EVENING, APRIL 11, AT 8:45
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 12, AT 2:30
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 14, AT 3:00

1. MOZART..Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito"
2. HAYDN................................Symphony in D major, B. & H. No. 104
3. BERNARD HERRMANN......"Moby Dick", A Cantata for Male Chorus, Soloists and Orchestra. Text selected and arranged from the novel by Herman Melville, by W. Clark Harrington.

(First performance)

Ishmael	WILLIAM HAIN
Ahab	ROBERT WEEDE
Starbuck	WILLIAM HORNE
Pip	PHILIP REEP
Bass	GEAN GREENWELL

Male Chorus of the WESTMINSTER CHOIR

CULLED FROM THE MAIL POUCH

NY Times apr 7 '40

14

One View of Mr. Britten's Ideas

To the Music Editor:

As a visiting composer reporting his impressions of American musical life, Mr. Britten's observations in last Sunday's music section are not wholly accurate. Within the last two years I have traveled across this country more than ten times. I have attended concerts by major orchestras in all parts of the country, listened to broadcasts of the better serious music, commissioned works, festival, etc. I can therefore consider myself one of the better-equipped listeners interested in the finest American music can offer.

Mr. Britten cannot deny the fact—if he is really interested in what the American composer is up against—that men like Koussevitzky are few and far between, that the more vital and important works by Americans are completely ignored. How many of our younger composers receive the same opportunities for performance of their works as Mr. Britten received? He mentions the variety of opportunities which exist for the production of new music in this country, but he has evidently not investigated the internal politics and kowtowing to conservative public taste which is so rampant in this country's musical life.

Had Mr. Britten really been just in his appraisal of our magnificent opportunities, he would have taken into consideration the absence of works like the forceful symphony by Roger Sessions, the "Symphonic Ode" by Copland, the symphonies of Harris. And what of our other men — Piston, Hanson, Rogers? How often are their works heard? And the younger men of promise and originality: David Diamond, surely one of the most important rising names, whose virile and exciting Psalm for Orchestra I heard in St. Louis under Golschmann, and, as far as I know, has not been given since? And what of Robert McBride, Mark Wessel, Burril Phillips, Hunter Johnson, to mention only a few? Mr. Britten might well examine Mr. Barbirolli's "imaginative" programs since he assumed the conductorship of the orchestra within our city. He will too soon find just what the real state of music is like in America.

Our Receptivity to New Music—Other Matters

There exists no real interest, courage or desire on the part of European conductors in America to seek out the best, the most stimulating that the American composer has to offer. The number of premières given third-rate works by Frenchmen, Rumanians, Austrians and Germans is astounding, considering that we do have the aforementioned Americans and the new works of Stravinsky, Bartók, Hindemith and Berg.

ROBERT MAYER.

New York, March 25, 1940.

Those who wish to obtain scores of any of the works on this program for home study should apply at the Music Branch of the New York Public Library, 121 East 58th St., which has a large collection of music available for circulation.

NOTES ON THE PROGRAM

By PITTS SANBORN

SUITE FROM THE BALLET "PETROUCHKA"
IGOR FEODOROVITCH STRAVINSKY

(Born at Oranienbaum, near Leningrad, June 5, 1882; now living in Boston)

Of all Mr. Stravinsky's works for the theatre, whether ballet or opera, the most familiar and the best liked is undoubtedly "Petrouchka". There is no need here of relating the plot in detail. The piece might be conveniently described as a sort of tragic burlesque of "Pagliacci", with the Admiralty Square at St. Petersburg in the winter of 1830 as the locale.

To the motley Shrovetide crowd an old mountebank offers a puppet show concerned with a dancing girl who is beloved by both the tragic harlequin Petrouchka and a romantic Moor. To the horror of the crowd the Moor kills Petrouchka. The mountebank endeavors to reassure the people by telling them that Petrouchka was nothing but a big doll stuffed with sawdust. Alas for the mountebank! Back comes the ghost of Petrouchka to threaten him from the roof of the booth. This is too much for the guilty charlatan. Terror-stricken, he takes flight.

The ballet is scored for four flutes (two interchangeable with piccolo), four oboes (one interchangeable with English horn), four clarinets (one interchangeable with bass clarinet), four bassoons (one interchangeable with double-bassoon), four horns, two trumpets, two cornets-à-pistons, three trombones, bass tuba, kettledrums, side drum, tambour de Provence, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, xylophone, gong, celesta, piano, harp, and strings.

There have been conflicting stories about the origin of Petrouchka. According to the authoritative Beaumont, Mr. Stravinsky in 1909 conceived the idea of a ballet based on a primitive pagan rite, which he decided to call "Le Sacre du Printemps". He told Diaghileff of his conception; Diaghileff was enthusiastic and urged him to begin work.

"The composer, however, decided that he would first write a short composition which had been taking shape in his mind for some little time; it was to express a kind of burlesque duel between an animated puppet and an orchestra only, in which the puppet was finally slain by a terrific burst of cacophony. This piece he intended to call 'Petrouchka'.

"When Diaghileff visited Stravinsky he was greatly taken aback to be greeted with some of the themes of 'Petrouchka' instead of the airs for the promised 'Sacre du Printemps'. But he delighted in the novelty of the 'Petrouchka' music, which he saw as material for a fascinating ballet."

The scenario of "Petrouchka" is attributed officially to Mr. Stravinsky and Alexandre Benois, but Mr. Stravinsky himself has declared that his conversations with Diaghileff had much to do with the development of the action, thus admitting as collaborator the eminent director. The choreographer was Michel Fokine.

Diaghileff produced the work at the Théâtre du Châtelet, Paris, on June 13, 1911. Pierre Monteux conducted and the cast included Vaslav Nijinsky in the title role, Thamar Karsavina as the Ballerina, Alexander Orloff as the Moor, and Enrico Cecchetti as the mountebank. When on January 24, 1916, the Diaghileff Ballets Russes introduced "Petrouchka" to this country at the Century Theatre, New York, Leonide Massine impersonated Petrouchka, Adolf Bolm the Moor, and Lydia Lopokova the Ballerina, while Cecchetti resumed his original role.

SUITE FROM THE BALLET ("DANCED STORY") "L'OISEAU DE FEU"
("THE FIREBIRD")........................IGOR FEODOROVITCH STRAVINSKY

First of the ballets written by Mr. Stravinsky for the Diaghileff Ballets Russes, "The Firebird" was brought out by that organization at the Paris Opéra on June 25, 1910. Michel Fokine, who had derived the scenario from several Russian fairy tales and had provided the choreography, took the role of Ivan Tsarevitch; Thamar Karsavina was the Bird of Fire, Vera Fokina the Beautiful Tsarevna, and Enrico Cecchetti Köstchei the Immortal. Gabriel Pierné conducted.

The following description of the work is condensed from the "Complete Book of Ballets" by Cyril W. Beaumont: "The ballet commences with an overture which soon creates an atmosphere of witchcraft, goblins, and attendant magic. There are low mutterings, mysterious long-drawn wails, the tramp of gnomes underground, strange rustlings, and above all can be heard the tremulous whirr of the wings of a bird soaring in circular flight.

"When the curtain rises all is dark save only in the centre, where bathed in a circle of amber light, grows a tree, its branches laden with golden fruit. Presently a bird, gleaming with orange radiance, flashes across the background of foliage. Now it is possible to discern a high wall to the right, over which a youth in hunting-dress clambers. It is Ivan Tsarevitch. The whirr of wings is heard and the Bird of Fire flits to the tree. The Prince raises his weapon, takes aim, and looses the bolt, but he misses and the startled bird flies away into the depths of the forest.

"The Prince remains concealed and soon the bird returns. He approaches and catches it in his arms. The bird offers him a golden feather for ransom. Ivan allows it to go free. Through the trees runs a light palisade, ending in two gates, through which is visible a flight of steps. A plaintive melody is heard, and twelve maidens wind their way across a sloping eminence and down the steps. The Prince steps into the shadow.

"The gates open and the maidens go toward the tree, where they are presently joined by another whose rich dress proclaims her rank. They shake the tree so that the apples fall and roll in all directions. The maidens career in pursuit, and each casts her prize high in the air. Ivan comes from his hiding-place, but the leader of the maidens warns him to depart, for he is before the castle of Köstchei, an enchanter of mighty power, who captures all who trespass on his domains. The Prince, however, already in love with the maiden, wishes to stay.

"Suddenly there sounds a discordant note. The startled maidens run through the gates. The Prince is about to take his departure when

'Petrouchka', the spring-roundels from the om the 'Rossignol', those glowing pages of new of the inborn noises of things, of their ng, lies the whole of Stravinsky's talent,

rebarbarization in music. He has trans-ion of qualified noises, but fascinatingly
reduced melody to the primitive, inarticu-as converted the orchestra into a gigantic
e of the new savage."
nt in Stravinsky's music is emphasized, the h no less assurance on the "transparency" ity," he declares, "that one always finds in any 'residuum' in their sonority, that resincounter in the musical fabric of impres-
alas! even in that of the Romantics.
ar' this sonorous 'transparency'; he was an seems to have been the first to import this ised it in a way that defies analysis. One h mastery, such a subtle 'clairvoyance' of lm and so perfect.

vinsky's works will cause you to perceive this vibratory 'transparency' of which I mps' is full of it; and it is perhaps in this ou with the most persuasiveness; you will deeply saturated."
Boris de Schloezer, touches on the subject atever be the historic origins of song, even s the howl, i.e., direct, as you might say, notion, its development is indisputably due logical sources and to organizing it accord-c principles. Melody is the creation of up against nature. . . . There is an inteland for that reason it demands compre-

s taste for melody, it is a matter of only a ich it has been trained and habituated and nce you depart from that type we are all the most difficult thing of all to seize is a xpected course. Thus the first judgment
t they have not understood is that it lacks
art and they say it today of Ravel, Debussy, nposed itself, this was in spite of melodic hallucinating power of its rhythm, to its yclopean chords. But even today the poly-ains, in all probability, a closed book to needed Stravinsky's genius, his radicalism love of risk, and this absence of aes bserved in most Russian artists to bri rt and to reconstitute a style in the inst everyone else' which modern m

Thus, in the words of the late Philip Hale, might Captain Lemuel Gulliver have heard learned professors discussing at the Academy of Legado.

* * *

The large orchestra employed in this score comprises two piccolos, two flutes, flute in G, four oboes (one interchangeable with a second English horn), English horn, three clarinets (one interchangeable with a second bass clarinet), clarinet in E-flat, bass clarinet, four bassoons (one interchageable with a second double-bassoon), double-bassoon, eight horns (two interchangeable with Bayreuth tubas), four trumpets, trumpet in D, bass trumpet, three trombones, two tubas, four kettledrums, small kettledrums, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, antique cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, rape guero (scratcher), and strings.

IGOR STRAVINSKY

Himself an opera singer, Feodor Stravinsky planned a legal career for his son Igor. In 1902, however, the young Stravinsky met Rimsky-Korsakoff in Germany and was so deeply impressed that he decided to devote his life to music. A few years later another crucial meeting, this time with Serge Diaghileff, had two further important results: it made Paris the center of Mr. Stravinsky's activity and it launched him as a ballet composer of marked individuality. From 1910 to 1917 appeared successively "The Firebird", "Petrouchka", "Le Sacre du Printemps", and "The Nightingale". "Les Noces" followed in 1920 and "Apollon Musagète" in 1928. In "Le Sacre" Mr. Stravinsky used such unconventional rhythms and harmonies that he became a storm-center of esthetic controversy. Among his other compositions have been "Histoire du Soldat", "Symphonies of Wind Instruments in Memory of Debussy", the opera "Mavra", the secular oratorio "Oedipus Rex", "The Symphony of Psalms", a violin concerto, a piano sonata, a piano concerto, and the ballet-opera "Persephone". In 1937 he added "Jeu de Cartes" to his long list of ballet scores. On account of conditions in Russia Mr. Stravinsky has become a French citizen.

COMING PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT CARNEGIE HALL

Under the Direction of
JOHN BARBIROLLI

THURSDAY EVENING, APRIL 11, AT 8:45
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 12, AT 2:30
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 14, AT 3:00

1. MOZART...Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito"
2. HAYDN.................................Symphony in D major, B. & H. No. 104
3. BERNARD HERRMANN......"Moby Dick", A Cantata for Male Chorus, Soloists and Orchestra. Text selected and arranged from the novel by Herman Melville, by W. Clark Harrington.

(First performance)

Ishmael ....WILLIAM HAIN
Ahab ....ROBERT WEEDE
Starbuck ....WILLIAM HORNE
Pip ....PHILIP REEP
Bass ....GEAN GREENWELL

Male Chorus of the WESTMINSTER CHOIR

CULLED FROM THE MAIL POUCH

N Y Times Apr 7 '40

14

One View of Mr. Britten's Ideas

To the Music Editor:

As a visiting composer reporting his impressions of American musical life, Mr. Britten's observations in last Sunday's music section are not wholly accurate. Within the last two years I have traveled across this country more than ten times. I have attended concerts by major orchestras in all parts of the country, listened to broadcasts of the better serious music, commissioned works, festival, etc. I can therefore consider myself one of the better-equipped listeners interested in the finest American music can offer.

Mr. Britten cannot deny the fact—if he is really interested in what the American composer is up against—that men like Koussevitzky are few and far between, that the more vital and important works by Americans are completely ignored. How many of our younger composers receive the same opportunities for performance of their works as Mr. Britten received? He mentions the variety of opportunities which exist for the production of new music in this country, but he has evidently not investigated the internal politics and kowtowing to conservative public taste which is so rampant in this country's musical life.

Had Mr. Britten really been just in his appraisal of our magnificent opportunities, he would have taken into consideration the absence of works like the forceful symphony by Roger Sessions, the "Symphonic Ode" by Copland, the symphonies of Harris. And what of our other men — Piston, Hanson, Rogers? How often are their works heard? And the younger men of promise and originality: David Diamond, surely one of the most important rising names, whose virile and exciting Psalm for Orchestra I heard in St. Louis under Golschmann, and, as far as I know, has not been given since? And what of Robert McBride, Mark Wessel, Burril Phillips, Hunter Johnson, to mention only a few? Mr. Britten might well examine Mr. Barbirolli's "imaginative" programs since he assumed the conductorship of the orchestra within our city. He will too soon find just what the real state of music is like in America.

Our Receptivity to New Music—Other Matters

There exists no real interest, courage or desire on the part of European conductors in America to seek out the best, the most stimulating that the American composer has to offer. The number of premières given third-rate works by Frenchmen, Rumanians, Austrians and Germans is astounding, considering that we do have the aforementioned Americans and the new works of Stravinsky, Bartók, Hindemith and Berg.

ROBERT MAYER.

New York, March 25, 1940.

---

darkness descends and he is unable to find an outlet. He runs to and fro in terror and turns to the gates and shakes them. They fly open, the forest blazes with light, and down the eminence pours a motley horde of demons and goblins. They fall on the Prince and hold him fast to await the coming of Köstchei.

"He glares at his victim and strives to cast a spell upon him, but Ivan remembers the golden feather and waves it aloft. To his aid flies the glorious Bird of Fire, who begins a dance of closely increasing measure. The demons are compelled to follow her until exhausted they sink to the ground and fall into a deep slumber. The Bird of Fire bids Ivan take the chief of the maidens to a place of safety, then shows him a root which marks the base of a hollow tree. He crawls inside to reappear with an iron-bound casket.

"He raises the lid and withdraws an enormous egg, which he throws into the air and catches as it falls, while Köstchei, who knows that it contains his soul, trembles with fear and apprehension. In desperation he clutches at the precious object, but Ivan dashes it to the ground. There is a deafening crash and darkness falls.

"Presently the stage lightens. Köstchei, his court, and the Bird of Fire have vanished. In their place a group of young men, dressed richly, pay homage to Ivan. Down the steps comes a beautiful Princess, the maiden to whom he pledged his troth, and in her train a group of nobles and fair dames, now freed from enchantment by the death of Köstchei. They are followed by a procession of pages, who bear in their midst a crown, sceptre, and ermine robe. Ivan is invested with these symbols of power, and the assembly acclaim him as their deliverer and sovereign lord."

It is interesting to recall that the young and unknown Stravinsky was not the composer whom Michel Fokine had in mind when he devised the scenario of "The Firebird". The man of his choice was Anatol Liadoff, of "Music Box" fame. But Liadoff delayed, and eventually the assignment went to the fledgling whose orchestral piece "Fireworks", composed for the wedding of Rimsky-Korsakoff's daughter Nadeshda, who became the wife of Maximilian Steinberg, had impressed connoisseurs in 1908. (The recurrence of the "Fire" element apparently had no significance beyond the coincidental!) Mr. Stravinsky finished the score of the ballet in May, 1910, the month preceding the world première.

"The Firebird" was presented for the first time in America at the Century Theatre, New York, on January 17, 1916, when the Diaghileff Ballets Russes made their initial visit to this country. The conductor was Ernest Ansermet and the cast included Xenia Maclezova as the Bird of Fire, Leonide Massine as Ivan Tsarevitch, Lubov Tchernicheva as the beautiful Tsarevna, and once more Enrico Cecchetti as Köstchei the Immortal.

The suite performed at these concerts comprises five numbers: I. Introduction: The Firebird and her Dance; II. Dance of the Princesses; III. Infernal Dance of Köstchei; IV. Berceuse; V. Finale (the disappearance of Köstchei and his crew and the general rejoicing). There is no pause between sections I. and II. and IV. and V. The theme of the "Dance of the Princesses" is a folk-song from the Government of Novgorod, "As in the Little Green Garden". The horn theme heard in the Finale is another folk-song, "Near the Gate the Pine Was Waving".

In deference to the practical uses of the concert hall the vast array of instruments for which the ballet is scored has in the case of the suite been reduced. The instruments called for here by Mr. Stravinsky are two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, xylophone, harp, piano, and strings.

"LE SACRE DU PRINTEMPS" ("The Consecration of the Spring"): PICTURES OF PAGAN RUSSIA, IN TWO PARTS

IGOR FEODOROVITCH STRAVINSKY

The initial performance of "Le Sacre du Printemps" took place in Paris at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées on May 29, 1913, in the course of the season of the Diaghileff Ballets Russes, and the response of the audience to what it heard scarcely stopped short of massacre. Pierre Monteux conducted. The music was introduced to this country at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia, under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, on March 3, 1922. Mr. Monteux, who meantime had become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the work in Boston at the orchestra's concert of January 25, 1924. On the following January 31 Mr. Monteux and the Boston orchestra made the music known to New York at their regular concert in Carnegie Hall. Under the auspices of the League of Composers, "Le Sacre du Printemps" was staged for the first time in this country on April 11, 1930, at the Metropolitan Opera House, Philadelphia. On April 22 the production was shown at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Stokowski, officiated. The dancer of the Chosen One on these occasions was Martha Graham.

* * *

Mr. Stravinsky tells in his autobiography of the inception of the "Sacre": "One day, when I was finishing the last pages of 'L'Oiseau de Feu' in St. Petersburg, I had a fleeting vision which came to me as a complete surprise, my mind at the moment being full of other things. I saw in imagination a solemn pagan rite: sage elders, seated in a circle, watched a young girl dance herself to death. They were sacrificing her to propitiate the god of spring. Such was the theme of the 'Sacre du Printemps'. I must confess that this vision made a deep impression on me, and I at once described it to my friend Nicholas Roerich, he being a painter who had specialized in pagan subjects. He welcomed my inspiration with enthusiasm and became my collaborator in this creation. In Paris I told Diaghileff about it, and he was at once carried away by the idea."

From the first "Le Sacre" has been a matter for deep and learned discussion. According to Edith Sitwell, it "gives us the beginning of energy, the enormous and terrible shaping of the visible and invisible world through movement." And Miss Sitwell further observes: "Life is energy, and the very fact of that life will eventually push us over the abyss into the waiting and intolerable darkness."

Lazare Saminsky, in "Music of Our Day", places "Le Sacre" among the "most valuable" of Stravinsky's contributions. "The imagination of Stravinsky," he goes on, "perceives things and presents them musically in terms of noises immanent to those things, eternally present in them. He is curiously and characteristically deaf to the inner music of things—to their spiritual pulse. Let us recall the sharp and cold

'Petrouchka', the spring-roundels from the om the 'Rossignol', those glowing pages of new of the inborn noises of things, of their ng, lies the whole of Stravinsky's talent,

rebarbarization in music. He has trans-
ion of qualified noises, but fascinatingly
reduced melody to the primitive, inarticu-
as converted the orchestra into a gigantic
e of the new savage."
nt in Stravinsky's music is emphasized, the h no less assurance on the "transparency"
ity," he declares, "that one always finds in any 'residuum' in their sonority, that resincounter in the musical fabric of impres-
alas! even in that of the Romantics.
ar' this sonorous 'transparency'; he was an seems to have been the first to import this sed it in a way that defies analysis. One

h mastery, such a subtle 'clairvoyance' of lm and so perfect.
insky's works will cause you to perceive
this vibratory 'transparency' of which I mps' is full of it; and it is perhaps in this ou with the most persuasiveness; you will deeply saturated."
Boris de Schloezer, touches on the subject
atever be the historic origins of song, even
s the howl, i.e., direct, as you might say, motion, its development is indisputably due ological sources and to organizing it accord-c principles. Melody is the creation of up against nature. . . . There is an intel-
, and for that reason it demands compre-

's taste for melody, it is a matter of only a ich it has been trained and habituated and nce you depart from that type we are all
most difficult thing of all to seize is a xpected course. Thus the first judgment
t they have not understood is that it lacks
art and they say it today of Ravel, Debussy, mposed itself, this was in spite of melodic hallucinating power of its rhythm, to its yclopean chords. But even today the poly-ains, in all probability, a closed book to needed Stravinsky's genius, his radicalism love of risk, and this absence of aes

bserved in most Russian artists to bri rt and to reconstitute a style in the inst everyone else' which modern m

Thus, in the words of the late Philip Hale, might Captain Lemuel Gulliver have heard learned professors discussing at the Academy of Legado.

* * *

The large orchestra employed in this score comprises two piccolos, two flutes, flute in G, four oboes (one interchangeable with a second English horn), English horn, three clarinets (one interchangeable with a second bass clarinet), clarinet in E-flat, bass clarinet, four bassoons (one interchageable with a second double-bassoon), double-bassoon, eight horns (two interchangeable with Bayreuth tubas), four trumpets, trumpet in D, bass trumpet, three trombones, two tubas, four kettledrums, small kettledrums, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, antique cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, rape guero (scratcher), and strings.

IGOR STRAVINSKY

Himself an opera singer, Feodor Stravinsky planned a legal career for his son Igor. In 1902, however, the young Stravinsky met Rimsky-Korsakoff in Germany and was so deeply impressed that he decided to devote his life to music. A few years later another crucial meeting, this time with Serge Diaghileff, had two further important results: it made Paris the center of Mr. Stravinsky's activity and it launched him as a ballet composer of marked individuality. From 1910 to 1917 appeared successively "The Firebird", "Petrouchka", "Le Sacre du Printemps", and "The Nightingale". "Les Noces" followed in 1920 and "Apollon Musagète" in 1928. In "Le Sacre" Mr. Stravinsky used such unconventional rhythms and harmonies that he became a storm-center of esthetic controversy. Among his other compositions have been "Histoire du Soldat", "Symphonies of Wind Instruments in Memory of Debussy", the opera "Mavra", the secular oratorio "Oedipus Rex", "The Symphony of Psalms", a violin concerto, a piano sonata, a piano concerto, and the ballet-opera "Persephone". In 1937 he added "Jeu de Cartes" to his long list of ballet scores. On account of conditions in Russia Mr. Stravinsky has become a French citizen.

COMING PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT CARNEGIE HALL

Under the Direction of

JOHN BARBIROLLI

THURSDAY EVENING, APRIL 11, AT 8:45
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 12, AT 2:30
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 14, AT 3:00

1. MOZART..Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito"
2. HAYDN..................................Symphony in D major, B. & H. No. 104
3. BERNARD HERRMANN......"Moby Dick", A Cantata for Male Chorus, Soloists and Orchestra. Text selected and arranged from the novel by Herman Melville, by W. Clark Harrington.

(First performance)

Ishmael ....WILLIAM HAIN
Ahab ....ROBERT WEEDE
Starbuck ....WILLIAM HORNE
Pip ....PHILIP REEP
Bass ....GEAN GREENWELL

Male Chorus of the WESTMINSTER CHOIR

NY ~~Times~~ Apr 7 '40

CULLED FROM THE MAIL POUCH

One View of Mr. Britten's Ideas

To the Music Editor:

As a visiting composer reporting his impressions of American musical life, Mr. Britten's observations in last Sunday's music section are not wholly accurate. Within the last two years I have traveled across this country more than ten times. I have attended concerts by major orchestras in all parts of the country, listened to broadcasts of the better serious music, commissioned works, festival, etc. I can therefore consider myself one of the better-equipped listeners interested in the finest American music can offer.

Mr. Britten cannot deny the fact—if he is really interested in what the American composer is up against—that men like Koussevitzky are few and far between, that the more vital and important works by Americans are completely ignored. How many of our younger composers receive the same opportunities for performance of their works as Mr. Britten received? He mentions the variety of opportunities which exist for the production of new music in this country, but he has evidently not investigated the internal politics and kowtowing to conservative public taste which is so rampant in this country's musical life.

Had Mr. Britten really been just in his appraisal of our magnificent opportunities, he would have taken into consideration the absence of works like the forceful symphony by Roger Sessions, the "Symphonic Ode" by Copland, the symphonies of Harris. And what of our other men — Piston, Hanson, Rogers? How often are their works heard? And the younger men of promise and originality: David Diamond, surely one of the most important rising names, whose virile and exciting Psalm for Orchestra I heard in St. Louis under Golschmann, and, as far as I know, has not been given since? And what of Robert McBride, Mark Wessel, Burril Phillips, Hunter Johnson, to mention only a few? Mr. Britten might well examine Mr. Barbirolli's "imaginative" programs since he assumed the conductorship of the orchestra within our city. He will too soon find just what the real state of music is like in America.

Our Receptivity to New Music—Other Matters

There exists no real interest, courage or desire on the part of European conductors in America to seek out the best, the most stimulating that the American composer has to offer. The number of premières given third-rate works by Frenchmen, Rumanians, Austrians and Germans is astounding, considering that we do have the aforementioned Americans and the new works of Stravinsky, Bartók, Hindemith and Berg.

ROBERT MAYER.

New York, March 25, 1940.

---

glitter of the kermesses from 'Petrouchka', the spring-roundels from the 'Sacre', the Chinese march from the 'Rossignol', those glowing pages of tone-decor. In the creating anew of the inborn noises of things, of their resonance and physical boiling, lies the whole of Stravinsky's talent, magnificent of its kind.

"He is the father of the rebarbarization in music. He has transformed music into a collection of qualified noises, but fascinatingly colored, irresistible. He has reduced melody to the primitive, inarticulate refrain of a Zulu and has converted the orchestra into a gigantic rattle, the toy and mouthpiece of the new savage."

If here a primitive element in Stravinsky's music is emphasized, the unique Erik Satie dwells with no less assurance on the "transparency" of its sound. "This is a quality," he declares, "that one always finds in the purists, who never leave any 'residuum' in their sonority, that residuum which you will ever encounter in the musical fabric of impressionistic composers and also, alas! even in that of the Romantics.

"Palestrina makes us 'hear' this sonorous 'transparency'; he was an expert manipulator of it and seems to have been the first to import this phenomenon into music.

"The exquisite Mozart used it in a way that defies analysis. One stands confounded before such mastery, such a subtle 'clairvoyance' of sound, a phonic lucidity so calm and so perfect.

"Any one of Igor Stravinsky's works will cause you to perceive with extraordinary clearness this vibratory 'transparency' of which I speak. 'Le Sacre du Printemps' is full of it; and it is perhaps in this work that it will appear to you with the most persuasiveness; you will be prodigiously bathed in it, deeply saturated."

That doughty champion, Boris de Schloezer, touches on the subject of Stravinsky's melody: "Whatever be the historic origins of song, even if one admit that it began as the howl, i.e., direct, as you might say, physiological expression of emotion, its development is indisputably due to detaching it from its physiological sources and to organizing it according to acoustic and aesthetic principles. Melody is the creation of human intelligence standing up against nature. . . . There is an intellectual part in every melody, and for that reason it demands comprehension from the auditor. . . .

"As for the great public's taste for melody, it is a matter of only a certain kind of melody to which it has been trained and habituated and which it likes to recognize; once you depart from that type we are all more or less disoriented, for the most difficult thing of all to seize is a melody that follows an unexpected course. Thus the first judgment people deliver on a work that they have not understood is that it lacks melody; they said this of Mozart and they say it today of Ravel, Debussy, and Stravinsky.

"If the 'Sacre' finally imposed itself, this was in spite of melodic structure and thanks to the hallucinating power of its rhythm, to its glittering timbres, and to its cyclopean chords. But even today the polyphonic idiom of 'Sacre' remains, in all probability, a closed book to many of its auditors. . . . It needed Stravinsky's genius, his radicalism intolerant of compromise, his love of risk, and this absence of aesthetic aristocratism which we have observed in most Russian artists to bring in the renaissance of a classic art and to reconstitute a style in the midst of this 'war of everyone against everyone else' which modern musical life had become."

Thus, in the words of the late Philip Hale, might Captain Lemuel Gulliver have heard learned professors discussing at the Academy of Legado.

* * *

The large orchestra employed in this score comprises two piccolos, two flutes, flute in G, four oboes (one interchangeable with a second English horn), English horn, three clarinets (one interchangeable with a second bass clarinet), clarinet in E-flat, bass clarinet, four bassoons (one interchageable with a second double-bassoon), double-bassoon, eight horns (two interchangeable with Bayreuth tubas), four trumpets, trumpet in D, bass trumpet, three trombones, two tubas, four kettledrums, small kettledrums, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, antique cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, rape guero (scratcher), and strings.

IGOR STRAVINSKY

Himself an opera singer, Feodor Stravinsky planned a legal career for his son Igor. In 1902, however, the young Stravinsky met Rimsky-Korsakoff in Germany and was so deeply impressed that he decided to devote his life to music. A few years later another crucial meeting, this time with Serge Diaghileff, had two further important results: it made Paris the center of Mr. Stravinsky's activity and it launched him as a ballet composer of marked individuality. From 1910 to 1917 appeared successively "The Firebird", "Petrouchka", "Le Sacre du Printemps", and "The Nightingale". "Les Noces" followed in 1920 and "Apollon Musagète" in 1928. In "Le Sacre" Mr. Stravinsky used such unconventional rhythms and harmonies that he became a storm-center of esthetic controversy. Among his other compositions have been "Histoire du Soldat", "Symphonies of Wind Instruments in Memory of Debussy", the opera "Mavra", the secular oratorio "Oedipus Rex", "The Symphony of Psalms", a violin concerto, a piano sonata, a piano concerto, and the ballet-opera "Persephone". In 1937 he added "Jeu de Cartes" to his long list of ballet scores. On account of conditions in Russia Mr. Stravinsky has become a French citizen.

COMING PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT CARNEGIE HALL

Under the Direction of

JOHN BARBIROLLI

THURSDAY EVENING, APRIL 11, AT 8:45
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 12, AT 2:30
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 14, AT 3:00

1. MOZART..Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito"
2. HAYDN..................................Symphony in D major, B. & H. No. 104
3. BERNARD HERRMANN......"Moby Dick", A Cantata for Male Chorus, Soloists and Orchestra. Text selected and arranged from the novel by Herman Melville, by W. Clark Harrington.

(First performance)

Ishmael ....WILLIAM HAIN
Ahab ....ROBERT WEEDE
Starbuck ....WILLIAM HORNE
Pip ....PHILIP REEP
Bass ....GEAN GREENWELL

Male Chorus of the WESTMINSTER CHOIR
John Finley Williamson, Conductor

'Petrouchka', the spring-roundels from the om the 'Rossignol', those glowing pages of new of the inborn noises of things, of their ng, lies the whole of Stravinsky's talent,

rebarbarization in music. He has trans-
ion of qualified noises, but fascinatingly
reduced melody to the primitive, inarticu-
as converted the orchestra into a gigantic
e of the new savage."
nt in Stravinsky's music is emphasized, the h no less assurance on the "transparency"
ity," he declares; "that one always finds in any 'residuum' in their sonority, that resincounter in the musical fabric of impres-
alas! even in that of the Romantics.
ar' this sonorous 'transparency'; he was an seems to have been the first to import this sed it in a way that defies analysis. One

h mastery, such a subtle 'clairvoyance' of lm and so perfect.
insky's works will cause you to perceive
this vibratory 'transparency' of which I mps' is full of it; and it is perhaps in this n with the most persuasiveness; you will deeply saturated."
Boris de Schloezer, touches on the subject
atever be the historic origins of song, even
s the howl, i.e., direct, as you might say, notion, its development is indisputably due
logical sources and to organizing it accord-principles. Melody is the creation of ip against nature. . . . There is an inteland for that reason it demands compre-

s taste for melody, it is a matter of only a ch it has been trained and habituated and nce you depart from that type we are all the most difficult thing of all to seize is a pected course. Thus the first judgment
they have not understood is that it lacks
rt and they say it today of Ravel, Debussy,

posed itself, this was in spite of melodic hallucinating power of its rhythm, to its yclopean chords. But even today the poly-ains, in all probability, a closed book to needed Stravinsky's genius, his radicalism love of risk, and this absence of aesthetic bserved in most Russian artists to bring in t and to reconstitute a style in the midst nst everyone else' which modern musical

Thus, in the words of the late Philip Hale, might Captain Lemuel Gulliver have heard learned professors discussing at the Academy of Legado.

* * *

The large orchestra employed in this score comprises two piccolos, two flutes, flute in G, four oboes (one interchangeable with a second English horn), English horn, three clarinets (one interchangeable with a second bass clarinet), clarinet in E-flat, bass clarinet, four bassoons (one interchageable with a second double-bassoon), double-bassoon, eight horns (two interchangeable with Bayreuth tubas), four trumpets, trumpet in D, bass trumpet, three trombones, two tubas, four kettledrums, small kettledrums, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, antique cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, rape guero (scratcher), and strings.

IGOR STRAVINSKY

Himself an opera singer, Feodor Stravinsky planned a legal career for his son Igor. In 1902, however, the young Stravinsky met Rimsky-Korsakoff in Germany and was so deeply impressed that he decided to devote his life to music. A few years later another crucial meeting, this time with Serge Diaghileff, had two further important results: it made Paris the center of Mr. Stravinsky's activity and it launched him as a ballet composer of marked individuality. From 1910 to 1917 appeared successively "The Firebird", "Petrouchka", "Le Sacre du Printemps", and "The Nightingale". "Les Noces" followed in 1920 and "Apollon Musagète" in 1928. In "Le Sacre" Mr. Stravinsky used such unconventional rhythms and harmonies that he became a storm-center of esthetic controversy. Among his other compositions have been "Histoire du Soldat", "Symphonies of Wind Instruments in Memory of Debussy", the opera "Mavra", the secular oratorio "Oedipus Rex", "The Symphony of Psalms", a violin concerto, a piano sonata, a piano concerto, and the ballet-opera "Persephone". In 1937 he added "Jeu de Cartes" to his long list of ballet scores. On account of conditions in Russia Mr. Stravinsky has become a French citizen.

COMING PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT CARNEGIE HALL

Under the Direction of

JOHN BARBIROLLI

THURSDAY EVENING, APRIL 11, AT 8:45
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 12, AT 2:30
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 14, AT 3:00

1. MOZART..Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito"
2. HAYDN..................................Symphony in D major, B. & H. No. 104
3. BERNARD HERRMANN......"Moby Dick", A Cantata for Male Chorus, Soloists and Orchestra. Text selected and arranged from the novel by Herman Melville, by W. Clark Harrington.

(First performance)

Ishmael ....WILLIAM HAIN
Ahab ....ROBERT WEEDE
Starbuck ....WILLIAM HORNE
Pip ....PHILIP REEP
Bass ....GEAN GREENWELL

Male Chorus of the WESTMINSTER CHOIR
John Finley Williamson, Conductor

NY ~~Times~~ Apr 7 40

14

CULLED FROM THE MAIL POUCH

One View of Mr. Britten's Ideas

To the Music Editor:

As a visiting composer reporting his impressions of American musical life, Mr. Britten's observations in last Sunday's music section are not wholly accurate. Within the last two years I have traveled across this country more than ten times. I have attended concerts by major orchestras in all parts of the country, listened to broadcasts of the better serious music, commissioned works, festival, etc. I can therefore consider myself one of the better-equipped listeners interested in the finest American music can offer.

Mr. Britten cannot deny the fact—if he is really interested in what the American composer is up against—that men like Koussevitzky are few and far between, that the more vital and important works by Americans are completely ignored. How many of our younger composers receive the same opportunities for performance of their works as Mr. Britten received? He mentions the variety of opportunities which exist for the production of new music in this country, but he has evidently not investigated the internal politics and kowtowing to conservative public taste which is so rampant in this country's musical life.

Had Mr. Britten really been just in his appraisal of our magnificent opportunities, he would have taken into consideration the absence of works like the forceful symphony by Roger Sessions, the "Symphonic Ode" by Copland, the symphonies of Harris. And what of our other men — Piston, Hanson, Rogers? How often are their works heard? And the younger men of promise and originality: David Diamond, surely e of the most important rising names, whose virile and exciting Psalm for Orchestra I heard in St. Louis under Golschmann, and, as far as I know, has not been given since? And what of Robert McBride, Mark Wessel, Burril Phillips, Hunter Johnson, to mention only a few? Mr. Britten might well examine Mr. Barbirolli's "imaginative" programs since he assumed the conductorship of the orchestra within our city. He will too soon find just what the real state of music is like in America.

There exists no real interest, courage or desire on the part of European conductors in America to seek out the best, the most stimulating that the American composer has to offer. The number of premières given third-rate works by Frenchmen, Rumanians, Austrians and Germans is astounding, considering that we do have the aforementioned Americans and the new works of Stravinsky, Bartók, Hindemith and Berg.

ROBERT MAYER.

New York, March 25, 1940.

Our Receptivity to New Music—Other Matters

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUNDAY JOURNAL & AMERICAN
APR 7 - 1940

Boston Symphony Ends Series Here

By GREN A BENNETT

The New York series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was completed yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with a Beethoven-Tschaikovsky program. The Fifth symphony by the last-named composer was in line with the celebration of the centenary of the great Slavic melodist, who was born 100 years ago on May 5.

Serge Koussevitzky occupied his customary place at the conductor's desk and directed his men with his well-known authority. It was not his fault that the horns played with occasional insecurity in Beethoven's ingratiating Symphony No. 4, for the indications to the men were the acme of security and lucidity. Otherwise, the beguiling pages of the composer's romantic work (a composition which some historians claim was a tribute to the mysterious "Immortal Beloved" whose real identity has never been definitely solved, was interpreted with the "grace and beauty" and the "mastery of movement" that are acknowledged by famous commentators.

In contrast to the above mentioned work was the Tschaikovsky Symphony, whose brooding and sombre motifs set in magnificent harmonies were communicated to the large and enthusiastic audience with profound and eloquent musicianship.

* * *

The "standing room only" announcement at the Metropolitan Opera House continued to be displayed at both of yesterday's performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. The matinee program was devoted to "Les Sylphides," "Petrouchka," "The Bluebird" and "Prince Igor." In the evening "Rouge et Noir," "Bogatyri," "Bacchanale" and "Capriccio Espagnole" were presented. This evening's offering of "Swan Lake," "Rouge et Noir," "Bachanale" and "Capriccio Espagnole" will inaugurate the final week of the engagement.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York

1842-1878
CONSOLIDATED 1928

1939 - NINETY-EIGHTH SEASON - 1940

CARNEGIE HALL

Sunday Afternoon, April 7, 1940
AT THREE
3629TH CONCERT

Under the Direction of

IGOR STRAVINSKY

Guest Composer-Conductor

STRAVINSKY PROGRAM

1. Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka"
   Russian Dance—Petrouchka at Home—The Fair in Festival Week—Dance of the Nurses—The Peasant and the Bear—The Merchant and the Gypsies—Dance of the Coachmen and Grooms—The Masqueraders.
2. Suite from the Danced Story "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Firebird")
   I. Introduction: The Firebird and her Dance
   II. Dance of the Princesses
   III. Infernal Dance of Köstchei
   IV. Berceuse
   V. Finale

INTERMISSION

3. "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Consecration of the Spring"), Pictures of Pagan Russia
   I. The Adoration of the Earth.
   Introduction—Harbingers of Spring—Dance of the Adolescents—Abduction—Spring Rounds—Games of the Rival Cities—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man)—Dance of the Earth.
   II. The Sacrifice.
   Introduction—Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents—Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors— Ritual of the Ancestors—The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

ARTHUR JUDSON, Manager BRUNO ZIRATO, Assistant Manager
THE STEINWAY is the Official Piano of The Philharmonic-Symphony Society
VICTOR RECORDS

ORCHESTRA PENSION FUND—It is requested that subscribers who are unable to use their tickets, kindly return them to the Philharmonic-Symphony Offices, 113 West 57th Street, or to the Box Office, Carnegie Hall, to be sold for the benefit of the Orchestra Pension Fund. All tickets received will be acknowledged.

THE TOWN HALL
THE TOWN HALL
THE LEAGUE FOR POLITICAL EDUCATION
"YE SHALL KNOW THE TRUTH AND THE TRUTH SHALL MAKE YOU FREE" 1933

244-4-6F-40

ALFRED SCOTT, Publisher, 156 Fifth Avenue, N. Y.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 7 - 1940

MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

From Gabrieli to Casey Jones

HARVARD GLEE CLUB and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, concert last night at Town Hall with the assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's brass c[illegible] E. Power Biggs, organist, in the following program:

Giovanni Gabrieli (1557-1612)....Processional and ceremonial music for voices, organ and bass, written for the Church of St. Mark in Venice
Mozart....................Masonic Music
Walter Piston....Carnival Song for Men's Voices and Brass (1938)
Handel....Choruses from "Semele" and "L'Allegro"
Stravinsky..Epilogue from "Oedipus Rex"
Randall Thompson....Howl Ye, from "The Peaceable Kingdom" (1935)
E. B. Lawton (arr. from American folk song).............Casey Jones (1939)
Bach....Cum Sancto Spiritu, from Mass in B minor (with the assistance of former members of the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses).
Accompanists, William W. Austin, Ralph Renwick Jr.

The student choristers from Harvard and Radcliffe, who are well known in the neighborhood of Boston, and occasionally here, as accomplished interpreters of exceptionally exacting choral works, gave their hearers a rewarding opportunity last night to become acquainted with the dignity, pomp and proclamative color of some of the music composed by Giovanni Gabrieli, the remarkable organist at the Church of St. Mark in Venice from 1585 to 1612. These qualities were particularly notable in the opening "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino", from the second book of Gabrieli's "Symphoniae Sacrae, in which the voices and the chanting brass gave a vivid impression of the splendor of a major Venetian festival.

The other choral works on this list from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of the master who had composed for Venetian church and civic rituals three centuries ago were a Benedictus, dated 1597, for three choirs; "O Jesu mi dulcissime," Christmas music in a more intimate vein, dated 1615, and a resplendent "Jubilate Deo." Each of these choruses was prefaced by a short organ prelude, and the Boston Symphony's instrumentalists also played a high-spirited, elaborately wrought "Canzona per sonare a quattro."

Of the qualities of Gabrieli's music only a few hints can be given here; spacious complexity of structure and architectonic grandeur, combined with still communicative expressive significance, were among the most prominent first impressions. The first and last of the choruses, in particular, gave a striking musical illustration of the flavor and atmosphere of the time and the place of their composition. At times some of the subtler details of the choral scoring seemed to be obscured in the memorable brilliance and sonority of these two festal works, but this probably was due to the nature of the music itself, written for performance in unusually spacious surroundings, rather than to the well trained choruses or talented players of the trumpets, trombones and the tuba.

* * *

Mr. Woodworth then advanced about a century and three-quarters in history to present three excerpts from the now seldom remembered music written by Mozart for Masonic occasions. The finale from "Eine kleine Freimaurer Kantate" (K. 627) is straightforward, hearty music of distinctly Germanic flavor. The Radcliffe girls sang "Lasst Uns mit Geschlungen Händen," apparently written for a Ladies' Day in the Viennese lodge. The third, with H. M. Raine as the tenor soloist, was the finale from the cantata "Die Maurerfreude" (K. 471).

The first Harvard composer on the list was Walter Piston, whose setting of an Italian text from Lorenzo de' Medici's "Canti Carnascialeschi" for men's voices and brass had its first New York performance. His vocal scoring is well suited to the verbal rhythm, and ably suggests its varying expressive hues in an idiom that sometimes makes discreet use of dissonance with generally melodic results. The brass choir, which has some strikingly plangent measures, plays an important part in the interludes, forecasting the mood of the succeeding verse.

* * *

Despite the loss of orchestral color sustained in a performance with piano accompaniment, the epilogue from "Oedipus Rex" still impressed as dramatically potent music. F. C. Wing made the messenger's tragic announcement, and R. E. I. Strider was the Speaker. Both choruses did notable work in the effective excerpt from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom," written for these two groups and performed by them here a few years ago. Mr. Lawton's version of "Casey Jones" preserved its swing and essentially American savor; the piano accompaniment had its suggestions of machinery and rolling wheels. This was called upon for repetition.

The Harvard Glee Club, throughout the evening, observed high standards in choral technique, quality of tone, unity and expressive responsiveness, and deserved more extensive encomiums than are possible in a midnight review. Similar compliments could be bestowed upon the Radcliffe chorus, whose singing showed marked improvement as compared with its concert here in 1937. Messrs. Pison and Thompson both took bows—Mr. Stravinsky, however, busied with a performance of his music elsewhere in the city, could not acknowledge the applause for the finale of "Oedipus."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

Harvard Club Concert

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, at their joint concert last night in Town Hall, under the direction of Wallace Woodworth, presented an unusually elaborate program, the first half of which was devoted to works by Giovanni Gabrieli, the seventeenth century Italian composer. Although Gabrieli was one of the greatest musical geniuses of his time and the most important composer in the Venetian school, his compositions are virtually unknown today except to connoisseurs. It was therefore, a most praiseworthy effort on the part of the combined choruses to bring public attention to the remarkable creations of this unaccountably neglected genius.

Assisted by the brass choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and E. Power Biggs, organist, the choristers were heard in four of Gabrieli's works from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of 1597 and 1615. Each of these was preceded by an "Intonation" for organ by the same composer, who was for many years the organist at St. Mark's in Venice. These brief preludes served to establish the key of the choral numbers which they preceded on the program. A "canzona per sonare" played by the brasses completed the Gabrieli selections.

Gabrieli, who was the teacher of Heinrich Schuetz, Michael Praetorius and other celebrated composers of the time, had, as Reimann pointed out, a far weightier influence on the musical production of the first half of the seventeenth century than the famous Florentine monodists. His innovations in matters of form, harmonic modulations and the employment of repeated short phrases gave much of his music performed last night a strikingly modern effect.

The imaginative treatment of the antiphonal part-writing in Gabrieli's choral works presented, the richness of sonorities and the dynamic contrasts displayed in each of them, as well as the emotional impetus behind all of these extraordinary masterpieces made them uncommonly impressive. The powerful climaxes of "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino" and "Jubilate Deo" reached an almost unparalleled glory of sound, while the Benedictus for three choirs with its delicate echoings and unconventional coloring looked far into the musical future. But finest was the superb Nativity poem, "O Jesu Mi Dulcissime," with its strikingly modern employment of brief, reiterated phrases, its broad, solemn close, and surprisingly rich harmonic progressions.

The singers found the Gabrieli music more difficult to negotiate than the numbers of later origin on the lengthy list, and the tempi adopted were sometimes open to question. Surely the "Osanna" in the Benedictus should have gone at a brisker pace, and the first part of the whole more delicately set forth. But regardless of any such shortcomings there should be but gratitude for the opportunity granted to hear these magnificent examples of choral invention.

Mozart on Program

After them the three excerpts from Masonic works by Mozart seemed particularly tame affairs, and in fact, they were very weak examples. The choruses from Handel's "Semele" and "L'Allegro" were not much more rewarding. But with the "Carnival Song" for men's voices and brass, the excellent "Howl Ye" from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom" and the "Casey Jones" in the clever arrangement by Edward B. Lawton, the choral forces came into their own.

All three of these contemporary American items were written especially for one or both of the performing forces. Mr. Piston's setting of the verses by Lorenzo de Medici was new here and proved to be an original and fanciful addition to the literature.

The choral body did its best singing of the evening in these compositions and in the extremely difficult Epilogue from Stravinsky's "Oedopus Rex."

Here they were on sure ground emotionally and technically, giving each with a tonal solidity, carefully perfected ensemble and niceness of shading that did them great credit. The schedule was rounded out with the great fugal "Gum Sancto Spiriu" from Bach's Mass in B Minor.

H. M. Rainie was the tenor soloist in the finale from Mozart's "Die Maurerfreude," and R. E. L. Reiner was the Speaker, and F. C. Wing the Messenger in the Stravinsky contribution. N. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

CONCERT IS GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducts Boston Orchestra in Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works at Carnegie Hall

TWO SYMPHONIES HEARD

Centenary of Russian's Birth Marked by Playing of 'Fifth' —'Fourth' Presented

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final New York concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The hall was packed. After an overwhelming performance of overwhelming music —the finale of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony—there was an immense demonstration as the audience rose to its feet and stamped and cheered.

Thus the second of the Bostonians' concerts of the week recognized, as the first did, the Tchaikovsky centenary. Again Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, each represented by a symphony, made the program. For reasons of repertory Mr. Koussevitzky did not couple with Tchaikovsky's symphony the one of the same number by Beethoven. Beethoven's Fourth, not his Fifth, began the concert. This provided a grateful contrast, but if the two Fifth symphonies had been played yesterday, as the two Sixth symphonies were placed side by side Thursday night, there would have been a very interesting comparison, because Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, in their Fifth symphonies, have a common theme and a common expressive aim—the struggle of the individual against "fate," the rise of the spirit from the Slough of Despond to victory. Indeed, Tchaikovsky's finale is the one optimistic and victorious page to which one can turn in the list of his major symphonic compositions; and it is a magnificent movement, in a place where one is badly needed, since the Fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky is a curiously uneven creation.

Finale Follows Waltz

It is in fact somewhat typical of the composer, still in his formative period, that this noble finale, as grand in its form as in its spirit, should be placed, cheek by jowl, immediately after the tawdry and banal waltz which Tchaikovsky elects to use here in place of the classic scherzo. This latter movement is the main cause of the Fifth Symphony ranking as far as it does below the "Pathétique."

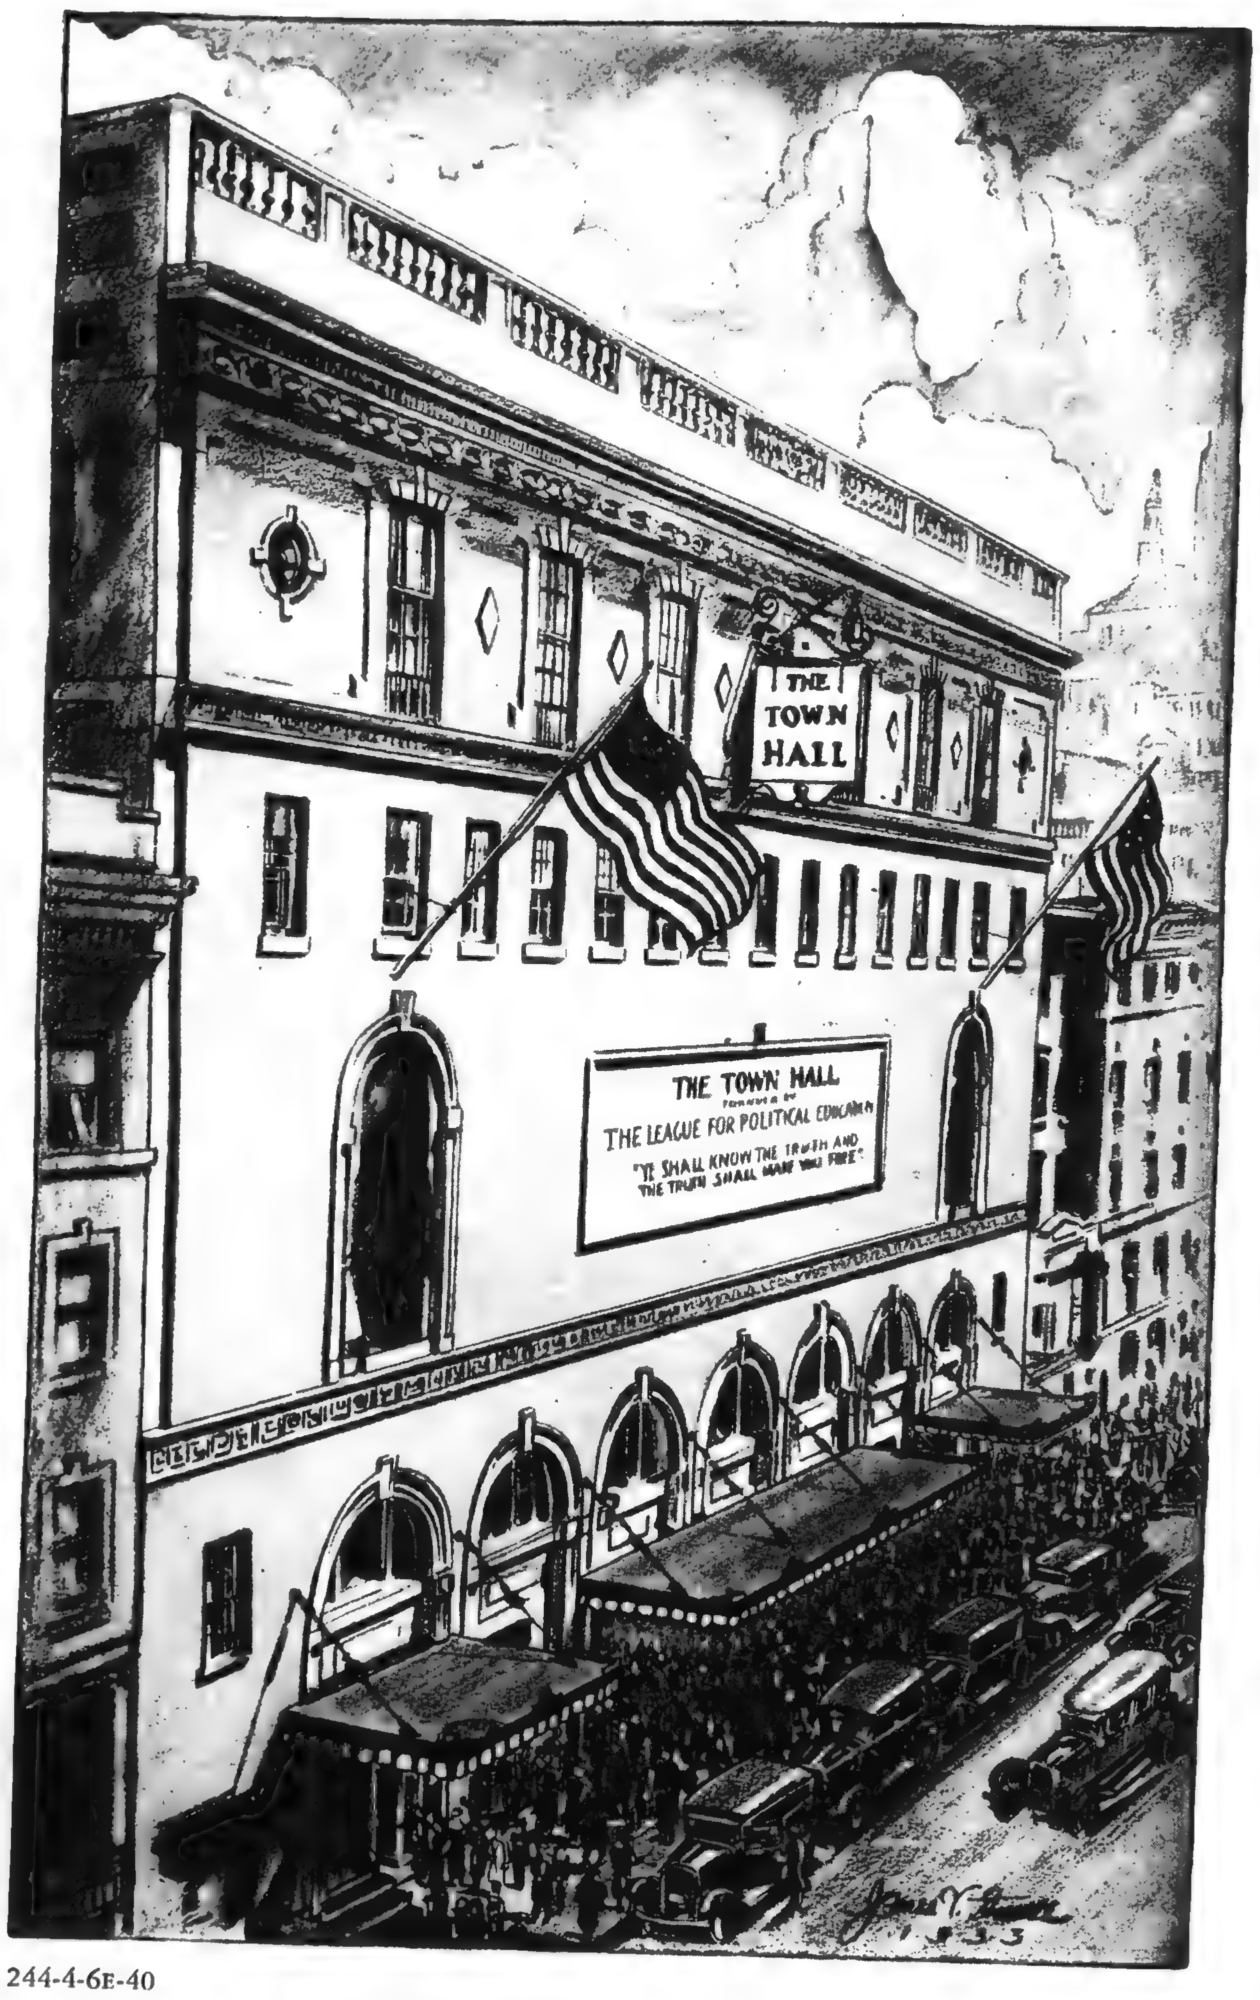
Yet again, there is such richness and there are such flashes of magnificently symphonic writing that this work may live as long as finer scores by Tchaikovsky, despite discrepancies. By "symphonic" we do not mean merely the carrying over, not only of the "fate" theme and other themes, from movement to movement — a procedure which seems to have astonished Ernest Newman and occasioned his remark that this is "a scheme that is certainly without a parallel in the history of the symphony." Shades of Beethoven's Ninth, Schumann's Second and Fourth, the anticipations of the same "scheme" as early as Beethoven's Second and Fifth symphonies, to say nothing of César Franck's, which came a year after Tchaikovsky's Fifth! The history of the cyclic symphonic form is a pretty old one.

"Symphonic" refers also to the resourcefulness in development displayed in Tchaikovsky opening and closing movements, and to many a pretty feat of thematic manipulation which serves him well. Enough! This Fifth symphony, too, is the symphony of a great genius, and there is no denying that fact, although the innocent public seems to have discovered it somewhat earlier than the more old-fashioned and pedantic school of criticism.

Orchestra "Triumphs"

Again Tchaikovsky, as well as Koussevitzky and the now unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra triumphed, because of the inherent qualities of the music they played, and the extraordinary brilliance and euphony of the playing. One need not have listened with unqualified agreement to everything the conductor did to make these remarks; Tchaikovsky's first movement, in particular, was subjected to a special "reading." Where there were opportunities for a retard or accelerando the conductor availed himself of them to the extent that the law allowed. The symphony is a gamut of moods; the tempi are not intended to be strict. The question remains as to what degree of rubato is advisable in performance.

Questions like these can be argued long after the concert is passed. In the main, in Beethoven's Symphony, read with a fine esprit and objectivity, and in the symphony which contains so much that is poor and so much more that is great, and all characteristic of Tchaikovsky—Dr. Koussevitzky directed superlative performances. They greatly affected the audience and brought a dramatic conclusion of the 1939-40 season in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.



THE TOWN HALL
THE TOWN HALL
FOUNDED BY
THE LEAGUE FOR POLITICAL EDUCATION
"YE SHALL KNOW THE TRUTH AND THE TRUTH SHALL MAKE YOU FREE" 1933

244-4-6E-40

ALFRED SCOTT, Publisher, 156 Fifth Avenue, N. Y.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 7 - 1940

MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

From Gabrieli to Casey Jones

HARVARD GLEE CLUB and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, concert last night at Town Hall with the assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's brass [illegible] E. Power Biggs, organist, in the following program:

Giovanni Gabrieli (1557-1612)....Processional and ceremonial music for voices, organ and bass, written for the Church of St. Mark in Venice
Mozart....................Masonic Music
Walter Piston....Carnival Song for Men's Voices and Brass (1938)
Handel....Choruses from "Semele" and "L'Allegro"
Stravinsky..Epilogue from "Oedipus Rex"
Randall Thompson....Howl Ye, from "The Peaceable Kingdom" (1935)
E. B. Lawton (arr. from American folk song).............Casey Jones (1939)
Bach....Cum Sancto Spiritu, from Mass in B minor (with the assistance of former members of the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses).
Accompanists, William W. Austin, Ralph Renwick jr.

The student choristers from Harvard and Radcliffe, who are well known in the neighborhood of Boston, and occasionally here, as accomplished interpreters of exceptionally exacting choral works, gave their hearers a rewarding opportunity last night to become acquainted with the dignity, pomp and proclamative color of some of the music composed by Giovanni Gabrieli, the remarkable organist at the Church of St. Mark in Venice from 1585 to 1612. These qualities were particularly notable in the opening "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino", from the second book of Gabrieli's "Symphoniae Sacrae, in which the voices and the chanting brass gave a vivid impression of the splendor of a major Venetian festival.

The other choral works on this list from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of the master who had composed for Venetian church and civic rituals three centuries ago were a Benedictus, dated 1597, for three choirs; "O Jesu mi dulcissime," Christmas music in a more intimate vein, dated 1615, and a resplendent "Jubilate Deo." Each of these choruses was prefaced by a short organ prelude, and the Boston Symphony's instrumentalists also played a high-spirited, elaborately wrought "Canzona per sonare a quattro."

Of the qualities of Gabrieli's music only a few hints can be given here; spacious complexity of structure and architectonic grandeur, combined with still communicative expressive significance, were among the most prominent first impressions. The first and last of the choruses, in particular, gave a striking musical illustration of the flavor and atmosphere of the time and the place of their composition. At times some of the subtler details of the choral scoring seemed to be obscured in the memorable brilliance and sonority of these two festal works, but this probably was due to the nature of the music itself, written for performance in unusually spacious surroundings, rather than to the well trained choruses or talented players of the trumpets, trombones and the tuba.

* * *

Mr. Woodworth then advanced about a century and three-quarters in history to present three excerpts from the now seldom remembered music written by Mozart for Masonic occasions. The finale from "Eine kleine Freimaurer Kantate" (K. 627) is straightforward, hearty music of distinctly Germanic flavor. The Radcliffe girls sang "Lasst Uns mit Geschlungen Handen," apparently written for a Ladies' Day in the Viennese lodge. The third, with H. M. Raine as the tenor soloist, was the finale from the cantata "Die Maurerfreude" (K. 471).

The first Harvard composer on the list was Walter Piston, whose setting of an Italian text from Lorenzo de' Medici's "Canti Carnascialeschi" for men's voices and brass had its first New York performance. His vocal scoring is well suited to the verbal rhythm, and ably suggests its varying expressive hues in an idiom that sometimes makes discreet use of dissonance with generally melodic results. The brass choir, which has some strikingly plangent measures, plays an important part in the interludes, forecasting the mood of the succeeding verse.

* * *

Despite the loss of orchestral color sustained in a performance with piano accompaniment, the epilogue from "Oedipus Rex" still impressed as dramatically potent music. F. C. Wing made the messenger's tragic announcement, and R. E. I. Strider was the Speaker. Both choruses did notable work in the effective excerpt from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom," written for these two groups and performed by them here a few years ago. Mr. Lawton's version of "Casey Jones" preserved its swing and essentially American savor; the piano accompaniment had its suggestions of machinery and rolling wheels. This was called upon for repetition.

The Harvard Glee Club, throughout the evening, observed high standards in choral technique, quality of tone, unity and expressive responsiveness, and deserved more extensive encomiums than are possible in a midnight review. Similar compliments could be bestowed upon the Radcliffe chorus, whose singing showed marked improvement as compared with its concert here in 1937. Messrs. Pison and Thompson both took bows—Mr. Stravinsky, however, busied with a performance of his music elsewhere in the city, could not acknowledge the applause for the finale of "Oedipus."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

Harvard Club Concert

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, at their joint concert last night in Town Hall, under the direction of Wallace Woodworth, presented an unusually elaborate program, the first half of which was devoted to works by Giovanni Gabrieli, the seventeenth century Italian composer. Although Gabrieli was one of the greatest musical geniuses of his time and the most important composer in the Venetian school, his compositions are virtually unknown today except to connoisseurs. It was therefore, a most praiseworthy effort on the part of the combined choruses to bring public attention to the remarkable creations of this unaccountably neglected genius.

Assisted by the brass choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and E. Po[illegible]iggs, organist, the choristers were heard in four of Gabrieli's works from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of 1597 and 1615. Each of these was preceded by an "Intonation" for organ by the same composer, who was for many years the organist at St. Mark's in Venice. These brief preludes served to establish the key of the choral numbers which they preceded on the program. A "canzona per sonare" played by the brasses completed the Gabrieli selections.

Gabrieli, who was the teacher of Heinrich Schuetz, Michael Praetorius and other celebrated composers of the time, had, as Reimann pointed out, a far weightier influence on the musical production of the first half of the seventeenth century than the famous Florentine monodists. His innovations in matters of form, harmonic modulations and the employment of repeated short phrases gave much of his music performed last night a strikingly modern effect.

The imaginative treatment of the antiphonal part-writing in Gabrieli's choral works presented, the richness of sonorities and the dynamic contrasts displayed in each of them, as well as the emotional impetus behind all of these extraordinary masterpieces made them uncommonly impressive. The powerful climaxes of "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino" and "Jubilate Deo" reached an almost unparalleled glory of sound, while the Benedictus for three choirs with its delicate echoings and unconventional coloring looked far into the musical future. But finest was the superb Nativity poem, "O Jesu Mi Dulcissime," with its strikingly modern employment of brief, reiterated phrases, its broad, solemn close, and surprisingly rich harmonic progressions.

The singers found the Gabrieli music more difficult to negotiate than the numbers of later origin on the lengthy list, and the tempi adopted were sometimes open to question. Surely the "Osanna" in the Benedictus should have gone at a brisker pace, and the first part of the whole more delicately set forth. But regardless of any such shortcomings there should be but gratitude for the opportunity granted to hear these magnificent examples of choral invention.

Mozart on Program

After them the three excerpts from Masonic works by Mozart seemed particularly tame affairs, and in fact, they were very weak examples. The choruses from Handel's "Semele" and "L'Allegro" were not much more rewarding. But with the "Carnival Song" for men's voices and brass, the excellent "Howl Ye" from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom" and the "Casey Jones" in the clever arrangement by Edward B. Lawton, the choral forces came into their own.

All three of these contemporary American items were written especially for one or both of the performing forces. Mr. Piston's setting of the verses by Lorenzo de Medici was new here and proved to be an original and fanciful addition to the literature.

The choral body did its best singing of the evening in these compositions and in the extremely difficult Epilogue from Stravinsky's "Oedopus Rex."

Here they were on sure ground emotionally and technically, giving each with a tonal solidity, carefully perfected ensemble and niceness of shading that did them great credit. The schedule was rounded out with the great fugal "Gum Sancto Spiriu" from Bach's Mass in B Minor.

H. M. Rainie was the tenor soloist in the finale from Mozart's "Die Maurerfreude," and R. E. L. Reiner was the Speaker, and F. C. Wing the Messenger in the Stravinsky contribution. N. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

CONCERT IS GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducts Boston Orchestra in Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works at Carnegie Hall

TWO SYMPHONIES HEARD

Centenary of Russian's Birth Marked by Playing of 'Fifth' —'Fourth' Presented

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final New York concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The hall was packed. After an overwhelming performance of overwhelming music—the finale of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony—there was an immense demonstration as the audience rose to its feet and stamped and cheered.

Thus the second of the Bostonians' concerts of the week recognized, as the first did, the Tchaikovsky centenary. Again Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, each represented by a symphony, made the program. For reasons of repertory Mr. Koussevitzky did not couple with Tchaikovsky's symphony the one of the same number by Beethoven. Beethoven's Fourth, not his Fifth, began the concert. This provided a grateful contrast, but if the two Fifth symphonies had been played yesterday, as the two Sixth symphonies were placed side by side Thursday night, there would have been a very interesting comparison, because Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, in their Fifth symphonies, have a common theme and a common expressive aim—the struggle of the individual against "fate," the rise of the spirit from the Slough of Despond to victory. Indeed, Tchaikovsky's finale is the one optimistic and victorious page to which one can turn in the list of his major symphonic compositions; and it is a magnificent movement, in a place where one is badly needed, since the Fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky is a curiously uneven creation.

Finale Follows Waltz

It is in fact somewhat typical of the composer, still in his formative period, that this noble finale, as grand in its form as in its spirit, should be placed, cheek by jowl, immediately after the tawdry and banal waltz which Tchaikovsky elects to use here in place of the classic scherzo. This latter movement is the main cause of the Fifth Symphony ranking as far as it does below the "Pathétique."

Yet again, there is such richness and there are such flashes of magnificently symphonic writing that this work may live as long as finer scores by Tchaikovsky, despite discrepancies. By "symphonic" we do not mean merely the carrying over, not only of the "fate" theme and other themes, from movement to movement—a procedure which seems to have astonished Ernest Newman and occasioned his remark that this is "a scheme that is certainly without a parallel in the history of the symphony." Shades of Beethoven's Ninth, Schumann's Second and Fourth, the anticipations of the same "scheme" as early as Beethoven's Second and Fifth symphonies, to say nothing of César Franck's, which came a year after Tchaikovsky's Fifth! The history of the cyclic symphonic form is a pretty old one.

"Symphonic" refers also to the resourcefulness in development displayed in Tchaikovsky opening and closing movements, and to many a pretty feat of thematic manipulation which serves him well. Enough! This Fifth symphony, too, is the symphony of a great genius, and there is no denying that fact, although the innocent public seems to have discovered it somewhat earlier than the more old-fashioned and pedantic school of criticism.

Orchestra "Triumphs"

Again Tchaikovsky, as well as Koussevitzky and the now unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra triumphed, because of the inherent qualities of the music they played, and the extraordinary brilliance and euphony of the playing. One need not have listened with unqualified agreement to everything the conductor did to make these remarks; Tchaikovsky's first movement, in particular, was subjected to a special "reading." Where there were opportunities for a retard or accelerando the conductor availed himself of them to the extent that the law allowed. The symphony is a gamut of moods; the tempi are not intended to be strict. The question remains as to what degree of rubato is advisable in performance.

Questions like these can be argued long after the concert is passed. In the main, in Beethoven's Symphony, read with a fine esprit and objectivity, and in the symphony which contains so much that is poor and so much more that is great, and all characteristic of Tchaikovsky—Dr. Koussevitzky directed superlative performances. They greatly affected the audience and brought a dramatic conclusion of the 1939-40 season in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The World's Greatest Artists Are on Victor Records

Yours – to own and Enjoy Notable Victor Recordings by

Walter Damrosch

and the National Symphony Orchestra

Airs de Ballet (from Iphigenia in Aulis) Parts 1, 2 and 3. (Glück-Gevaert) with Gavotte in D (from Sonata No. 6 for Violoncello solo) (Bach-Damrosch). Records No. 7321 and 7322, each $2.00

Henry VIII — (Ballet Divertisements.) (Saint-Saëns). Introduction and Entrance of the Clans, and Scotch Idyl — Record No. 7292, $2.00

Henry VIII (Ballet Divertisements.) (Saint-Saëns) Dance of the Gypsy and Jig and Finale. Record No. 7293, $2.00

Pavane (Fauré) (Opus 50) and Perpetual Motion (Moszkowski) (From Suite, Opus 39). Record No. 7323, $2.00

Other Famous Symphony Orchestras in distinguished performances on Victor Records

La Mer (The Sea) (Debussy) — Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, cond. Album M-643 (AM-643 for automatic operation) 6 sides, $6.50

Symphony No. 5 in C minor (Beethoven)—NBC Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Arturo Toscanini, Album M-640 (AM640 for automatic operation) 8 sides, $8.00

Symphony No. 5, (Szostakowicz) — Leopold Stokowski and Philadelphia Orchestra, Album M-619 (AM-619 for automatic operation) 12 sides, $12.00

★

Ask about the new Victor Record Catalogue which lists more than 7500 Victor Record Selections. Ask also about the new RCA Victor Long Life Needle.

The Gramophone Shop, Inc.
The World's Best Recorded Music

18 East 48th Street
290 Park Avenue
New York City

WILFRED C. HECK announces the opening of the new office of the WESTERN CONCERT MANAGEMENT
5410 Wilshire Boulevard
Los Angeles, California

LET THE CONGENIALITY OF AN INTERMISSION OR AFTER-THE-PROGRAM COCKTAIL AT THE HOTEL
WOODSTOCK
NEXT DOOR TO TOWN HALL
REMIND YOU TO DINE THERE BEFORE YOUR NEXT VISIT TO TOWN HALL
FAMOUS FOR GOOD FOOD

Town Hall Announcements

Afternoon events at 3:00, evening events at 8:30 unless otherwise specified

APRIL

Saturday Eve.	Apr. 6	HARVARD and RADCLIFFE GLEE CLUBS, G. Wallace Woodworth, Conductor
Sunday Aft.	Apr. 7	MARION CORDA, Diseuse
Sunday Eve.	Apr. 7	TOSSY SPIVAKOVSKY, Violinist
Monday Eve.	Apr. 8	ANTONIO BROSA, Violinist
Tuesday Eve.	Apr. 9	PERCY GRAINGER, Pianist
Wed. 5:30 p.m.	Apr. 10	OLGA SAMAROFF STOKOWSKI "Modern Music" (Layman's Music Courses)
Wednesday Eve.	Apr. 10	THE BACH CIRCLE OF NEW YORK
Thursday Eve.	Apr. 11	"AMERICA'S TOWN MEETING OF THE AIR"
Friday Eve.	Apr. 12	JANOS SCHOLZ, 'Cellist
Saturday Aft.	Apr. 13	MARIE ZORN, Pianist
Sunday Aft.	Apr. 14	WORKMEN'S CIRCLE CHORUS, Lazar Weiner, Conductor
Monday Eve.	Apr. 15	GENERAL SOCIETY OF MECHANICS AND TRADESMEN, Commencement Exercises
Tuesday Eve.	Apr. 16	JOAN FIELD, Violinist
Wednesday Eve.	Apr. 17	EARL ASHCROFT, Bass Baritone
Thursday Eve.	Apr. 18	CLASSICAL CYCLE OF STEPHEN FOSTER MELODIES, arranged by RAOUL GEORGES VIDAS
Friday Eve.	Apr. 19	RIVERDALE COUNTRY SCHOOL, 8th Annual Choral Concert
Saturday Eve.	Apr. 20	MARGARITA SALVI, Soprano; FREDERICO LONGAS, Pianist; ENRIQUE RUIZ, Tenor
Tuesday Eve.	Apr. 23	ROBERT GOLDSAND, Pianist
Wednesday Eve.	Apr. 24	EGON PETRI, Pianist
Friday Eve.	Apr. 26	BELL CHORUS OF NEW YORK
Saturday Eve.	Apr. 27	FREIHEIT MANDOLIN ORCHESTRA
Sun. Aft. at 5:30	April 28	JOHANN SINGER, Pianist

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 7 - 1940

MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

From Gabrieli to Casey Jones

HARVARD GLEE CLUB and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, concert last night at Town Hall with the assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's brass choir and E. Power Biggs, organist, in the following program:

Giovanni Gabrieli (1557-1612)....Processional and ceremonial music for voices, organ and bass, written for the Church of St. Mark in Venice
Mozart....................Masonic Music
Walter Piston....Carnival Song for Men's Voices and Brass (1938)
Handel....Choruses from "Semele" and "L'Allegro"
Stravinsky..Epilogue from "Oedipus Rex"
Randall Thompson....Howl Ye, from "The Peaceable Kingdom" (1935)
E. B. Lawton (arr. from American folk song)..............Casey Jones (1939)
Bach....Cum Sancto Spiritu, from Mass in B minor (with the assistance of former members of the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses).
Accompanists, William W. Austin, Ralph Renwick Jr.

The student choristers from Harvard and Radcliffe, who are well known in the neighborhood of Boston, and occasionally here, as accomplished interpreters of exceptionally exacting choral works, gave their hearers a rewarding opportunity last night to become acquainted with the dignity, pomp and proclamative color of some of the music composed by Giovanni Gabrieli, the remarkable organist at the Church of St. Mark in Venice from 1585 to 1612. These qualities were particularly notable in the opening "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino", from the second book of Gabrieli's "Symphoniae Sacrae, in which the voices and the chanting brass gave a vivid impression of the splendor of a major Venetian festival.

The other choral works on this list from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of the master who had composed for Venetian church and civic rituals three centuries ago were a Benedictus, dated 1597, for three choirs; "O Jesu mi dulcissime," Christmas music in a more intimate vein, dated 1615, and a resplendent "Jubilate Deo." Each of these choruses was prefaced by a short organ prelude, and the Boston Symphony's instrumentalists also played a high-spirited, elaborately wrought "Canzona per sonare a quattro."

Of the qualities of Gabrieli's music only a few hints can be given here; spacious complexity of structure and architectonic grandeur, combined with still communicative expressive significance, were among the most prominent first impressions. The first and last of the choruses, in particular, gave a striking musical illustration of the flavor and atmosphere of the time and the place of their composition. At times some of the subtler details of the choral scoring seemed to be obscured in the memorable brilliance and sonority of these two festal works, but this probably was due to the nature of the music itself, written for performance in unusually spacious surroundings, rather than to the well trained choruses or talented players of the trumpets, trombones and the tuba.

• • •

Mr. Woodworth then advanced about a century and three-quarters in history to present three excerpts from the now seldom remembered music written by Mozart for Masonic occasions. The finale from "Eine kleine Freimaurer Kantate" (K. 627) is straightforward, hearty music of distinctly Germanic flavor. The Radcliffe girls sang "Lasst Uns mit Geschlungen Händen," apparently written for a Ladies' Day in the Viennese lodge. The third, with H. M. Raine as the tenor soloist, was the finale from the cantata "Die Maurerfreude" (K. 471).

The first Harvard composer on the list was Walter Piston, whose setting of an Italian text from Lorenzo de' Medici's "Canti Carnascialeschi" for men's voices and brass had its first New York performance. His vocal scoring is well suited to the verbal rhythm, and ably suggests its varying expressive hues in an idiom that sometimes makes discreet use of dissonance with generally melodic results. The brass choir, which has some strikingly plangent measures, plays an important part in the interludes, forecasting the mood of the succeeding verse.

• • •

Despite the loss of orchestral color sustained in a performance with piano accompaniment, the epilogue from "Oedipus Rex" still impressed as dramatically potent music. F. C. Wing made the messenger's tragic announcement, and R. E. I. Strider was the Speaker. Both choruses did notable work in the effective excerpt from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom," written for these two groups and performed by them here a few years ago. Mr. Lawton's version of "Casey Jones" preserved its swing and essentially American savor; the piano accompaniment had its suggestions of machinery and rolling wheels. This was called upon for repetition.

The Harvard Glee Club, throughout the evening, observed high standards in choral technique, quality of tone, unity and expressive responsiveness, and deserved more extensive encomiums than are possible in a midnight review. Similar compliments could be bestowed upon the Radcliffe chorus, whose singing showed marked improvement as compared with its concert here in 1937. Messrs. Pison and Thompson both took bows—Mr. Stravinsky, however, busied with a performance of his music elsewhere in the city, could not acknowledge the applause for the finale of "Oedipus."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

Harvard Club Concert

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, at their joint concert last night in Town Hall, under the direction of Wallace Woodworth, presented an unusually elaborate program, the first half of which was devoted to works by Giovanni Gabrieli, the seventeenth century Italian composer. Although Gabrieli was one of the greatest musical geniuses of his time and the most important composer in the Venetian school, his compositions are virtually unknown today except to connoisseurs. It was therefore, a most praiseworthy effort on the part of the combined choruses to bring public attention to the remarkable creations of this unaccountably neglected genius.

Assisted by the brass choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and E. Power Biggs, organist, the choristers were heard in four of Gabrieli's works from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of 1597 and 1615. Each of these was preceded by an "Intonation" for organ by the same composer, who was for many years the organist at St. Mark's in Venice. These brief preludes served to establish the key of the choral numbers which they preceded on the program. A "canzona per sonare" played by the brasses completed the Gabrieli selections.

Gabrieli, who was the teacher of Heinrich Schuetz, Michael Praetorius and other celebrated composers of the time, had, as Reimann pointed out, a far weightier influence on the musical production of the first half of the seventeenth century than the famous Florentine monodists. His innovations in matters of form, harmonic modulations and the employment of repeated short phrases gave much of his music performed last night a strikingly modern effect.

The imaginative treatment of the antiphonal part-writing in Gabrieli's choral works presented, the richness of sonorities and the dynamic contrasts displayed in each of them, as well as the emotional impetus behind all of these extraordinary masterpieces made them uncommonly impressive. The powerful climaxes of "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino" and "Jubilate Deo" reached an almost unparalleled glory of sound, while the Benedictus for three choirs with its delicate echoings and unconventional coloring looked far into the musical future. But finest was the superb Nativity poem, "O Jesu Mi Dulcissime," with its strikingly modern employment of brief, reiterated phrases, its broad, solemn close, and surprisingly rich harmonic progressions.

The singers found the Gabrieli music more difficult to negotiate than the numbers of later origin on the lengthy list, and the tempi adopted were sometimes open to question. Surely the "Osanna" in the Benedictus should have gone at a brisker pace, and the first part of the whole more delicately set forth. But regardless of any such shortcomings there should be but gratitude for the opportunity granted to hear these magnificent examples of choral invention.

Mozart on Program

After them the three excerpts from Masonic works by Mozart seemed particularly tame affairs, and in fact, they were very weak examples. The choruses from Handel's "Semele" and "L'Allegro" were not much more rewarding. But with the "Carnival Song" for men's voices and brass, the excellent "Howl Ye" from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom" and the "Casey Jones" in the clever arrangement by Edward B. Lawton, the choral forces came into their own.

All three of these contemporary American items were written especially for one or both of the performing forces. Mr. Piston's setting of the verses by Lorenzo de Medici was new here and proved to be an original and fanciful addition to the literature.

The choral body did its best singing of the evening in these compositions and in the extremely difficult Epilogue from Stravinsky's "Oedopus Rex."

Here they were on sure ground emotionally and technically, giving each with a tonal solidity, carefully perfected ensemble and niceness of shading that did them great credit. The schedule was rounded out with the great fugal "Gum Sancto Spiriu" from Bach's Mass in B Minor.

H. M. Rainie was the tenor soloist in the finale from Mozart's "Die Maurerfreude," and R. E. L. Reiner was the Speaker, and F. C. Wing the Messenger in the Stravinsky contribution. N. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

CONCERT IS GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducts Boston Orchestra in Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works at Carnegie Hall

TWO SYMPHONIES HEARD

Centenary of Russian's Birth Marked by Playing of 'Fifth' —'Fourth' Presented

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final New York concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The hall was packed. After an overwhelming performance of overwhelming music —the finale of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony—there was an immense demonstration as the audience rose to its feet and stamped and cheered.

Thus the second of the Bostonians' concerts of the week recognized, as the first did, the Tchaikovsky centenary. Again Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, each represented by a symphony, made the program. For reasons of repertory Mr. Koussevitzky did not couple with Tchaikovsky's symphony the one of the same number by Beethoven. Beethoven's Fourth, not his Fifth, began the concert. This provided a grateful contrast, but if the two Fifth symphonies had been played yesterday, as the two Sixth symphonies were placed side by side Thursday night, there would have been a very interesting comparison, because Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, in their Fifth symphonies, have a common theme and a common expressive aim—the struggle of the individual against "fate," the rise of the spirit from the Slough of Despond to victory. Indeed, Tchaikovsky's finale is the one optimistic and victorious page to which one can turn in the list of his major symphonic compositions; and it is a magnificent movement, in a place where one is badly needed, since the Fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky is a curiously uneven creation.

Finale Follows Waltz

It is in fact somewhat typical of the composer, still in his formative period, that this noble finale, as grand in its form as in its spirit, should be placed, cheek by jowl, immediately after the tawdry and banal waltz which Tchaikovsky elects to use here in place of the classic scherzo. This latter movement is the main cause of the Fifth Symphony ranking as far as it does below the "Pathétique."

Yet again, there is such richness and there are such flashes of magnificently symphonic writing that this work may live as long as finer scores by Tchaikovsky, despite discrepancies. By "symphonic" we do not mean merely the carrying over, not only of the "fate" theme and other themes, from movement to movement—a procedure which seems to have astonished Ernest Newman and occasioned his remark that this is "a scheme that is certainly without a parallel in the history of the symphony." Shades of Beethoven's Ninth, Schumann's Second and Fourth, the anticipations of the same "scheme" as early as Beethoven's Second and Fifth symphonies, to say nothing of César Franck's, which came a year after Tchaikovsky's Fifth! The history of the cyclic symphonic form is a pretty old one.

"Symphonic" refers also to the resourcefulness in development displayed in Tchaikovsky opening and closing movements, and to many a pretty feat of thematic manipulation which serves him well. Enough! This Fifth symphony, too, is the symphony of a great genius, and there is no denying that fact, although the innocent public seems to have discovered it somewhat earlier than the more old-fashioned and pedantic school of criticism.

Orchestra "Triumphs"

Again Tchaikovsky, as well as Koussevitzky and the now unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra triumphed, because of the inherent qualities of the music they played, and the extraordinary brilliance and euphony of the playing. One need not have listened with unqualified agreement to everything the conductor did to make these remarks; Tchaikovsky's first movement, in particular, was subjected to a special "reading." Where there were opportunities for a retard or accelerando the conductor availed himself of them to the extent that the law allowed. The symphony is a gamut of moods; the tempi are not intended to be strict. The question remains as to what degree of rubato is advisable in performance.

Questions like these can be argued long after the concert is passed. In the main, in Beethoven's Symphony, read with a fine esprit and objectivity, and in the symphony which contains so much that is poor and so much more that is great, and all characteristic of Tchaikovsky—Dr. Koussevitzky directed superlative performances. They greatly affected the audience and brought a dramatic conclusion of the 1939-40 season in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MUSICAL ART QUARTET

SASCHA JACOBSEN, Violin
PAUL BERNARD, Violin
WILLIAM HYMANSON, Viola
MARIE ROEMAET ROSANOFF, 'Cello

TOWN HALL
Monday Evenings
DECEMBER 2, 1940 — MARCH 10, 1941

Management: RAY HALMANS, 119 West 57th ST., New York, N. Y.
Former associate of the late Richard Copley

TOWN HALL Tuesday Evening, April 9th, at 8:30 o'clock

GRAINGER

I.
Fantasia and Fugue, G Minor..Bach-Liszt
II.
Sonata in B Minor, Op. 58..........Chopin
III.
"After a Dream" ("Apres un reve") Gabriel Faure
"The Fountains" (Jeux d'eau)......Ravel
Moonlight (Clair de lune)........Debussy
Toccata, C sharp Minor.............Debussy

IV.
The Merry King, English Folksong set by Grainger
Scotch Strathspey and Reel set by Grainger
Lullaby from "Tribute to Foster" Grainger
"Maguire's Kick" (Irish March-Jig) Stanford-Grainger

Steinway Piano

Tickets: Boxes, $16.50; Orchestra, $2.20 - $1.65; Balcony, $1.10 - 75c.
Including Tax On Sale at Box Office

Manager: Antonia Morse
White Plains, N. Y. Tel. Gladstone 1277

TOWN HALL Friday Evening, APRIL 12th, at 8:30 o'clock

JANOS SCHOLZ

'CELLIST

OTTO HERZ at the Piano

I.
Sonata in E minor, Op. 38 Johannes Brahms
Allegro non troppo
Allegretto quasi Menuetto
Allegro
II.
Sonata, Op. 4 (1922)......Zoltan Kodaly
Fantasia
Allegro con spirito

Sonata, Op. 6 (1932)......Samuel Barber
Allegro ma non troppo
Adagio, Presto. Adagio.
Allegro appassionato
—INTERMISSION—
Sonata in A, Op. 69......L. van Beethoven
Allegro ma non tanto
Scherzo. Allegro molto.
Adagio cantabile. Allegro vivace

Steinway Piano Columbia Records

Tickets: Boxes (seating 6) $16.50; Orchestra $2.20, $1.65, $1.10; Balcony 83c and 40c.
Tax included On sale at Box Office

Management RAY HALMANS, 119 West 57th Street, New York, N. Y.
Former associate of the late Richard Copley

The Town Hall Endowment Series

Eleventh Season 1940-1941

JOSEF HOFMANN
PAUL ROBESON
VRONSKY AND BABIN
*DOROTHY MAYNOR
IGOR GORIN
YEHUDI MENUHIN
EGON PETRI
LOTTE LEHMANN

*WINNER, 1940 TOWN HALL ENDOWMENT SERIES AWARD

DATES: In the order listed above, Nov. 6, 27, Dec. 11, Jan. 8, 22, Feb. 12, 26, March 12. All on Wednesday Evenings. PRICES FOR THE 8 EVENTS: $14., $17.50, $20. Loges seating Six, $120. Tax Exempt. ($8. and $10.50 Seats Sold Out.) DEPOSIT OF $1.00 on each subscription seat will hold reservation until October 1, 1940. Renewal period for present subscribers ends April 1. Public Sale opens April 15, but reservations should be placed at once to be filled in order of receipt. TICKETS FOR SINGLE EVENTS, IF AVAILABLE, WILL NOT BE SOLD UNTIL OCT. 30th. Address: Box 4, Town Hall Endowment Series, 123 W. 43rd St.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 7 - 1940

MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

From Gabrieli to Casey Jones

HARVARD GLEE CLUB and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, concert last night at Town Hall with the assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's brass [illegible] E. Power Biggs, organist, in the following program:

Giovanni Gabrieli (1557-1612)....Processional and ceremonial music for voices, organ and bass, written for the Church of St. Mark in Venice
Mozart....................Masonic Music
Walter Piston....Carnival Song for Men's Voices and Brass (1938)
Handel....Choruses from "Semele" and "L'Allegro"
Stravinsky..Epilogue from "Oedipus Rex"
Randall Thompson....Howl Ye, from "The Peaceable Kingdom" (1935)
E. B. Lawton (arr. from American folk song)..........Casey Jones (1939)
Bach....Cum Sancto Spiritu, from Mass in B minor (with the assistance of former members of the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses).
Accompanists, William W. Austin, Ralph Renwick jr.

The student choristers from Harvard and Radcliffe, who are well known in the neighborhood of Boston, and occasionally here, as accomplished interpreters of exceptionally exacting choral works, gave their hearers a rewarding opportunity last night to become acquainted with the dignity, pomp and proclamative color of some of the music composed by Giovanni Gabrieli, the remarkable organist at the Church of St. Mark in Venice from 1585 to 1612. These qualities were particularly notable in the opening "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino", from the second book of Gabrieli's "Symphoniae Sacrae, in which the voices and the chanting brass gave a vivid impression of the splendor of a major Venetian festival.

The other choral works on this list from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of the master who had composed for Venetian church and civic rituals three centuries ago were a Benedictus, dated 1597, for three choirs; "O Jesu mi dulcissime," Christmas music in a more intimate vein, dated 1615, and a resplendent "Jubilate Deo." Each of these choruses was prefaced by a short organ prelude, and the Boston Symphony's instrumentalists also played a high-spirited, elaborately wrought "Canzona per sonare a quattro."

Of the qualities of Gabrieli's music only a few hints can be given here; spacious complexity of structure and architectonic grandeur, combined with still communicative expressive significance, were among the most prominent first impressions. The first and last of the choruses, in particular, gave a striking musical illustration of the flavor and atmosphere of the time and the place of their composition. At times some of the subtler details of the choral scoring seemed to be obscured in the memorable brilliance and sonority of these two festal works, but this probably was due to the nature of the music itself, written for performance in unusually spacious surroundings, rather than to the well trained choruses or talented players of the trumpets, trombones and the tuba.

• • •

Mr. Woodworth then advanced about a century and three-quarters in history to present three excerpts from the now seldom remembered music written by Mozart for Masonic occasions. The finale from "Eine kleine Freimaurer Kantate" (K. 627) is straightforward, hearty music of distinctly Germanic flavor. The Radcliffe girls sang "Lasst Uns mit Geschlungen Händen," apparently written for a Ladies' Day in the Viennese lodge. The third, with H. M. Raine as the tenor soloist, was the finale from the cantata "Die Maurerfreude" (K. 471).

The first Harvard composer on the list was Walter Piston, whose setting of an Italian text from Lorenzo de' Medici's "Canti Carnascialeschi" for men's voices and brass had its first New York performance. His vocal scoring is well suited to the verbal rhythm, and ably suggests its varying expressive hues in an idiom that sometimes makes discreet use of dissonance with generally melodic results. The brass choir, which has some strikingly plangent measures, plays an important part in the interludes, forecasting the mood of the succeeding verse.

• • •

Despite the loss of orchestral color sustained in a performance with piano accompaniment, the epilogue from "Oedipus Rex" still impressed as dramatically potent music. F. C. Wing made the messenger's tragic announcement, and R. E. I. Strider was the Speaker. Both choruses did notable work in the effective excerpt from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom," written for these two groups and performed by them here a few years ago. Mr. Lawton's version of "Casey Jones" preserved its swing and essentially American savor; the piano accompaniment had its suggestions of machinery and rolling wheels. This was called upon for repetition.

The Harvard Glee Club, throughout the evening, observed high standards in choral technique, quality of tone, unity and expressive responsiveness, and deserved more extensive encomiums than are possible in a midnight review. Similar compliments could be bestowed upon the Radcliffe chorus, whose singing showed marked improvement as compared with its concert here in 1937. Messrs. Pison and Thompson both took bows—Mr. Stravinsky, however, busied with a performance of his music elsewhere in the city, could not acknowledge the applause for the finale of "Oedipus."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

Harvard Club Concert

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, at their joint concert last night in Town Hall, under the direction of Wallace Woodworth, presented an unusually elaborate program, the first half of which was devoted to works by Giovanni Gabrieli, the seventeenth century Italian composer. Although Gabrieli was one of the greatest musical geniuses of his time and the most important composer in the Venetian school, his compositions are virtually unknown today except to connoisseurs. It was therefore, a most praiseworthy effort on the part of the combined choruses to bring public attention to the remarkable creations of this unaccountably neglected genius.

Assisted by the brass choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and E. Power Biggs, organist, the choristers were heard in four of Gabrieli's works from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of 1597 and 1615. Each of these was preceded by an "Intonation" for organ by the same composer, who was for many years the organist at St. Mark's in Venice. These brief preludes served to establish the key of the choral numbers which they preceded on the program. A "canzona per sonare" played by the brasses completed the Gabrieli selections.

Gabrieli, who was the teacher of Heinrich Schuetz, Michael Praetorius and other celebrated composers of the time, had, as Reimann pointed out, a far weightier influence on the musical production of the first half of the seventeenth century than the famous Florentine monodists. His innovations in matters of form, harmonic modulations and the employment of repeated short phrases gave much of his music performed last night a strikingly modern effect.

The imaginative treatment of the antiphonal part-writing in Gabrieli's choral works presented, the richness of sonorities and the dynamic contrasts displayed in each of them, as well as the emotional impetus behind all of these extraordinary masterpieces made them uncommonly impressive. The powerful climaxes of "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino" and "Jubilate Deo" reached an almost unparalleled glory of sound, while the Benedictus for three choirs with its delicate echoings and unconventional coloring looked far into the musical future. But finest was the superb Nativity poem, "O Jesu Mi Dulcissime," with its strikingly modern employment of brief, reiterated phrases, its broad, solemn close, and surprisingly rich harmonic progressions.

The singers found the Gabrieli music more difficult to negotiate than the numbers of later origin on the lengthy list, and the tempi adopted were sometimes open to question. Surely the "Osanna" in the Benedictus should have gone at a brisker pace, and the first part of the whole more delicately set forth. But regardless of any such shortcomings there should be but gratitude for the opportunity granted to hear these magnificent examples of choral invention.

Mozart on Program

After them the three excerpts from Masonic works by Mozart seemed particularly tame affairs, and in fact, they were very weak examples. The choruses from Handel's "Semele" and "L'Allegro" were not much more rewarding. But with the "Carnival Song" for men's voices and brass, the excellent "Howl Ye" from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom" and the "Casey Jones" in the clever arrangement by Edward B. Lawton, the choral forces came into their own.

All three of these contemporary American items were written especially for one or both of the performing forces. Mr. Piston's setting of the verses by Lorenzo de Medici was new here and proved to be an original and fanciful addition to the literature.

The choral body did its best singing of the evening in these compositions and in the extremely difficult Epilogue from Stravinsky's "Oedopus Rex."

Here they were on sure ground emotionally and technically, giving each with a tonal solidity, carefully perfected ensemble and niceness of shading that did them great credit. The schedule was rounded out with the great fugal "Gum Sancto Spiriu" from Bach's Mass in B Minor.

H. M. Rainie was the tenor soloist in the finale from Mozart's "Die Maurerfreude," and R. E. L. Reiner was the Speaker, and F. C. Wing the Messenger in the Stravinsky contribution. N. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

CONCERT IS GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducts Boston Orchestra in Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works at Carnegie Hall

TWO SYMPHONIES HEARD

Centenary of Russian's Birth Marked by Playing of 'Fifth' —'Fourth' Presented

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final New York concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The hall was packed. After an overwhelming performance of overwhelming music —the finale of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony—there was an immense demonstration as the audience rose to its feet and stamped and cheered.

Thus the second of the Bostonians' concerts of the week recognized, as the first did, the Tchaikovsky centenary. Again Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, each represented by a symphony, made the program. For reasons of repertory Mr. Koussevitzky did not couple with Tchaikovsky's symphony the one of the same number by Beethoven. Beethoven's Fourth, not his Fifth, began the concert. This provided a grateful contrast, but if the two Fifth symphonies had been played yesterday, as the two Sixth symphonies were placed side by side Thursday night, there would have been a very interesting comparison, because Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, in their Fifth symphonies, have a common theme and a common expressive aim—the struggle of the individual against "fate," the rise of the spirit from the Slough of Despond to victory. Indeed, Tchaikovsky's finale is the one optimistic and victorious page to which one can turn in the list of his major symphonic compositions; and it is a magnificent movement, in a place where one is badly needed, since the Fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky is a curiously uneven creation.

Finale Follows Waltz

It is in fact somewhat typical of the composer, still in his formative period, that this noble finale, as grand in its form as in its spirit, should be placed, cheek by jowl, immediately after the tawdry and banal waltz which Tchaikovsky elects to use here in place of the classic scherzo. This latter movement is the main cause of the Fifth Symphony ranking as far as it does below the "Pathétique."

Yet again, there is such richness and there are such flashes of magnificently symphonic writing that this work may live as long as finer scores by Tchaikovsky, despite discrepancies. By "symphonic" we do not mean merely the carrying over, not only of the "fate" theme and other themes, from movement to movement—a procedure which seems to have astonished Ernest Newman and occasioned his remark that this is "a scheme that is certainly without a parallel in the history of the symphony." Shades of Beethoven's Ninth, Schumann's Second and Fourth, the anticipations of the same "scheme" as early as Beethoven's Second and Fifth symphonies, to say nothing of César Franck's, which came a year after Tchaikovsky's Fifth! The history of the cyclic symphonic form is a pretty old one.

"Symphonic" refers also to the resourcefulness in development displayed in Tchaikovsky opening and closing movements, and to many a pretty feat of thematic manipulation which serves him well. Enough! This Fifth symphony, too, is the symphony of a great genius, and there is no denying that fact, although the innocent public seems to have discovered it somewhat earlier than the more old-fashioned and pedantic school of criticism.

Orchestra "Triumphs"

Again Tchaikovsky, as well as Koussevitzky and the now unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra triumphed, because of the inherent qualities of the music they played, and the extraordinary brilliance and euphony of the playing. One need not have listened with unqualified agreement to everything the conductor did to make these remarks; Tchaikovsky's first movement, in particular, was subjected to a special "reading." Where there were opportunities for a retard or accelerando the conductor availed himself of them to the extent that the law allowed. The symphony is a gamut of moods; the tempi are not intended to be strict. The question remains as to what degree of rubato is advisable in performance.

Questions like these can be argued long after the concert is passed. In the main, in Beethoven's Symphony, read with a fine esprit and objectivity, and in the symphony which contains so much that is poor and so much more that is great, and all characteristic of Tchaikovsky—Dr. Koussevitzky directed superlative performances. They greatly affected the audience and brought a dramatic conclusion of the 1939-40 season in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MAIDEN FORM Faces the Facts . . . about FIGURES!

Women's figures differ — and therefore they need different methods of control. Facing these facts, Maiden Form creates foundations keyed to figures as well as to fashions. Select the specialized design which meets the needs of your type and gives you new figure-loveliness!

BRASSIERES and GIRDLES — $1.00 to $5.00
"ONCE-OVERS" — $5.00 to $10.00
SOLD AT ALL LEADING STORES

"There is a Maiden Form for Every Type of Figure!"

Maiden Form
LOOK FOR THIS TRADE-MARK ON BRASSIERES GIRDLES "ONCE-OVERS"
*Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

SEND FOR free STYLE BOOKLET T: MAIDEN FORM BRASSIERE CO., INC., NEW YORK, N. Y.

CARNEGIE HALL Wednesday Evening, APRIL 17th, at 8:45 o'clock

+ SCHOLA CANTORUM +

HUGH ROSS, Conductor

SOUTH AMERICAN MUSIC

PROGRAM

Sinfonia Biblica .... Castro
The Annunciation. The Entry into Jerusalem. Golgotha.
First performance in the United States

Maracatu De Chico Rei .... Mignone
Festival. Arrival of the Chieftain Maracatu.
Dance of the Three Macotas. Dance of the Six Slaves.
Finale.

Pater Noster .... Marx
First performance anywhere
For Baritone Solo, Mixed Chorus, Boys Chorus, Orchestra and Organ.

Choros No. 10. Razga O Coracao (Speak, O Heart) .... Villa-Lobos

85 members of the
NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Chorus of 200

Tickets at Box Office Steinway Piano

THE TOWN HALL, INC.
123 WEST 43RD STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y. TEL. BRYANT 9-2636
An Educational Institution Founded in 1894 as
THE LEAGUE FOR POLITICAL EDUCATION

GEORGE V. DENNY, JR., President
ARTHUR E. BESTOR, Chairman of the Board
KENNETH KLEIN, Director, Concert Department

The Town Hall was opened in 1921 as a modern adaptation of its early American counterpart. It has been called "at once a forum, a club, a voice, a meeting place, an auditorium, a concert hall, a lyceum, a debating center, a school and a college." That it fulfills in part all of these functions is readily apparent upon a survey of its activities. For information address the Secretary.

the Musical Trinity

Composer Performer
Listener

OF COURSE you know that CREATING music is a specialized activity requiring years of study. . . .

AND OF COURSE you know that PERFORMING music is also a highly specialized activity, requiring years of preparation. . . .

OBVIOUSLY, THEN, you will admit LISTENING to music becomes a specialized activity too, if you are to appreciate to the fullest extent an art work produced and interpreted for you by trained musicians.

Listening to music can be purely an emotional experience or it can be both an intellectual and an emotional experience. To aid those music lovers who wish to derive greater pleasure from the music they hear, Town Hall has arranged for the distinctive LAYMAN'S MUSIC COURSES to be given in this auditorium at 5:30 on Wednesday Afternoons, under the direction of

OLGA SAMAROFF STOKOWSKI and HARRIETT D. JOHNSON

Coming Lectures—
Available to Non-Subscribers on the Single Admission Basis of $1.25

Apr. 10 Modern Music
Its relation to the past and to modern life studied through outstanding examples.

For details write: THE LAYMAN'S MUSIC COURSES AT TOWN HALL
Auspices: THE SHORT COURSE DIVISION and the CONCERT DEPARTMENT

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 7 - 1940

MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

From Gabrieli to Casey Jones

HARVARD GLEE CLUB and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, concert last night at Town Hall with the assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's brass choir and E. Power Biggs, organist, in the following program:

Giovanni Gabrieli (1557-1612) ... Processional and ceremonial music for voices, organ and bass, written for the Church of St. Mark in Venice
Mozart .... Masonic Music
Walter Piston ... Carnival Song for Men's Voices and Brass (1938)
Handel ... Choruses from "Semele" and "L'Allegro"
Stravinsky .. Epilogue from "Oedipus Rex"
Randall Thompson ... Howl Ye, from "The Peaceable Kingdom" (1935)
E. B. Lawton (arr. from American folk song) .... Casey Jones (1939)
Bach ... Cum Sancto Spiritu, from Mass in B minor (with the assistance of former members of the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses).
Accompanists, William W. Austin, Ralph Renwick jr.

The student choristers from Harvard and Radcliffe, who are well known in the neighborhood of Boston, and occasionally here, as accomplished interpreters of exceptionally exacting choral works, gave their hearers a rewarding opportunity last night to become acquainted with the dignity, pomp and proclamative color of some of the music composed by Giovanni Gabrieli, the remarkable organist at the Church of St. Mark in Venice from 1585 to 1612. These qualities were particularly notable in the opening "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino", from the second book of Gabrieli's "Symphoniae Sacrae, in which the voices and the chanting brass gave a vivid impression of the splendor of a major Venetian festival.

The other choral works on this list from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of the master who had composed for Venetian church and civic rituals three centuries ago were a Benedictus, dated 1597, for three choirs; "O Jesu mi dulcissime," Christmas music in a more intimate vein, dated 1615, and a resplendent "Jubilate Deo." Each of these choruses was prefaced by a short organ prelude, and the Boston Symphony's instrumentalists also played a high-spirited, elaborately wrought "Canzona per sonare a quattro."

Of the qualities of Gabrieli's music only a few hints can be given here; spacious complexity of structure and architectonic grandeur, combined with still communicative expressive significance, were among the most prominent first impressions. The first and last of the choruses, in particular, gave a striking musical illustration of the flavor and atmosphere of the time and the place of their composition. At times some of the subtler details of the choral scoring seemed to be obscured in the memorable brilliance and sonority of these two festal works, but this probably was due to the nature of the music itself, written for performance in unusually spacious surroundings, rather than to the well trained choruses or talented players of the trumpets, trombones and the tuba.

• • •

Mr. Woodworth then advanced about a century and three-quarters in history to present three excerpts from the now seldom remembered music written by Mozart for Masonic occasions. The finale from "Eine kleine Freimaurer Kantate" (K. 627) is straightforward, hearty music of distinctly Germanic flavor. The Radcliffe girls sang "Lasst Uns mit Geschlungen Händen," apparently written for a Ladies' Day in the Viennese lodge. The third, with H. M. Raine as the tenor soloist, was the finale from the cantata "Die Maurerfreude" (K. 471).

The first Harvard composer on the list was Walter Piston, whose setting of an Italian text from Lorenzo de' Medici's "Canti Carnascialeschi" for men's voices and brass had its first New York performance. His vocal scoring is well suited to the verbal rhythm, and ably suggests its varying expressive hues in an idiom that sometimes makes discreet use of dissonance with generally melodic results. The brass choir, which has some strikingly plangent measures, plays an important part in the interludes, forecasting the mood of the succeeding verse.

• • •

Despite the loss of orchestral color sustained in a performance with piano accompaniment, the epilogue from "Oedipus Rex" still impressed as dramatically potent music. F. C. Wing made the messenger's tragic announcement, and R. E. I. Strider was the Speaker. Both choruses did notable work in the effective excerpt from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom," written for these two groups and performed by them here a few years ago. Mr. Lawton's version of "Casey Jones" preserved its swing and essentially American savor; the piano accompaniment had its suggestions of machinery and rolling wheels. This was called upon for repetition.

The Harvard Glee Club, throughout the evening, observed high standards in choral technique, quality of tone, unity and expressive responsiveness, and deserved more extensive encomiums than are possible in a midnight review. Similar compliments could be bestowed upon the Radcliffe chorus, whose singing showed marked improvement as compared with its concert here in 1937. Messrs. Pison and Thompson both took bows—Mr. Stravinsky, however, busied with a performance of his music elsewhere in the city, could not acknowledge the applause for the finale of "Oedipus."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

Harvard Club Concert

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, at their joint concert last night in Town Hall, under the direction of Wallace Woodworth, presented an unusually elaborate program, the first half of which was devoted to works by Giovanni Gabrieli, the seventeenth century Italian composer. Although Gabrieli was one of the greatest musical geniuses of his time and the most important composer in the Venetian school, his compositions are virtually unknown today except to connoisseurs. It was therefore, a most praiseworthy effort on the part of the combined choruses to bring public attention to the remarkable creations of this unaccountably neglected genius.

Assisted by the brass choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and E. Power Biggs, organist, the choristers were heard in four of Gabrieli's works from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of 1597 and 1615. Each of these was preceded by an "Intonation" for organ by the same composer, who was for many years the organist at St. Mark's in Venice. These brief preludes served to establish the key of the choral numbers which they preceded on the program. A "canzona per sonare" played by the brasses completed the Gabrieli selections.

Gabrieli, who was the teacher of Heinrich Schuetz, Michael Praetorius and other celebrated composers of the time, had, as Reimann pointed out, a far weightier influence on the musical production of the first half of the seventeenth century than the famous Florentine monodists. His innovations in matters of form, harmonic modulations and the employment of repeated short phrases gave much of his music performed last night a strikingly modern effect.

The imaginative treatment of the antiphonal part-writing in Gabrieli's choral works presented, the richness of sonorities and the dynamic contrasts displayed in each of them, as well as the emotional impetus behind all of these extraordinary masterpieces made them uncommonly impressive. The powerful climaxes of "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino" and "Jubilate Deo" reached an almost unparalleled glory of sound, while the Benedictus for three choirs with its delicate echoings and unconventional coloring looked far into the musical future. But finest was the superb Nativity poem, "O Jesu Mi Dulcissime," with its strikingly modern employment of brief, reiterated phrases, its broad, solemn close, and surprisingly rich harmonic progressions.

The singers found the Gabrieli music more difficult to negotiate than the numbers of later origin on the lengthy list, and the tempi adopted were sometimes open to question. Surely the "Osanna" in the Benedictus should have gone at a brisker pace, and the first part of the whole more delicately set forth. But regardless of any such shortcomings there should be but gratitude for the opportunity granted to hear these magnificent examples of choral invention.

Mozart on Program

After them the three excerpts from Masonic works by Mozart seemed particularly tame affairs, and in fact, they were very weak examples. The choruses from Handel's "Semele" and "L'Allegro" were not much more rewarding. But with the "Carnival Song" for men's voices and brass, the excellent "Howl Ye" from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom" and the "Casey Jones" in the clever arrangement by Edward B. Lawton, the choral forces came into their own.

All three of these contemporary American items were written especially for one or both of the performing forces. Mr. Piston's setting of the verses by Lorenzo de Medici was new here and proved to be an original and fanciful addition to the literature.

The choral body did its best singing of the evening in these compositions and in the extremely difficult Epilogue from Stravinsky's "Oedopus Rex."

Here they were on sure ground emotionally and technically, giving each with a tonal solidity, carefully perfected ensemble and niceness of shading that did them great credit. The schedule was rounded out with the great fugal "Gum Sancto Spiriu" from Bach's Mass in B Minor.

H. M. Rainie was the tenor soloist in the finale from Mozart's "Die Maurerfreude," and R. E. L. Reiner was the Speaker, and F. C. Wing the Messenger in the Stravinsky contribution. N. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

CONCERT IS GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducts Boston Orchestra in Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works at Carnegie Hall

TWO SYMPHONIES HEARD

Centenary of Russian's Birth Marked by Playing of 'Fifth' —'Fourth' Presented

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final New York concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The hall was packed. After an overwhelming performance of overwhelming music—the finale of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony—there was an immense demonstration as the audience rose to its feet and stamped and cheered.

Thus the second of the Bostonians' concerts of the week recognized, as the first did, the Tchaikovsky centenary. Again Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, each represented by a symphony, made the program. For reasons of repertory Mr. Koussevitzky did not couple with Tchaikovsky's symphony the one of the same number by Beethoven. Beethoven's Fourth, not his Fifth, began the concert. This provided a grateful contrast, but if the two Fifth symphonies had been played yesterday, as the two Sixth symphonies were placed side by side Thursday night, there would have been a very interesting comparison, because Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, in their Fifth symphonies, have a common theme and a common expressive aim—the struggle of the individual against "fate," the rise of the spirit from the Slough of Despond to victory. Indeed, Tchaikovsky's finale is the one optimistic and victorious page to which one can turn in the list of his major symphonic compositions; and it is a magnificent movement, in a place where one is badly needed, since the Fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky is a curiously uneven creation.

Finale Follows Waltz

It is in fact somewhat typical of the composer, still in his formative period, that this noble finale, as grand in its form as in its spirit, should be placed, cheek by jowl, immediately after the tawdry and banal waltz which Tchaikovsky elects to use here in place of the classic scherzo. This latter movement is the main cause of the Fifth Symphony ranking as far as it does below the "Pathétique."

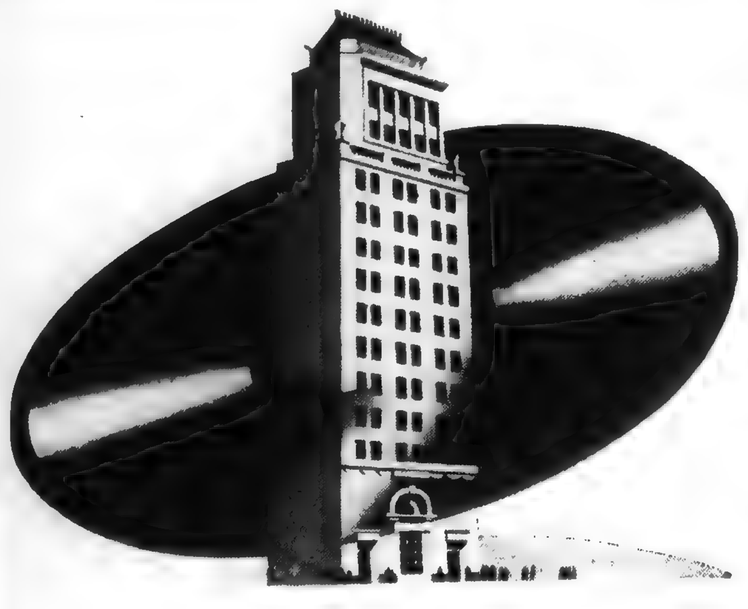
Yet again, there is such richness and there are such flashes of magnificently symphonic writing that this work may live as long as finer scores by Tchaikovsky, despite discrepancies. By "symphonic" we do not mean merely the carrying over, not only of the "fate" theme and other themes, from movement to movement—a procedure which seems to have astonished Ernest Newman and occasioned his remark that this is "a scheme that is certainly without a parallel in the history of the symphony." Shades of Beethoven's Ninth, Schumann's Second and Fourth, the anticipations of the same "scheme" as early as Beethoven's Second and Fifth symphonies, to say nothing of César Franck's, which came a year after Tchaikovsky's Fifth! The history of the cyclic symphonic form is a pretty old one.

"Symphonic" refers also to the resourcefulness in development displayed in Tchaikovsky opening and closing movements, and to many a pretty feat of thematic manipulation which serves him well. Enough! This Fifth symphony, too, is the symphony of a great genius, and there is no denying that fact, although the innocent public seems to have discovered it somewhat earlier than the more old-fashioned and pedantic school of criticism.

Orchestra "Triumphs"

Again Tchaikovsky, as well as Koussevitzky and the now unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra triumphed, because of the inherent qualities of the music they played, and the extraordinary brilliance and euphony of the playing. One need not have listened with unqualified agreement to everything the conductor did to make these remarks; Tchaikovsky's first movement, in particular, was subjected to a special "reading." Where there were opportunities for a retard or accelerando the conductor availed himself of them to the extent that the law allowed. The symphony is a gamut of moods; the tempi are not intended to be strict. The question remains as to what degree of rubato is advisable in performance.

Questions like these can be argued long after the concert is passed. In the main, in Beethoven's Symphony, read with a fine esprit and objectivity, and in the symphony which contains so much that is poor and so much more that is great, and all characteristic of Tchaikovsky—Dr. Koussevitzky directed superlative performances. They greatly affected the audience and brought a dramatic conclusion of the 1939-40 season in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.



A NEW TREASURY OF MUSIC

STEINWAY & SONS RECORD SHOP

STEINWAY HALL • 109 W. 57th ST.
(Just off Sixth Avenue) Circle 6-1100

Recommended for your library of recordings:

IN OUR STOCK YOU WILL FIND
The Recordings of the BACH ST. MATTHEW PASSION
By the HARVARD GLEE CLUB and
RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY

We also have all of the recordings by the
HARVARD GLEE CLUB

• Mail orders sent anywhere. Charge accounts invited. The Steinway Review of Permanent Music, edited by R. D. Darrell, gives authoritative opinion on current recordings. Subscription, $1 a year. Sample copy free. See the Capehart, and Magnavox Radios and Radio-Phonographs, and the RCA Victrola in our new shop.

THE TOWN HALL

SEASON 1939-40

FIRE NOTICE:—Look around NOW and choose the nearest Exit to your seat. In case of fire walk (not run) to THAT Exit. Do not try to beat your neighbor to the street.—JOHN J. MCELLIGOTT, Fire Commissioner.

Saturday Evening, April 6th, at 8:45 o'clock

HARVARD GLEE CLUB
RADCLIFFE CHORAL CLUB

G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, Conductor
Assisted by the Brass Choir from the
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
and E. POWER BIGGS, Organist

PROGRAM

GIOVANNI GABRIELI
1557-1612

PROCESSIONAL AND CEREMONIAL MUSIC for Voices, Organ, and Brass — Written for the Church of St. Mark, Venice

INTONAZIONE PER ORGANO, TONO IX
IN ECCLESIIS BENEDICITE DOMINO
(From Symphoniae Sacrae, Liber Secundus, 1615)
For Double Chorus and Six Instruments, with Basso Continuo

INTONAZIONE PER ORGANO, TONO II
BENEDICTUS
(From Sacrae Symphoniae, 1597)
For Three Choirs

PROGRAM CONTINUED ON SECOND PAGE FOLLOWING

BOOKS · RECORDS INSTRUMENTS
RADIOS
PHONOGRAPHS
RECORDING STUDIO
SHEET MUSIC
FOREIGN & DOMESTIC

MUSIC

G. SCHIRMER
3 EAST 43 · NEW YORK
TELEPHONE MUrray Hill 2-8100

Only BALDWIN
makes the ACROSONIC

The Spinet-Type Piano completely distinctive in touch, tone, action and design. To your home the Acrosonic will bring a new beauty and charm—its golden voice will delight you.

The Acrosonic is obtainable only through authorized Baldwin Dealers and in our New York Warerooms.

BALDWIN PIANOS
20 East 54th Street, New York, N.Y.
The Acrosonic is priced from $355 to $590

THE PROGRAM
ACROSS THE STREET!

FINEST FOOD
FINEST SODAS FINEST COCKTAILS

SCHRAFFT'S
138 WEST 43RD STREET

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 7 - 1940

MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

From Gabrieli to Casey Jones

HARVARD GLEE CLUB and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, concert last night at Town Hall with the assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's brass c[illegible] E. Power Biggs, organist, in the following program:

Giovanni Gabrieli (1557-1612)....Processional and ceremonial music for voices, organ and bass, written for the Church of St. Mark in Venice
Mozart.......................Masonic Music
Walter Piston....Carnival Song for Men's Voices and Brass (1938)
Handel....Choruses from "Semele" and "L'Allegro"
Stravinsky..Epilogue from "Oedipus Rex"
Randall Thompson....Howl Ye, from "The Peaceable Kingdom" (1935)
E. B. Lawton (arr. from American folk song)..............Casey Jones (1939)
Bach....Cum Sancto Spiritu, from Mass in B minor (with the assistance of former members of the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses).
Accompanists, William W. Austin, Ralph Renwick jr.

The student choristers from Harvard and Radcliffe, who are well known in the neighborhood of Boston, and occasionally here, as accomplished interpreters of exceptionally exacting choral works, gave their hearers a rewarding opportunity last night to become acquainted with the dignity, pomp and proclamative color of some of the music composed by Giovanni Gabrieli, the remarkable organist at the Church of St. Mark in Venice from 1585 to 1612. These qualities were particularly notable in the opening "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino", from the second book of Gabrieli's "Symphoniae Sacrae, in which the voices and the chanting brass gave a vivid impression of the splendor of a major Venetian festival.

The other choral works on this list from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of the master who had composed for Venetian church and civic rituals three centuries ago were a Benedictus, dated 1597, for three choirs; "O Jesu mi dulcissime," Christmas music in a more intimate vein, dated 1615, and a resplendent "Jubilate Deo." Each of these choruses was prefaced by a short organ prelude, and the Boston Symphony's instrumentalists also played a high-spirited, elaborately wrought "Canzona per sonare a quattro."

Of the qualities of Gabrieli's music only a few hints can be given here; spacious complexity of structure and architectonic grandeur, combined with still communicative expressive significance, were among the most prominent first impressions. The first and last of the choruses, in particular, gave a striking musical illustration of the flavor and atmosphere of the time and the place of their composition. At times some of the subtler details of the choral scoring seemed to be obscured in the memorable brilliance and sonority of these two festal works, but this probably was due to the nature of the music itself, written for performance in unusually spacious surroundings, rather than to the well trained choruses or talented players of the trumpets, trombones and the tuba.

• • •

Mr. Woodworth then advanced about a century and three-quarters in history to present three excerpts from the now seldom remembered music written by Mozart for Masonic occasions. The finale from "Eine kleine Freimaurer Kantate" (K. 627) is straightforward, hearty music of distinctly Germanic flavor. The Radcliffe girls sang "Lasst Uns mit Geschlungen Händen," apparently written for a Ladies' Day in the Viennese lodge. The third, with H. M. Raine as the tenor soloist, was the finale from the cantata "Die Maurerfreude" (K. 471).

The first Harvard composer on the list was Walter Piston, whose setting of an Italian text from Lorenzo de' Medici's "Canti Carnascialeschi" for men's voices and brass had its first New York performance. His vocal scoring is well suited to the verbal rhythm, and ably suggests its varying expressive hues in an idiom that sometimes makes discreet use of dissonance with generally melodic results. The brass choir, which has some strikingly plangent measures, plays an important part in the interludes, forecasting the mood of the succeeding verse.

• • •

Despite the loss of orchestral color sustained in a performance with piano accompaniment, the epilogue from "Oedipus Rex" still impressed as dramatically potent music. F. C. Wing made the messenger's tragic announcement, and R. E. I. Strider was the Speaker. Both choruses did notable work in the effective excerpt from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom," written for these two groups and performed by them here a few years ago. Mr. Lawton's version of "Casey Jones" preserved its swing and essentially American savor; the piano accompaniment had its suggestions of machinery and rolling wheels. This was called upon for repetition.

The Harvard Glee Club, throughout the evening, observed high standards in choral technique, quality of tone, unity and expressive responsiveness, and deserved more extensive encomiums than are possible in a midnight review. Similar compliments could be bestowed upon the Radcliffe chorus, whose singing showed marked improvement as compared with its concert here in 1937. Messrs. Pison and Thompson both took bows—Mr. Stravinsky, however, busied with a performance of his music elsewhere in the city, could not acknowledge the applause for the finale of "Oedipus."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

Harvard Club Concert

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, at their joint concert last night in Town Hall, under the direction of Wallace Woodworth, presented an unusually elaborate program, the first half of which was devoted to works by Giovanni Gabrieli, the seventeenth century Italian composer. Although Gabrieli was one of the greatest musical geniuses of his time and the most important composer in the Venetian school, his compositions are virtually unknown today except to connoisseurs. It was therefore, a most praiseworthy effort on the part of the combined choruses to bring public attention to the remarkable creations of this unaccountably neglected genius.

Assisted by the brass choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and E. Power Biggs, organist, the choristers were heard in four of Gabrieli's works from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of 1597 and 1615. Each of these was preceded by an "Intonation" for organ by the same composer, who was for many years the organist at St. Mark's in Venice. These brief preludes served to establish the key of the choral numbers which they preceded on the program. A "canzona per sonare" played by the brasses completed the Gabrieli selections.

Gabrieli, who was the teacher of Heinrich Schuetz, Michael Praetorius and other celebrated composers of the time, had, as Reimann pointed out, a far weightier influence on the musical production of the first half of the seventeenth century than the famous Florentine monodists. His innovations in matters of form, harmonic modulations and the employment of repeated short phrases gave much of his music performed last night a strikingly modern effect.

The imaginative treatment of the antiphonal part-writing in Gabrieli's choral works presented, the richness of sonorities and the dynamic contrasts displayed in each of them, as well as the emotional impetus behind all of these extraordinary masterpieces made them uncommonly impressive. The powerful climaxes of "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino" and "Jubilate Deo" reached an almost unparalleled glory of sound, while the Benedictus for three choirs with its delicate echoings and unconventional coloring looked far into the musical future. But finest was the superb Nativity poem, "O Jesu Mi Dulcissima," with its strikingly modern employment of brief, reiterated phrases, its broad, solemn close, and surprisingly rich harmonic progressions.

The singers found the Gabrieli music more difficult to negotiate than the numbers of later origin on the lengthy list, and the tempi adopted were sometimes open to question. Surely the "Osanna" in the Benedictus should have gone at a brisker pace, and the first part of the whole more delicately set forth. But regardless of any such shortcomings there should be but gratitude for the opportunity granted to hear these magnificent examples of choral invention.

Mozart on Program

After them the three excerpts from Masonic works by Mozart seemed particularly tame affairs, and in fact, they were very weak examples. The choruses from Handel's "Semele" and "L'Allegro" were not much more rewarding. But with the "Carnival Song" for men's voices and brass, the excellent "Howl Ye" from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom" and the "Casey Jones" in the clever arrangement by Edward B. Lawton, the choral forces came into their own.

All three of these contemporary American items were written especially for one or both of the performing forces. Mr. Piston's setting of the verses by Lorenzo de Medici was new here and proved to be an original and fanciful addition to the literature.

The choral body did its best singing of the evening in these compositions and in the extremely difficult Epilogue from Stravinsky's "Oedopus Rex."

Here they were on sure ground emotionally and technically, giving each with a tonal solidity, carefully perfected ensemble and niceness of shading that did them great credit. The schedule was rounded out with the great fugal "Gum Sancto Spiriu" from Bach's Mass in B Minor.

H. M. Rainie was the tenor soloist in the finale from Mozart's "Die Maurerfreude," and R. E. L. Reiner was the Speaker, and F. C. Wing the Messenger in the Stravinsky contribution. N. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

CONCERT IS GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducts Boston Orchestra in Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works at Carnegie Hall

TWO SYMPHONIES HEARD

Centenary of Russian's Birth Marked by Playing of 'Fifth' —'Fourth' Presented

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final New York concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The hall was packed. After an overwhelming performance of overwhelming music —the finale of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony—there was an immense demonstration as the audience rose to its feet and stamped and cheered.

Thus the second of the Bostonians' concerts of the week recognized, as the first did, the Tchaikovsky centenary. Again Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, each represented by a symphony, made the program. For reasons of repertory Mr. Koussevitzky did not couple with Tchaikovsky's symphony the one of the same number by Beethoven. Beethoven's Fourth, not his Fifth, began the concert. This provided a grateful contrast, but if the two Fifth symphonies had been played yesterday, as the two Sixth symphonies were placed side by side Thursday night, there would have been a very interesting comparison, because Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, in their Fifth symphonies, have a common theme and a common expressive aim—the struggle of the individual against "fate," the rise of the spirit from the Slough of Despond to victory. Indeed, Tchaikovsky's finale is the one optimistic and victorious page to which one can turn in the list of his major symphonic compositions; and it is a magnificent movement, in a place where one is badly needed, since the Fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky is a curiously uneven creation.

Finale Follows Waltz

It is in fact somewhat typical of the composer, still in his formative period, that this noble finale, as grand in its form as in its spirit, should be placed, cheek by jowl, immediately after the tawdry and banal waltz which Tchaikovsky elects to use here in place of the classic scherzo. This latter movement is the main cause of the Fifth Symphony ranking as far as it does below the "Pathétique."

Yet again, there is such richness and there are such flashes of magnificently symphonic writing that this work may live as long as finer scores by Tchaikovsky, despite discrepancies. By "symphonic" we do not mean merely the carrying over, not only of the "fate" theme and other themes, from movement to movement—a procedure which seems to have astonished Ernest Newman and occasioned his remark that this is "a scheme that is certainly without a parallel in the history of the symphony." Shades of Beethoven's Ninth, Schumann's Second and Fourth, the anticipations of the same "scheme" as early as Beethoven's Second and Fifth symphonies, to say nothing of César Franck's, which came a year after Tchaikovsky's Fifth! The history of the cyclic symphonic form is a pretty old one.

"Symphonic" refers also to the resourcefulness in development displayed in Tchaikovsky opening and closing movements, and to many a pretty feat of thematic manipulation which serves him well. Enough! This Fifth symphony, too, is the symphony of a great genius, and there is no denying that fact, although the innocent public seems to have discovered it somewhat earlier than the more old-fashioned and pedantic school of criticism.

Orchestra "Triumphs"

Again Tchaikovsky, as well as Koussevitzky and the now unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra triumphed, because of the inherent qualities of the music they played, and the extraordinary brilliance and euphony of the playing. One need not have listened with unqualified agreement to everything the conductor did to make these remarks; Tchaikovsky's first movement, in particular, was subjected to a special "reading." Where there were opportunities for a retard or accelerando the conductor availed himself of them to the extent that the law allowed. The symphony is a gamut of moods; the tempi are not intended to be strict. The question remains as to what degree of rubato is advisable in performance.

Questions like these can be argued long after the concert is passed. In the main, in Beethoven's Symphony, read with a fine esprit and objectivity, and in the symphony which contains so much that is poor and so much more that is great, and all characteristic of Tchaikovsky—Dr. Koussevitzky directed superlative performances. They greatly affected the audience and brought a dramatic conclusion of the 1939-40 season in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

COLUMBIA CONCERTS CORPORATION of COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM announces

TOWN HALL Sunday Afternoon, April 7th, at 3 o'clock

FIRST AMERICAN APPEARANCE

MARION CORDA

The Distinguished Polish Singing-Actress
In Songs of Many Nations

WERNER BASS at the Piano

Tickets: 83c. to $2.20 (Steinway)

Division: Concert Management Arthur Judson, Inc.

TOWN HALL Monday Evening, April 8th, at 8:30 o'clock

ANTONIO BROSA
VIOLINIST

GEORGE REEVES at the Piano

Tickets: $2.20 to 83c. (Steinway)

Division: Concert Management Arthur Judson, Inc.

CARNEGIE HALL Sunday Evening, April 21st, at 8:30 o'clock

Only New York Recital This Season

SZIGETI

Assisted by BELA BARTOK, Composer-Pianist and a String Orchestra (New Friends of Music)
Conducted by FRITZ STIEDRY
Andor Farkas at the Baldwin
Tickets: $1.10 to $2.75

Division: Concert Management Arthur Judson, Inc.

THE NEW SCHOOL OF MUSIC
317 WEST 75th STREET
Directors
Gregory ASHMAN Rafael BRONSTEIN
Piano, Violin, Voice and Theory.
All orchestral instruments by members of N. Y. Philharmonic Orchestra.
Conducting and Orchestral Training
Fritz Mahler
MUSIC WORKSHOP FOR CHILDREN
Rhythm and Ear Training become Fun and Games. Age groups: 4-6; 7-9; 10-12.
$2 per month
Telephone TRafalgar 4-9359

GET BACK a continuing
YOUTHFUL FIGURE just a few weeks required
No Gym Individual
No Apparatus Private
No Classes Thorough
by NEALE ARDANE
Booklet on request (personally)
41 E. 42nd St. • VA 6-1547

CANZONA PER SONARE A QUATTRO
(From Canzoni per sonare con ogni sorte di stromenti, 1608)

INTONAZIONE PER ORGANO, TONO X
O JESU MI DULCISSIME
(From Symphoniae Sacrae, Liber Secundus, 1615)
For Double Chorus with Basso Continuo

INTONAZIONE PER ORGANO, TONO XI
JUBILATE DEO
(From Sacrae Symphoniae, 1597)
For Eight Voices and Instruments, with Basso Continuo

INTERMISSION

MASONIC MUSIC .... MOZART
Laut verkünde unsre Freude
(Final Chorus from "Eine Freimaurer Kantate," K. 623 (1791)
Lasst uns mit geschlungen Handen (1785)
Finale from Cantata: "Die Maurerfreude," K. 471 (1785)
(Tenor Solo: H. M. RANIE, '40)

THE RECORD SHOP
161 WEST 57th STREET
invites you to listen to several new musical achievements by VICTOR RECORDS

BEETHOVEN
Symphony No. 5
Toscanini—NBC Orchestra
M-640. $8.00

DEBUSSY
La Mer
Koussevitzky
Boston Symphony
M-643. $6.50

DEBUSSY
Nocturnes
Stokowski
Phila. Orchestra
M-630. $6.50

WAGNER—Three Famous Scenes
Flagstad and Melchior
M-644. $10.00

MAGNAMUSIC INC.
CIrcle 6-3939

MUSIC — RECORDS — RADIOS — PHONOGRAPHS

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 7 - 1940

MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

From Gabrieli to Casey Jones

HARVARD GLEE CLUB and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, concert last night at Town Hall with the assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's brass [illegible] E. Power Biggs, organist, in the following program:

Giovanni Gabrieli (1557-1612)....Processional and ceremonial music for voices, organ and bass, written for the Church of St. Mark in Venice
Mozart....................Masonic Music
Walter Piston....Carnival Song for Men's Voices and Brass (1938)
Handel....Choruses from "Semele" and "L'Allegro"
Stravinsky..Epilogue from "Oedipus Rex"
Randall Thompson....Howl Ye, from "The Peaceable Kingdom" (1935)
E. B. Lawton (arr. from American folk song)..............Casey Jones (1939)
Bach....Cum Sancto Spiritu, from Mass in B minor (with the assistance of former members of the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses).
Accompanists, William W. Austin, Ralph Renwick jr.

The student choristers from Harvard and Radcliffe, who are well known in the neighborhood of Boston, and occasionally here, as accomplished interpreters of exceptionally exacting choral works, gave their hearers a rewarding opportunity last night to become acquainted with the dignity, pomp and proclamative color of some of the music composed by Giovanni Gabrieli, the remarkable organist at the Church of St. Mark in Venice from 1585 to 1612. These qualities were particularly notable in the opening "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino", from the second book of Gabrieli's "Symphoniae Sacrae, in which the voices and the chanting brass gave a vivid impression of the splendor of a major Venetian festival.

The other choral works on this list from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of the master who had composed for Venetian church and civic rituals three centuries ago were a Benedictus, dated 1597, for three choirs; "O Jesu mi dulcissime," Christmas music in a more intimate vein, dated 1615, and a resplendent "Jubilate Deo." Each of these choruses was prefaced by a short organ prelude, and the Boston Symphony's instrumentalists also played a high-spirited, elaborately wrought "Canzona per sonare a quattro."

Of the qualities of Gabrieli's music only a few hints can be given here; spacious complexity of structure and architectonic grandeur, combined with still communicative expressive significance, were among the most prominent first impressions. The first and last of the choruses, in particular, gave a striking musical illustration of the flavor and atmosphere of the time and the place of their composition. At times some of the subtler details of the choral scoring seemed to be obscured in the memorable brilliance and sonority of these two festal works, but this probably was due to the nature of the music itself, written for performance in unusually spacious surroundings, rather than to the well trained choruses or talented players of the trumpets, trombones and the tuba.

* * *

Mr. Woodworth then advanced about a century and three-quarters in history to present three excerpts from the now seldom remembered music written by Mozart for Masonic occasions. The finale from "Eine kleine Freimaurer Kantate" (K. 627) is straightforward, hearty music of distinctly Germanic flavor. The Radcliffe girls sang "Lasst Uns mit Geschlungen Handen," apparently written for a Ladies' Day in the Viennese lodge. The third, with H. M. Raine as the tenor soloist, was the finale from the cantata "Die Maurerfreude" (K. 471).

The first Harvard composer on the list was Walter Piston, whose setting of an Italian text from Lorenzo de' Medici's "Canti Carnascialeschi" for men's voices and brass had its first New York performance. His vocal scoring is well suited to the verbal rhythm, and ably suggests its varying expressive hues in an idiom that sometimes makes discreet use of dissonance with generally melodic results. The brass choir, which has some strikingly plangent measures, plays an important part in the interludes, forecasting the mood of the succeeding verse.

* * *

Despite the loss of orchestral color sustained in a performance with piano accompaniment, the epilogue from "Oedipus Rex" still impressed as dramatically potent music. F. C. Wing made the messenger's tragic announcement, and R. E. I. Strider was the Speaker. Both choruses did notable work in the effective excerpt from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom," written for these two groups and performed by them here a few years ago. Mr. Lawton's version of "Casey Jones" preserved its swing and essentially American savor; the piano accompaniment had its suggestions of machinery and rolling wheels. This was called upon for repetition.

The Harvard Glee Club, throughout the evening, observed high standards in choral technique, quality of tone, unity and expressive responsiveness, and deserved more extensive encomiums than are possible in a midnight review. Similar compliments could be bestowed upon the Radcliffe chorus, whose singing showed marked improvement as compared with its concert here in 1937. Messrs. Pison and Thompson both took bows—Mr. Stravinsky, however, busied with a performance of his music elsewhere in the city, could not acknowledge the applause for the finale of "Oedipus."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

Harvard Club Concert

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, at their joint concert last night in Town Hall, under the direction of Wallace Woodworth, presented an unusually elaborate program, the first half of which was devoted to works by Giovanni Gabrieli, the seventeenth century Italian composer. Although Gabrieli was one of the greatest musical geniuses of his time and the most important composer in the Venetian school, his compositions are virtually unknown today except to connoisseurs. It was therefore, a most praiseworthy effort on the part of the combined choruses to bring public attention to the remarkable creations of this unaccountably neglected genius.

Assisted by the brass choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and E. Power Biggs, organist, the choristers were heard in four of Gabrieli's works from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of 1597 and 1615. Each of these was preceded by an "Intonation" for organ by the same composer, who was for many years the organist at St. Mark's in Venice. These brief preludes served to establish the key of the choral numbers which they preceded on the program. A "canzona per sonare" played by the brasses completed the Gabrieli selections.

Gabrieli, who was the teacher of Heinrich Schuetz, Michael Praetorius and other celebrated composers of the time, had, as Reimann pointed out, a far weightier influence on the musical production of the first half of the seventeenth century than the famous Florentine monodists. His innovations in matters of form, harmonic modulations and the employment of repeated short phrases gave much of his music performed last night a strikingly modern effect.

The imaginative treatment of the antiphonal part-writing in Gabrieli's choral works presented, the richness of sonorities and the dynamic contrasts displayed in each of them, as well as the emotional impetus behind all of these extraordinary masterpieces made them uncommonly impressive. The powerful climaxes of "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino" and "Jubilate Deo" reached an almost unparalleled glory of sound, while the Benedictus for three choirs with its delicate echoings and unconventional coloring looked far into the musical future. But finest was the superb Nativity poem, "O Jesu Mi Dulcissime," with its strikingly modern employment of brief, reiterated phrases, its broad, solemn close, and surprisingly rich harmonic progressions.

The singers found the Gabrieli music more difficult to negotiate than the numbers of later origin on the lengthy list, and the tempi adopted were sometimes open to question. Surely the "Osanna" in the Benedictus should have gone at a brisker pace, and the first part of the whole more delicately set forth. But regardless of any such shortcomings there should be but gratitude for the opportunity granted to hear these magnificent examples of choral invention.

Mozart on Program

After them the three excerpts from Masonic works by Mozart seemed particularly tame affairs, and in fact, they were very weak examples. The choruses from Handel's "Semele" and "L'Allegro" were not much more rewarding. But with the "Carnival Song" for men's voices and brass, the excellent "Howl Ye" from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom" and the "Casey Jones" in the clever arrangement by Edward B. Lawton, the choral forces came into their own.

All three of these contemporary American items were written especially for one or both of the performing forces. Mr. Piston's setting of the verses by Lorenzo de Medici was new here and proved to be an original and fanciful addition to the literature.

The choral body did its best singing of the evening in these compositions and in the extremely difficult Epilogue from Stravinsky's "Oedopus Rex."

Here they were on sure ground emotionally and technically, giving each with a tonal solidity, carefully perfected ensemble and niceness of shading that did them great credit. The schedule was rounded out with the great fugal "Gum Sancto Spiriu" from Bach's Mass in B Minor.

H. M. Rainie was the tenor soloist in the finale from Mozart's "Die Maurerfreude," and R. E. L. Reiner was the Speaker, and F. C. Wing the Messenger in the Stravinsky contribution. N. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

CONCERT IS GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducts Boston Orchestra in Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works at Carnegie Hall

TWO SYMPHONIES HEARD

Centenary of Russian's Birth Marked by Playing of 'Fifth' —'Fourth' Presented

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final New York concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The hall was packed. After an overwhelming performance of overwhelming music —the finale of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony—there was an immense demonstration as the audience rose to its feet and stamped and cheered.

Thus the second of the Bostonians' concerts of the week recognized, as the first did, the Tchaikovsky centenary. Again Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, each represented by a symphony, made the program. For reasons of repertory Mr. Koussevitzky did not couple with Tchaikovsky's symphony the one of the same number by Beethoven. Beethoven's Fourth, not his Fifth, began the concert. This provided a grateful contrast, but if the two Fifth symphonies had been played yesterday, as the two Sixth symphonies were placed side by side Thursday night, there would have been a very interesting comparison, because Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, in their Fifth symphonies, have a common theme and a common expressive aim—the struggle of the individual against "fate," the rise of the spirit from the Slough of Despond to victory. Indeed, Tchaikovsky's finale is the one optimistic and victorious page to which one can turn in the list of his major symphonic compositions; and it is a magnificent movement, in a place where one is badly needed, since the Fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky is a curiously uneven creation.

Finale Follows Waltz

It is in fact somewhat typical of the composer, still in his formative period, that this noble finale, as grand in its form as in its spirit, should be placed, cheek by jowl, immediately after the tawdry and banal waltz which Tchaikovsky elects to use here in place of the classic scherzo. This latter movement is the main cause of the Fifth Symphony ranking as far as it does below the "Pathétique."

Yet again, there is such richness and there are such flashes of magnificently symphonic writing that this work may live as long as finer scores by Tchaikovsky, despite discrepancies. By "symphonic" we do not mean merely the carrying over, not only of the "fate" theme and other themes, from movement to movement—a procedure which seems to have astonished Ernest Newman and occasioned his remark that this is "a scheme that is certainly without a parallel in the history of the symphony." Shades of Beethoven's Ninth, Schumann's Second and Fourth, the anticipations of the same "scheme" as early as Beethoven's Second and Fifth symphonies, to say nothing of César Franck's, which came a year after Tchaikovsky's Fifth! The history of the cyclic symphonic form is a pretty old one.

"Symphonic" refers also to the resourcefulness in development displayed in Tchaikovsky opening and closing movements, and to many a pretty feat of thematic manipulation which serves him well. Enough! This Fifth symphony, too, is the symphony of a great genius, and there is no denying that fact, although the innocent public seems to have discovered it somewhat earlier than the more old-fashioned and pedantic school of criticism.

Orchestra "Triumphs"

Again Tchaikovsky, as well as Koussevitzky and the now unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra triumphed, because of the inherent qualities of the music they played, and the extraordinary brilliance and euphony of the playing. One need not have listened with unqualified agreement to everything the conductor did to make these remarks; Tchaikovsky's first movement, in particular, was subjected to a special "reading." Where there were opportunities for a retard or accelerando the conductor availed himself of them to the extent that the law allowed. The symphony is a gamut of moods; the tempi are not intended to be strict. The question remains as to what degree of rubato is advisable in performance.

Questions like these can be argued long after the concert is passed. In the main, in Beethoven's Symphony, read with a fine esprit and objectivity, and in the symphony which contains so much that is poor and so much more that is great, and all characteristic of Tchaikovsky—Dr. Koussevitzky directed superlative performances. They greatly affected the audience and brought a dramatic conclusion of the 1939-40 season in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ARTISTS NBC SERVICE
GEORGE ENGLES MANAGING DIRECTOR

TOWN HALL Saturday Afternoon, APRIL 13th, at 3 o'clock

MARIE ZORN

PIANIST

In a program of music by

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH

(Steinway Piano)

Mme. Margaret Henke
Voice Physiologist
Teacher of the Italian Bel-Canto Art of Singing
A simplified system of Voice Training as crystallized from the latest developments of phonetical research.
610 Riverside Drive New York
Telephone: EDGECOMBE 4-2388

Carl Fischer's
COMPLETE MUSIC SERVICE
Record Players—Phonographs
Radio-Phonographs
Music Recordings of all Makes Recording Studios
Music of all Publishers
MAIL OR PHONE ORDERS INVITED
CARL FISCHER, Inc.
119 W. 57th St., NEW YORK
Call Circle 7-4575

CARNIVAL SONG......................................WALTER PISTON, '24
(For Men's Voices and Brass)
Written for the Harvard Glee Club, 1938
First performance in New York

TWO SECULAR CHORUSES...HANDEL
Hornpipe from "Semele," Act II:
"Now Love, that everlasting boy"
Finale couplet from "L'Allegro":
"These delights if thou canst give"

EPILOGUE from "OEDIPUS REX"..........................STRAVINSKY
(Bass Solo: F. WING, 3L)

HOWL YE from "THE PEACEABLE KINGDOM"
RANDALL THOMPSON, '20
Written for the Harvard Glee Club and
The Radcliffe Choral Society, 1935

CASEY JONES
American Folk Song, Arr. by EDWARD B. LAWTON, '34
Written for The Harvard Glee Club, 1939

CUM SANCTO SPIRITU from the Mass in B Minor..............BACH
With the assistance of former members of the Harvard-Radcliffe Choruses

•

Assistant Conductors
IRVING G. FINE
RICHARD R. FRENCH

Accompanists
WM. W. AUSTIN, 1G
RALPH RENWICK, JR. '42

Management: ANNA C. MOLYNEAUX
9 East 59th Street
New York, N. Y.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 7 - 1940

MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

From Gabrieli to Casey Jones

HARVARD GLEE CLUB and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, concert last night at Town Hall with the assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's brass choir and E. Power Biggs, organist, in the following program:

Giovanni Gabrieli (1557-1612)....Processional and ceremonial music for voices, organ and bass, written for the Church of St. Mark in Venice
Mozart........................Masonic Music
Walter Piston....Carnival Song for Men's Voices and Brass (1938)
Handel....Choruses from "Semele" and "L'Allegro"
Stravinsky..Epilogue from "Oedipus Rex"
Randall Thompson....Howl Ye, from "The Peaceable Kingdom" (1935)
E. B. Lawton (arr. from American folk song)............Casey Jones (1939)
Bach....Cum Sancto Spiritu, from Mass in B minor (with the assistance of former members of the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses).
Accompanists, William W. Austin, Ralph Renwick jr.

The student choristers from Harvard and Radcliffe, who are well known in the neighborhood of Boston, and occasionally here, as accomplished interpreters of exceptionally exacting choral works, gave their hearers a rewarding opportunity last night to become acquainted with the dignity, pomp and proclamative color of some of the music composed by Giovanni Gabrieli, the remarkable organist at the Church of St. Mark in Venice from 1585 to 1612. These qualities were particularly notable in the opening "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino", from the second book of Gabrieli's "Symphoniae Sacrae, in which the voices and the chanting brass gave a vivid impression of the splendor of a major Venetian festival.

The other choral works on this list from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of the master who had composed for Venetian church and civic rituals three centuries ago were a Benedictus, dated 1597, for three choirs; "O Jesu mi dulcissime," Christmas music in a more intimate vein, dated 1615, and a resplendent "Jubilate Deo." Each of these choruses was prefaced by a short organ prelude, and the Boston Symphony's instrumentalists also played a high-spirited, elaborately wrought "Canzona per sonare a quattro."

Of the qualities of Gabrieli's music only a few hints can be given here; spacious complexity of structure and architectonic grandeur, combined with still communicative expressive significance, were among the most prominent first impressions. The first and last of the choruses, in particular, gave a striking musical illustration of the flavor and atmosphere of the time and the place of their composition. At times some of the subtler details of the choral scoring seemed to be obscured in the memorable brilliance and sonority of these two festal works, but this probably was due to the nature of the music itself, written for performance in unusually spacious surroundings, rather than to the well trained choruses or talented players of the trumpets, trombones and the tuba.

• • •

Mr. Woodworth then advanced about a century and three-quarters in history to present three excerpts from the now seldom remembered music written by Mozart for Masonic occasions. The finale from "Eine kleine Freimaurer Kantate" (K. 627) is straightforward, hearty music of distinctly Germanic flavor. The Radcliffe girls sang "Lasst Uns mit Geschlungen Händen," apparently written for a Ladies' Day in the Viennese lodge. The third, with H. M. Raine as the tenor soloist, was the finale from the cantata "Die Maurerfreude" (K. 471).

The first Harvard composer on the list was Walter Piston, whose setting of an Italian text from Lorenzo de' Medici's "Canti Carnascialeschi" for men's voices and brass had its first New York performance. His vocal scoring is well suited to the verbal rhythm, and ably suggests its varying expressive hues in an idiom that sometimes makes discreet use of dissonance with generally melodic results. The brass choir, which has some strikingly plangent measures, plays an important part in the interludes, forecasting the mood of the succeeding verse.

• • •

Despite the loss of orchestral color sustained in a performance with piano accompaniment, the epilogue from "Oedipus Rex" still impressed as dramatically potent music. F. C. Wing made the messenger's tragic announcement, and R. E. I. Strider was the Speaker. Both choruses did notable work in the effective excerpt from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom," written for these two groups and performed by them here a few years ago. Mr. Lawton's version of "Casey Jones" preserved its swing and essentially American savor; the piano accompaniment had its suggestions of machinery and rolling wheels. This was called upon for repetition.

The Harvard Glee Club, throughout the evening, observed high standards in choral technique, quality of tone, unity and expresaive responsiveness, and deserved more extensive encomiums than are possible in a midnight review. Similar compliments could be bestowed upon the Radcliffe chorus, whose singing showed marked improvement as compared with its concert here in 1937. Messrs. Pison and Thompson both took bows—Mr. Stravinsky, however, busied with a performance of his music elsewhere in the city, could not acknowledge the applause for the finale of "Oedipus."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

Harvard Club Concert

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, at their joint concert last night in Town Hall, under the direction of Wallace Woodworth, presented an unusually elaborate program, the first half of which was devoted to works by Giovanni Gabrieli, the seventeenth century Italian composer. Although Gabrieli was one of the greatest musical geniuses of his time and the most important composer in the Venetian school, his compositions are virtually unknown today except to connoisseurs. It was therefore, a most praiseworthy effort on the part of the combined choruses to bring public attention to the remarkable creations of this unaccountably neglected genius.

Assisted by the brass choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and E. Power Biggs, organist, the choristers were heard in four of Gabrieli's works from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of 1597 and 1615. Each of these was preceded by an "Intonation" for organ by the same composer, who was for many years the organist at St. Mark's in Venice. These brief preludes served to establish the key of the choral numbers which they preceded on the program. A "canzona per sonare" played by the brasses completed the Gabrieli selections.

Gabrieli, who was the teacher of Heinrich Schuetz, Michael Praetorius and other celebrated composers of the time, had, as Reimann pointed out, a far weightier influence on the musical production of the first half of the seventeenth century than the famous Florentine monodists. His innovations in matters of form, harmonic modulations and the employment of repeated short phrases gave much of his music performed last night a strikingly modern effect.

The imaginative treatment of the antiphonal part-writing in Gabrieli's choral works presented, the richness of sonorities and the dynamic contrasts displayed in each of them, as well as the emotional impetus behind all of these extraordinary masterpieces made them uncommonly impressive. The powerful climaxes of "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino" and "Jubilate Deo" reached an almost unparalleled glory of sound, while the Benedictus for three choirs with its delicate echoings and unconventional coloring looked far into the musical future. But finest was the superb Nativity poem, "O Jesu Mi Dulcissime," with its strikingly modern employment of brief, reiterated phrases, its broad, solemn close, and surprisingly rich harmonic progressions.

The singers found the Gabrieli music more difficult to negotiate than the numbers of later origin on the lengthy list, and the tempi adopted were sometimes open to question. Surely the "Osanna" in the Benedictus should have gone at a brisker pace, and the first part of the whole more delicately set forth. But regardless of any such shortcomings there should be but gratitude for the opportunity granted to hear these magnificent examples of choral invention.

Mozart on Program

After them the three excerpts from Masonic works by Mozart seemed particularly tame affairs, and in fact, they were very weak examples. The choruses from Handel's "Semele" and "L'Allegro" were not much more rewarding. But with the "Carnival Song" for men's voices and brass, the excellent "Howl Ye" from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom" and the "Casey Jones" in the clever arrangement by Edward B. Lawton, the choral forces came into their own.

All three of these contemporary American items were written especially for one or both of the performing forces. Mr. Piston's setting of the verses by Lorenzo de Medici was new here and proved to be an original and fanciful addition to the literature.

The choral body did its best singing of the evening in these compositions and in the extremely difficult Epilogue from Stravinsky's "Oedopus Rex."

Here they were on sure ground emotionally and technically, giving each with a tonal solidity, carefully perfected ensemble and niceness of shading that did them great credit. The schedule was rounded out with the great fugal "Gum Sancto Spiriu" from Bach's Mass in B Minor.

H. M. Rainie was the tenor soloist in the finale from Mozart's "Die Maurerfreude," and R. E. L. Reiner was the Speaker, and F. C. Wing the Messenger in the Stravinsky contribution. N. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

CONCERT IS GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducts Boston Orchestra in Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works at Carnegie Hall

TWO SYMPHONIES HEARD

Centenary of Russian's Birth Marked by Playing of 'Fifth' —'Fourth' Presented

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final New York concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The hall was packed. After an overwhelming performance of overwhelming music —the finale of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony—there was an immense demonstration as the audience rose to its feet and stamped and cheered.

Thus the second of the Bostonians' concerts of the week recognized, as the first did, the Tchaikovsky centenary. Again Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, each represented by a symphony, made the program. For reasons of repertory Mr. Koussevitzky did not couple with Tchaikovsky's symphony the one of the same number by Beethoven. Beethoven's Fourth, not his Fifth, began the concert. This provided a grateful contrast, but if the two Fifth symphonies had been played yesterday, as the two Sixth symphonies were placed side by side Thursday night, there would have been a very interesting comparison, because Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, in their Fifth symphonies, have a common theme and a common expressive aim—the struggle of the individual against "fate," the rise of the spirit from the Slough of Despond to victory. Indeed, Tchaikovsky's finale is the one optimistic and victorious page to which one can turn in the list of his major symphonic compositions; and it is a magnificent movement, in a place where one is badly needed, since the Fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky is a curiously uneven creation.

Finale Follows Waltz

It is in fact somewhat typical of the composer, still in his formative period, that this noble finale, as grand in its form as in its spirit, should be placed, cheek by jowl, immediately after the tawdry and banal waltz which Tchaikovsky elects to use here in place of the classic scherzo. This latter movement is the main cause of the Fifth Symphony ranking as far as it does below the "Pathétique."

Yet again, there is such richness and there are such flashes of magnificently symphonic writing that this work may live as long as finer scores by Tchaikovsky, despite discrepancies. By "symphonic" we do not mean merely the carrying over, not only of the "fate" theme and other themes, from movement to movement—a procedure which seems to have astonished Ernest Newman and occasioned his remark that this is "a scheme that is certainly without a parallel in the history of the symphony." Shades of Beethoven's Ninth, Schumann's Second and Fourth, the anticipations of the same "scheme" as early as Beethoven's Second and Fifth symphonies, to say nothing of César Franck's, which came a year after Tchaikovsky's Fifth! The history of the cyclic symphonic form is a pretty old one.

"Symphonic" refers also to the resourcefulness in development displayed in Tchaikovsky opening and closing movements, and to many a pretty feat of thematic manipulation which serves him well. Enough! This Fifth symphony, too, is the symphony of a great genius, and there is no denying that fact, although the innocent public seems to have discovered it somewhat earlier than the more old-fashioned and pedantic school of criticism.

Orchestra "Triumphs"

Again Tchaikovsky, as well as Koussevitzky and the now unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra triumphed, because of the inherent qualities of the music they played, and the extraordinary brilliance and euphony of the playing. One need not have listened with unqualified agreement to everything the conductor did to make these remarks; Tchaikovsky's first movement, in particular, was subjected to a special "reading." Where there were opportunities for a retard or accelerando the conductor availed himself of them to the extent that the law allowed. The symphony is a gamut of moods; the tempi are not intended to be strict. The question remains as to what degree of rubato is advisable in performance.

Questions like these can be argued long after the concert is passed. In the main, in Beethoven's Symphony, read with a fine esprit and objectivity, and in the symphony which contains so much that is poor and so much more that is great, and all characteristic of Tchaikovsky—Dr. Koussevitzky directed superlative performances. They greatly affected the audience and brought a dramatic conclusion of the [illegible] season in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TOWN HALL Wednesday Evening, April 10th, at 8:30 o'clock

THE BACH CIRCLE OF NEW YORK

PROGRAM

Concerto Grosso No. 2 ....Händel
Cantata .... Graupner
Concerto for Harpsichord..............Haydn
Oratorio: "Jephte" ....Carissimi

ASSISTING ARTISTS: Viola Philo, Catherine Aspinall, Mary Louise Beltz, Frederick Loadwick, Norman Farrow, Yella Pessl, and BACH CIRCLE CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA, Robert Hufstader, Conductor.

Tickets (Tax Free) — $2.00, $1.50, $1.00, 75c., Boxes $15.
On sale at Box Office

Management: EDITH BEHRENS, 63 W. 56th St., Circle 6-9787

In Constant Black-Out

one hundred and fifty-three blind music students find enduring inspiration in the Lighthouse Music School. "The New Hope Program" for the blind now under way will increase facilities for teaching more of these earnest students who live in darkness.

Subscribe to

THE LIGHTHOUSE FUND CAMPAIGN
111 East 59th Street New York, N. Y.

TOWN HALL Saturday Evening, April 6th, at 8:45 o'clock

HARVARD GLEE CLUB
RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY

G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, Conductor

1st Half—GIOVANNI GABRIELI 2nd Half—MOZART, PISTON, THOMPSON, LAWTON, HANDEL, BACH

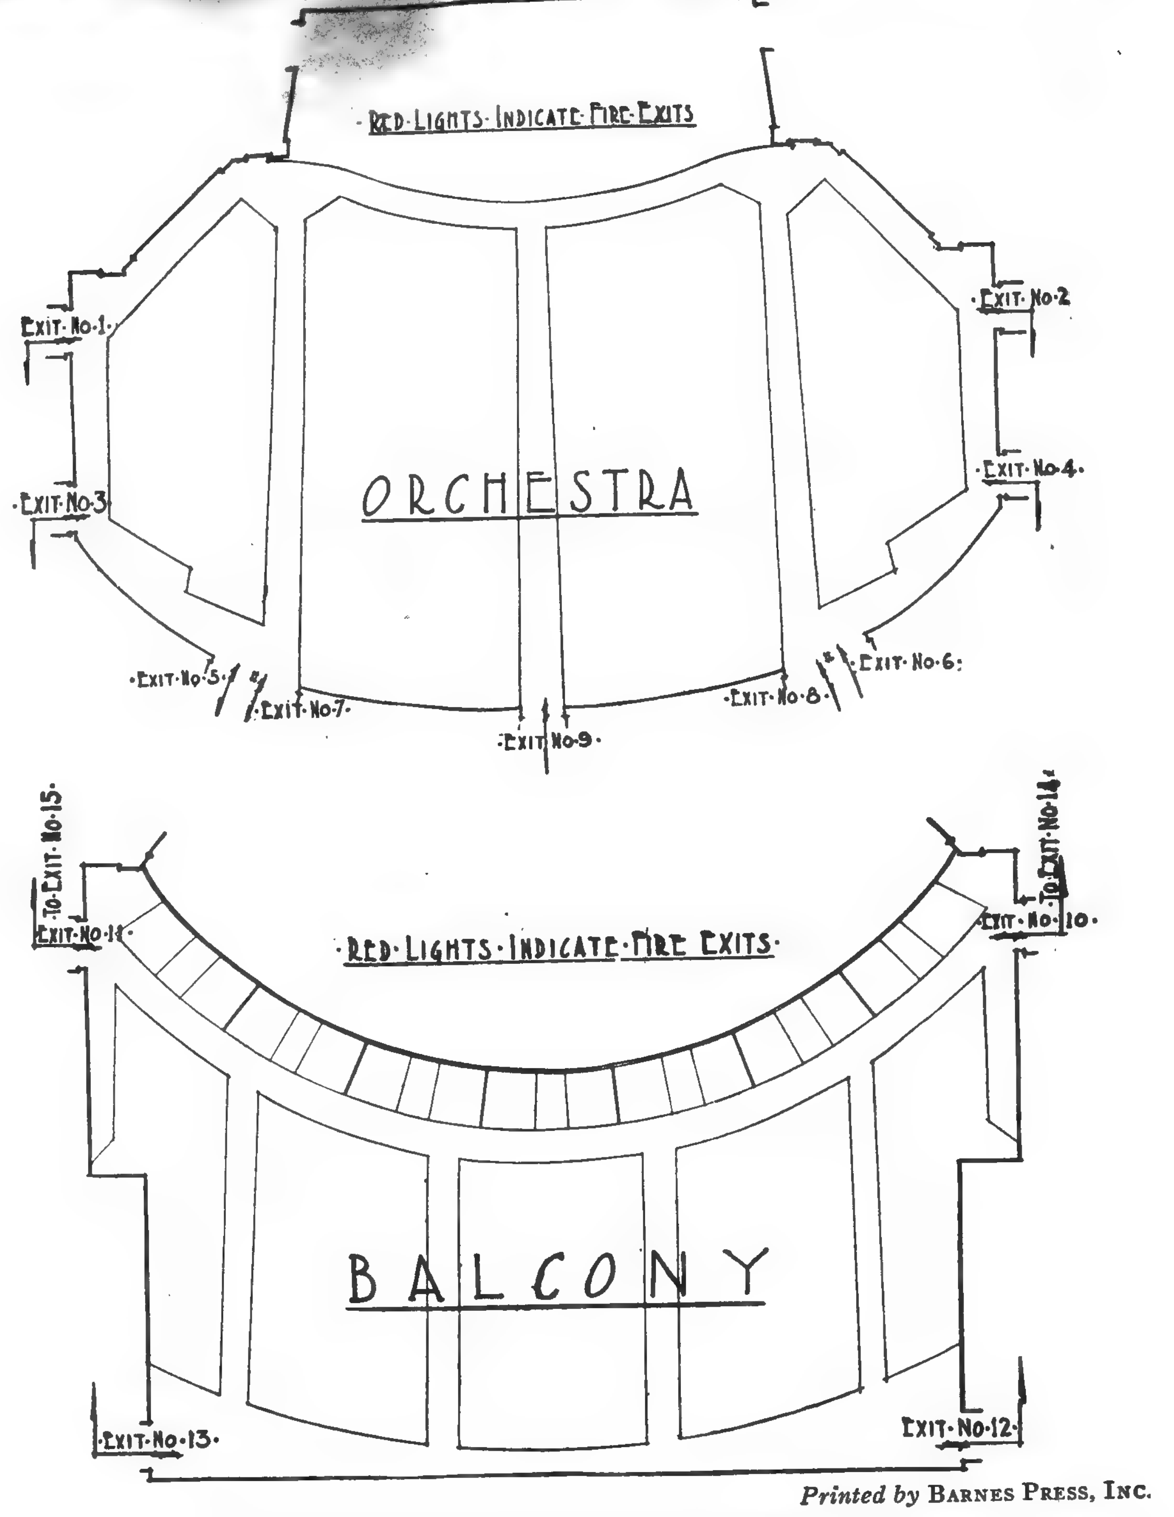
Tickets $1.00 to $2.50 at Town Hall



Printed by BARNES PRESS, INC.

INFORMATION FOR PATRONS OF TOWN HALL

TELEPHONES: In Ladies' Room on the mezzanine; In Men's Room off main lobby (street floor) near Exit 6.

LOST AND FOUND: At the Box Office.

SMOKING: Permitted only in the main lobby (street floor) during intermissions.

HEARING AIDS: Seatphones may be rented from the Box Office for limited number of equipped seats.

PHYSICIANS: and other patrons expecting 'phone calls may leave seat number with Box Office attendant.

BOX OFFICE: Open daily 10:00 a.m. to 9:00 p.m.; Sundays, 12 noon to 9:00 p,m, (to 5:30 p.m. only if no evening event scheduled).

For Information Regarding the Rental of Town Hall,
Address: KENNETH KLEIN, Director, Concert Department,
The Town Hall, Inc., 123 West 43rd Street

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 7 - 1940

MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

From Gabrieli to Casey Jones

HARVARD GLEE CLUB and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, concert last night at Town Hall with the assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's brass [illegible] E. Power Biggs, organist, in the following program:

Giovanni Gabrieli (1557-1612)....Processional and ceremonial music for voices, organ and bass, written for the Church of St. Mark in Venice
Mozart.........................Masonic Music
Walter Piston....Carnival Song for Men's Voices and Brass (1938)
Handel....Choruses from "Semele" and "L'Allegro"
Stravinsky..Epilogue from "Oedipus Rex"
Randall Thompson....Howl Ye, from "The Peaceable Kingdom" (1935)
E. B. Lawton (arr. from American folk song)..............Casey Jones (1939)
Bach....Cum Sancto Spiritu, from Mass in B minor (with the assistance of former members of the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses).
Accompanists, William W. Austin, Ralph Renwick jr.

The student choristers from Harvard and Radcliffe, who are well known in the neighborhood of Boston, and occasionally here, as accomplished interpreters of exceptionally exacting choral works, gave their hearers a rewarding opportunity last night to become acquainted with the dignity, pomp and proclamative color of some of the music composed by Giovanni Gabrieli, the remarkable organist at the Church of St. Mark in Venice from 1585 to 1612. These qualities were particularly notable in the opening "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino", from the second book of Gabrieli's "Symphoniae Sacrae, in which the voices and the chanting brass gave a vivid impression of the splendor of a major Venetian festival.

The other choral works on this list from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of the master who had composed for Venetian church and civic rituals three centuries ago were a Benedictus, dated 1597, for three choirs; "O Jesu mi dulcissime," Christmas music in a more intimate vein, dated 1615, and a resplendent "Jubilate Deo." Each of these choruses was prefaced by a short organ prelude, and the Boston Symphony's instrumentalists also played a high-spirited, elaborately wrought "Canzona per sonare a quattro."

Of the qualities of Gabrieli's music only a few hints can be given here; spacious complexity of structure and architectonic grandeur, combined with still communicative expressive significance, were among the most prominent first impressions. The first and last of the choruses, in particular, gave a striking musical illustration of the flavor and atmosphere of the time and the place of their composition. At times some of the subtler details of the choral scoring seemed to be obscured in the memorable brilliance and sonority of these two festal works, but this probably was due to the nature of the music itself, written for performance in unusually spacious surroundings, rather than to the well trained choruses or talented players of the trumpets, trombones and the tuba.

* * *

Mr. Woodworth then advanced about a century and three-quarters in history to present three excerpts from the now seldom remembered music written by Mozart for Masonic occasions. The finale from "Eine kleine Freimaurer Kantate" (K. 627) is straightforward, hearty music of distinctly Germanic flavor. The Radcliffe girls sang "Lasst Uns mit Geschlungen Handen," apparently written for a Ladies' Day in the Viennese lodge. The third, with H. M. Raine as the tenor soloist, was the finale from the cantata "Die Maurerfreude" (K. 471).

The first Harvard composer on the list was Walter Piston, whose setting of an Italian text from Lorenzo de' Medici's "Canti Carnascialeschi" for men's voices and brass had its first New York performance. His vocal scoring is well suited to the verbal rhythm, and ably suggests its varying expressive hues in an idiom that sometimes makes discreet use of dissonance with generally melodic results. The brass choir, which has some strikingly plangent measures, plays an important part in the interludes, forecasting the mood of the succeeding verse.

* * *

Despite the loss of orchestral color sustained in a performance with piano accompaniment, the epilogue from "Oedipus Rex" still impressed as dramatically potent music. F. C. Wing made the messenger's tragic announcement, and R. E. I. Strider was the Speaker. Both choruses did notable work in the effective excerpt from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom," written for these two groups and performed by them here a few years ago. Mr. Lawton's version of "Casey Jones" preserved its swing and essentially American savor; the piano accompaniment had its suggestions of machinery and rolling wheels. This was called upon for repetition.

The Harvard Glee Club, throughout the evening, observed high standards in choral technique, quality of tone, unity and expressive responsiveness, and deserved more extensive encomiums than are possible in a midnight review. Similar compliments could be bestowed upon the Radcliffe chorus, whose singing showed marked improvement as compared with its concert here in 1937. Messrs. Pison and Thompson both took bows—Mr. Stravinsky, however, busied with a performance of his music elsewhere in the city, could not acknowledge the applause for the finale of "Oedipus."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

Harvard Club Concert

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, at their joint concert last night in Town Hall, under the direction of Wallace Woodworth, presented an unusually elaborate program, the first half of which was devoted to works by Giovanni Gabrieli, the seventeenth century Italian composer. Although Gabrieli was one of the greatest musical geniuses of his time and the most important composer in the Venetian school, his compositions are virtually unknown today except to connoisseurs. It was therefore, a most praiseworthy effort on the part of the combined choruses to bring public attention to the remarkable creations of this [illegible]countably neglected genius.

Assisted by the brass choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and E. Pow[illegible]iggs, organist, the choristers were heard in four of Gabrieli's works from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of 1597 and 1615. Each of these was preceded by an "Intonation" for organ by the same composer, who was for many years the organist at St. Mark's in Venice. These brief preludes served to establish the key of the choral numbers which they preceded on the program. A "canzona per sonare" played by the brasses completed the Gabrieli selections.

Gabrieli, who was the teacher of Heinrich Schuetz, Michael Praetorius and other celebrated composers of the time, had, as Reimann pointed out, a far weightier influence on the musical production of the first half of the seventeenth century than the famous Florentine monodists. His innovations in matters of form, harmonic modulations and the employment of repeated short phrases gave much of his music performed last night a strikingly modern effect.

The imaginative treatment of the antiphonal part-writing in Gabrieli's choral works presented, the richness of sonorities and the dynamic contrasts displayed in each of them, as well as the emotional impetus behind all of these extraordinary masterpieces made them uncommonly impressive. The powerful climaxes of "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino" and "Jubilate Deo" reached an almost unparalleled glory of sound, while the Benedictus for three choirs with its delicate echoings and unconventional coloring looked far into the musical future. But finest was the superb Nativity poem, "O Jesu Mi Dulcissime," with its strikingly modern employment of brief, reiterated phrases, its broad, solemn close, and surprisingly rich harmonic progressions.

The singers found the Gabrieli music more difficult to negotiate than the numbers of later origin on the lengthy list, and the tempi adopted were sometimes open to question. Surely the "Osanna" in the Benedictus should have gone at a brisker pace, and the first part of the whole more delicately set forth. But regardless of any such shortcomings there should be but gratitude for the opportunity granted to hear these magnificent examples of choral invention.

Mozart on Program

After them the three excerpts from Masonic works by Mozart seemed particularly tame affairs, and in fact, they were very weak examples. The choruses from Handel's "Semele" and "L'Allegro" were not much more rewarding. But with the "Carnival Song" for men's voices and brass, the excellent "Howl Ye" from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom" and the "Casey Jones" in the clever arrangement by Edward B. Lawton, the choral forces came into their own.

All three of these contemporary American items were written especially for one or both of the performing forces. Mr. Piston's setting of the verses by Lorenzo de Medici was new here and proved to be an original and fanciful addition to the literature.

The choral body did its best singing of the evening in these compositions and in the extremely difficult Epilogue from Stravinsky's "Oedopus Rex."

Here they were on sure ground emotionally and technically, giving each with a tonal solidity, carefully perfected ensemble and niceness of shading that did them great credit. The schedule was rounded out with the great fugal "Gum Sancto Spiriu" from Bach's Mass in B Minor.

H. M. Rainie was the tenor soloist in the finale from Mozart's "Die Maurerfreude," and R. E. L. Reiner was the Speaker, and F. C. Wing the Messenger in the Stravinsky contribution. N. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 - 1940

CONCERT IS GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducts Boston Orchestra in Beethoven and Tchaikovsky Works at Carnegie Hall

TWO SYMPHONIES HEARD

Centenary of Russian's Birth Marked by Playing of 'Fifth' —'Fourth' Presented

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final New York concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The hall was packed. After an overwhelming performance of overwhelming music —the finale of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony—there was an immense demonstration as the audience rose to its feet and stamped and cheered.

Thus the second of the Bostonians' concerts of the week recognized, as the first did, the Tchaikovsky centenary. Again Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, each represented by a symphony, made the program. For reasons of repertory Mr. Koussevitzky did not couple with Tchaikovsky's symphony the one of the same number by Beethoven. Beethoven's Fourth, not his Fifth, began the concert. This provided a grateful contrast, but if the two Fifth symphonies had been played yesterday, as the two Sixth symphonies were placed side by side Thursday night, there would have been a very interesting comparison, because Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, in their Fifth symphonies, have a common theme and a common expressive aim—the struggle of the individual against "fate," the rise of the spirit from the Slough of Despond to victory. Indeed, Tchaikovsky's finale is the one optimistic and victorious page to which one can turn in the list of his major symphonic compositions; and it is a magnificent movement, in a place where one is badly needed, since the Fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky is a curiously uneven creation.

Finale Follows Waltz

It is in fact somewhat typical of the composer, still in his formative period, that this noble finale, as grand in its form as in its spirit, should be placed, cheek by jowl, immediately after the tawdry and banal waltz which Tchaikovsky elects to use here in place of the classic scherzo. This latter movement is the main cause of the Fifth Symphony ranking as far as it does below the "Pathétique."

Yet again, there is such richness and there are such flashes of magnificently symphonic writing that this work may live as long as finer scores by Tchaikovsky, despite discrepancies. By "symphonic" we do not mean merely the carrying over, not only of the "fate" theme and other themes, from movement to movement—a procedure which seems to have astonished Ernest Newman and occasioned his remark that this is "a scheme that is certainly without a parallel in the history of the symphony." Shades of Beethoven's Ninth, Schumann's Second and Fourth, the anticipations of the same "scheme" as early as Beethoven's Second and Fifth symphonies, to say nothing of César Franck's, which came a year after Tchaikovsky's Fifth! The history of the cyclic symphonic form is a pretty old one.

"Symphonic" refers also to the resourcefulness in development displayed in Tchaikovsky opening and closing movements, and to many a pretty feat of thematic manipulation which serves him well. Enough! This Fifth symphony, too, is the symphony of a great genius, and there is no denying that fact, although the innocent public seems to have discovered it somewhat earlier than the more old-fashioned and pedantic school of criticism.

Orchestra "Triumphs"

Again Tchaikovsky, as well as Koussevitzky and the now unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra triumphed, because of the inherent qualities of the music they played, and the extraordinary brilliance and euphony of the playing. One need not have listened with unqualified agreement to everything the conductor did to make these remarks; Tchaikovsky's first movement, in particular, was subjected to a special "reading." Where there were opportunities for a retard or accelerando the conductor availed himself of them to the extent that the law allowed. The symphony is a gamut of moods; the tempi are not intended to be strict. The question remains as to what degree of rubato is advisable in performance.

Questions like these can be argued long after the concert is passed. In the main, in Beethoven's Symphony, read with a fine esprit and objectivity, and in the symphony which contains so much that is poor and so much more that is great, and all characteristic of Tchaikovsky—Dr. Koussevitzky directed superlative performances. They greatly affected the audience and brought a dramatic [illegible] of the 1939-40 [illegible] in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Creation" and Bach Mass; Choral Technique Expounded

Herald

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS April 7

This is customarily the time for choral activity in concert halls, and comment on it is especially apropos this year because of the publication of Dr. Archibald T. Davison's book, "Choral Conducting" (Harvard University Press; $2). One of the most interesting of the regular choral events here is already behind us, namely the Harvard-Radcliffe concert in March. Those of us who attended it will recall with pleasure the remarkable and rarely heard music of Giovanni Gabrieli, which was revived for the occasion, as well as the entertaining modern works.

It is necessary to emphasize the pleasure afforded by a good choral concert, because there is a most unreasonable prejudice in the mind of a large part of the public against concerts where choruses participate. When one is scheduled on a Boston Symphony program, many sighs of complaint are to be heard and many subscribers dispose of their tickets. We do not suggest that the fault lies wholly with the obtuseness of people facing—to them—an unusual form of music. There has undoubtedly been a good deal of poor and dispirited choral singing in the past to account for this hostile attitude.

At the same time it is well for the public to be reminded that some of the greatest of all music has been written inthis medium, so that to pass it by is to deny oneself a stimulating artistic experience. For example, on April 15 and April 21, respectively, there will be given in Symphony Hall two masterpieces involving a chorus. On the former date the Handel and Haydn Society will offer Haydn's "Creation," and on the latter the Boston Symphony, with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Chorus, will present in two sessions Bach's B minor Mass. Bach's tremendous work needs no introduction in these columns, for it has been heard enough under the same auspices to attract an audience. The modern taste for Bach also makes this long score a greater magnet than Beethoven's Mass.

Such are the twists of artistic fashion that Haydn's "Creation" is probably unfamiliar to the general public, though it has had performances here and there. Modern productions, however, are apt to be grievously cut, which does not do justice to Haydn's conception. We have not been told what the Handel and Haydn Society proposes to do about this problem, but at least we shall have a chance to hear a good chorus in some of the music. The best introduction for an intelligent hearing of "The Creation," by the way, is the long essay by Sir Donald Tovey in the fifth volume of his musical analyses. The only trouble with reading him is that his is such counsel of perfection that any approximation of the ideal will inevitably disappoint the hopes he has raised.

DR. DAVISON

We referred at the beginning of this article to Dr. Davison's little volume on choral conducting. As everyone knows or ought to know, Dr. Davison caused a real revolution in taste by his manner of dealing with college glee clubs and his views of what they ought to sing. Mr. Deems Taylor in his recent book, "The Well-Tempered Listener," has some amusing recollections of what glee club concerts were like when he was in college and not so long ago at that. Dr. Davison, in a relatively small span of years, swept all the trash of such programs away and had his chorus at Harvard singing with the Boston Symphony music from Bach to Stravinsky and in other concerts material from the 17th and 16th centuries.

He does not refer much to this extraordinary revolutionary feat in his book, however, since he is mainly interested in setting down his opinions about how to train a chorus. He says a number of things which will come as a shock to old-fashioned choral conductors. For instance, he likes young singers better than older ones with more experience. He does not find that sight-reading is much of a help in training a chorus and in many cases is actually a nuisance. Any critic and critics are notoriously at sea when writing about choral concerts—will find this volume very useful in re-orienting the loose ideas on the subject picked up merely by attending such events. Even more useful will it be to a man, usually an organist, who suddenly finds himself with a chorus to rehearse for public performance or even private enjoyment. Dr. Davison makes his points clearly and with humor. A much longer book on the same subject may also be recommended at this time. "The Art of the Choral Conductor," by William J. Finn. It is not as agreeable reading as Dr. Davison's, but it rather conservatively comes to most of the same conclusions.

ROCKEFELLER AID TO MUSIC CENTER

Times April 8

Foundation Grants $60,000 to Berkshire Festival Group for School Project

The Rockefeller Foundation has made a grant of $60,000 to the Berkshire Music Center for use during the next two years, it was announced yesterday in a report of the foundation's activities for 1939. The center will open a Summer music school on July 8 at Tanglewood, the home of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass.

The sum of $10,000 of the grant is available for physical improvements. The remaining $50,000 will make it possible during the Summer sessions of 1940 and 1941, according to the announcement, "to provide the finest instruction at relatively low cost to the student body."

The report added:

"In 1939 the foundation stepped outside its usual program in the humanities to make a contribution toward a project which it is hoped will have an important influence on the development of music in America. In the familiar setting of the annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival in Massachusetts, there is to be established in 1940 a center for musical education under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

The foundation grant was made because the center will offer six weeks of "living and working in music" in association with Dr. Koussevitzky and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will help provide equipment for the conduct of the school in all its branches with a student body of 300.

There are three buildings on the estate, known as Tanglewood, that can be remodeled for assembly, rehearsals and classes. The grant will also be sufficient to permit the construction of a practicable unit for a small theatre, which will be used for school rehearsals and chamber concerts and which will permit stage presentations by the class in opera dramatics.

The center will continue its work from July 8 to Aug. 18. During the first three weeks in August the annual festival will be held in the music shed at Tanglewood.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 7 - 1940

Koussevitzky Gives Season's Final Concert

Boston Orchestra Heard in 4thBeethovenSymphony and Tchaikovsky's Fifth

Serge Koussevitsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall in the last concert of the fifty-fourth season of its visits to New York, and was called upon for several farewell bows by a cheering audience which had been stirred by an exceptional performance of Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony. Another symphony, the fourth of Beethoven, occupied the first half of the program.

As on Thursday night, when the Bostonians had played the sixth symphonies of both of these composers Dr. Koussevitzky's list consisted of music which has had several performances under his direction in this auditorium, and many interpretations by resident and other visiting organizations. Despite its familiarity, however, it was well chosen from the point of view of contrast. The Beethoven symphony was admirably executed, apart from a pair of brief lapses in the horn choir, with notable finesse of dynamic shading and clarity of detail the variety and range of its expressive atmosphere were also persuasively revealed.

The technical and interpretative qualities which have long given this orchestra standing as one of the foremost organizations of its kind in the Americas were, however. most strikingly revealed in the performance of Tchaikovsky's symphony in E minor. Dr. Koussevitzky, who is commemorating the centenary of the composer's birth in these two concerts, as well as in Boston later this spring, and next summer in the Berkshire Festival, is renowned for his particularly penetrating insight into Tchaikovsky's music, his ability to reveal its complete emotional content. But there were undoubtedly other members of yesterday's capacity gathering, in addition to the writer, who faced the prospects of another hearing of this hard-worked symphony with resignation rather than with fond anticipation.

And yet not many measures had been played before many who were so minded found themselves listening with fresh attention to one of the most memorable interpretations which this work has received in twenty years. Even while noting some rather overwrought changes of pace in the first movement, one could count such impressions as unimportant in comparison with the expressive force of the interpretation as a whole, the superb work of the orchestra and its instant responsiveness to its inspired director.

Obviously, Dr. Koussevitzky did not regard the symphony as a time-honored member of the standard repertoire, but as music to which he was intently devoted and whose full significance he was eager to convey to his orchestra's hearers. In this he was entirely successful, and his ability to cause his hearers to listen to this familiar music and relish its melodic fertility, its many-hued scoring and its unabashed emotionalism in the manner of a new artistic experience was, with the virtuosity of his musicians, one of the major factors in bringing about an unusually memorable result.

Under the same conductor, the Boston Symphony will return next season for its usual quota of five evening and five afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, beginning Nov. 21 and 23.

F. D. P.

Music Center in Berkshires Awarded $60,000

Globe April 8

Rockefeller Foundation Makes Grant to Help Organize Summer School

The Rockefeller Foundation, in a report of its activities for the year 1939, makes the first public announcement of a substantial grant to assist in establishing a Summer music school, to be known as the Berkshire Music Center.

The grant is a notable recognition of the ambitious project of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"In 1939," the report states, "the foundation stepped outside its usual program in the humanities to make a contribution toward a project which it is hoped will have an important influence on the development of music in America. In the familiar setting of the annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival in Massachusetts there is to be established in 1940 a center for musical education under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Sixty thousand dollars has been allocated to the Music Center for use during the next two years, of which $10,000 is available for physical improvements. The grant will also be sufficient to permit the construction of a practicable unit for a small theatre, which will be used for school rehearsals and chamber concerts and can permit stage presentations by the class in opera dramatics.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

APR 8 - 1940

MUSIC

Home-Grown Composer

Half a century ago, when frail, poetic Edward MacDowell was No. 1 U. S. composer, the models for high-brow music were Brahms, Grieg, Wagner. Just before World War I, Kulturbolschewiks Arnold Schönberg and Igor Stravinsky (TIME, March 11) led a revolution against musical romanticism. When the revolution was over, U. S. composers still found themselves writing European music. Such U. S. composers as Aaron Copland and John Alden Carpenter tried to go native by using jazz tunes, but only the tunes were American. The musical grammar and syntax still sounded like Brahms or Stravinsky. Today there is still probably no high-brow U. S. music that can be identified as such in a blindfold test.

ROY HARRIS
If not pure U. S., at least pure Harris.

If any U. S. composer can attain an authentically U. S. symphonic style, a spare, gangling, twangy Oklahoman named Roy Harris may well be the man. Born in a log cabin, Roy Harris is as independent as a Panhandle cowhand, as dryly American as the Dust Bowl where he spent his early childhood. When, in 1926, he appeared in Eastern concert halls with an awkward, homemade symphonic piece under his arm, critics took one look and decided that here was music's own Joaquin Miller. Sent to Paris to study with famed Teacher Nadia Boulanger (TIME, Feb. 28, 1938), Composer Harris showed for a time the influences of the French modernists who sat at Mlle Boulanger's feet. But Harris soon got over these pretty Parisian tricks, and went on composing in his own way.

Most of Harris' music has been experimental, patchy and gaunt. But unlike many a contemporary composer, he has gone on correcting his past mistakes, improving his tools, getting his music clearer & clearer. Last year, after groping steadily upward on a rickety ladder of complex, dry, carpentered scores (Symphony 1933, When Johnny Comes Marching Home, Song for Occupations, etc.), Harris really hit his stride with a Third Symphony. No sooner was it finished than Boston's pompous Sergei Koussevitzky rushed to give it a première. No sooner had Koussevitzky played it than excitable Maestro Arturo Toscanini (who conducts few U. S. compositions) asked a chance to broadcast it with his NBC Orchestra. Last month (TIME, April 1) Victor recorded it.

By last week, when solemn, plodding Hans Lange gave Chicagoans a chance to hear it with the Chicago Symphony, Harris' Third Symphony had become the most talked-about U. S. composition in a decade. Said Koussevitzky: "This is the first truly great symphonic work to be written in America." Chicago critics, admiring its lean economy, lack of bombast and its forthright poetic atmosphere, wrote that "something of the crudeness and strength of pioneer America has crept into this new symphony," found it "as completely outside European experience as the prairie morning itself." To more cautious listeners it was not so much pure U. S. music as pure Harris.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES

APR 5 - 1940

Secret of Roy Harris' long pull to success is his uncompromising individualism. He was 25 before he ever got a lesson in musical composition. Like Abraham Lincoln, on whose birthday he was born, he got his education the hard way, all by himself. In 1918, when he was mustered out of the Army, he drove a truck for a living, delivering 3,000 lb. of butter and 300 dozen eggs a day around Los Angeles.

Says Roy Harris: "If we create an indigenous music worthy of our people, it will make its way swiftly and unfalteringly. . . . Whether it be a little more or less 'dissonant' or 'original' is of small import—but it must have the pulsing life stuff in it—creative urge and necessity of continuity. It cannot be a scholarly mosaic of all the materials and forms of the last 200 European years. . . ."

April 7

Boston Orchestra

Mit dem Carnegie Hall=Konzert am geſtrigen Nachmittag beendete Serge Kouſſevitzky die New Yorker Spielzeit 1939/40 des Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra, das hier in dieſem Winter wiederum je fünf Konzerte an Donnerstagabenden und Samstagnachmittagen gegeben hat. Wie das letzte Abendprogramm ſo wurde auch das geſtrige von Symphonien Beethovens und Tſchaikowſkys ausgefüllt, diesmal von der vierten des deutſchen und der fünften des ruſſiſchen Meiſters.

Kouſſevitzkys werktreue und lebendige Wiedergabe der Schöpfungen dieſer beiden Tondichter iſt hier ſchon eingehend gewürdigt worden, und er erübrigt ſich deshalb, erneut über die geſtrige Aufführung zu berichten. Zudem war das Programm wie auch das am vergangenen Donnerstag eigentlich nicht typiſch für Kouſſevitzky, der bekannten Werken gewöhnlich nicht den größten Teil ſeines Spielplans einräumt. Die vergangene Spielzeit der Boſtoner Muſiker machte uns wiederum mit einer Reihe mehr oder weniger hörenswerten neuen Werke bekannt: mit dem Violinkonzert von Erneſt Bloch, deſſen Solopart Joſeph Szigeti feſſelnd deutete; mit einer neuen Symphonie, der dritten, von Howard Hanſon, einem Violinkonzert von Edward Burlinghame Hill (Soliſtin: Ruth Poſſelt), einem Konzert für das gleiche Inſtrument von Prokofieff, das Heifetz als Soliſten hatte, einem Cello=Konzert des gleichen ruſſiſchen Komponiſten, deſſen Solopart ſein Landsmann Gregor Piatigorſky ſpielte, ſowie mit der „American Feſtival Overtüre" von William Schuman.

Nicht alles, was Kouſſevitzky uns da an Neuem beſcherte, war von gleichem Wert, aber er zeigte doch, daß es mit zeitgenöſſiſchen Tonſchöpfungen nicht ſo ſchlecht beſtellt iſt, wie die konſervativen Programme anderer Dirigenten uns glauben machen wollen. Außerdem wiederholten die Boſtoner hier auch eine ſtattliche Reihe bereits bekannter aber nur ganz ſelten gehörter Kompoſitionen, darunter vor allem amerikaniſche Werke, dann aber auch z. B. die Symphonie „Mathis der Maler" von Hindemith, die 2. Symphonie von d'Indy und Faurés „Pelleas et Meliſande"=Suite. Die Spielzeit zeigte wiederum, daß Kouſſevitzky nicht nur ein Dirigent ſondern auch ein Programmgeſtalter erſten Ranges iſt.

H. St.

"Creation" and Bach Mass; Choral Technique Expounded

Herald

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS April 7

This is customarily the time for choral activity in concert halls, and comment on it is especially apropos this year because of the publication of Dr. Archibald T. Davison's book, "Choral Conducting" (Harvard University Press; $2). One of the most interesting of the regular choral events here is already behind us, namely the Harvard-Radcliffe concert in March. Those of us who attended it will recall with pleasure the remarkable and rarely heard music of Giovanni Gabrieli, which was revived for the occasion, as well as the entertaining modern works.

It is necessary to emphasize the pleasure afforded by a good choral concert, because there is a most unreasonable prejudice in the mind of a large part of the public against concerts where choruses participate. When one is scheduled on a Boston Symphony program, many sighs of complaint are to be heard and many subscribers dispose of their tickets. We do not suggest that the fault lies wholly with the obtuseness of people facing—to them—an unusual form of music. There has undoubtedly been a good deal of poor and dispirited choral singing in the past to account for this hostile attitude.

At the same time it is well for the public to be reminded that some of the greatest of all music has been written inthis medium, so that to pass it by is to deny oneself a stimulating artistic experience. For example, on April 15 and April 21, respectively, there will be given in Symphony Hall two masterpieces involving a chorus. On the former date the Handel and Haydn Society will offer Haydn's "Creation," and on the latter the Boston Symphony, with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Chorus, will present in two sessions Bach's B minor Mass. Bach's tremendous work needs no introduction in these columns, for it has been heard enough under the same auspices to attract an audience. The modern taste for Bach also makes this long score a greater magnet than Beethoven's Mass.

Such are the twists of artistic fashion that Haydn's "Creation" is probably unfamiliar to the general public, though it has had performances here and there. Modern productions, however, are apt to be grievously cut, which does not do justice to Haydn's conception. We have not been told what the Handel and Haydn Society proposes to do about this problem, but at least we shall have a chance to hear a good chorus in some of the music. The best introduction for an intelligent hearing of "The Creation," by the way, is the long essay by Sir Donald Tovey in the fifth volume of his musical analyses. The only trouble with reading him is that his is such counsel of perfection that any approximation of the ideal will inevitably disappoint the hopes he has raised.

DR. DAVISON

We referred at the beginning of this article to Dr. Davison's little volume on choral conducting. As everyone knows or ought to know, Dr. Davison caused a real revolution in taste by his manner of dealing with college glee clubs and his views of what they ought to sing. Mr. Deems Taylor in his recent book, "The Well-Tempered Listener," has some amusing recollections of what glee club concerts were like when he was in college and not so long ago at that. Dr. Davison, in a relatively small span of years, swept all the trash of such programs away and had his chorus at Harvard singing with the Boston Symphony music from Bach to Stravinsky and in other concerts material from the 17th and 16th centuries.

He does not refer much to this extraordinary revolutionary feat in his book, however, since he is mainly interested in setting down his opinions about how to train a chorus. He says a number of things which will come as a shock to old-fashioned choral conductors. For instance, he likes young singers better than older ones with more experience. He does not find that sight-reading is much of a help in training a chorus and in many cases is actually a nuisance. Any critic and critics are notoriously at sea when writing about choral concerts—will find this volume very useful in re-orienting the loose ideas on the subject picked up merely by attending such events. Even more useful will it be to a man, usually an organist, who suddenly finds himself with a chorus to rehearse for public performance or even private enjoyment. Dr. Davison makes his points clearly and with humor. A much longer book on the same subject may also be recommended at this time. "The Art of the Choral Conductor," by William J. Finn. It is not as agreeable reading as Dr. Davison's, but it rather conservatively comes to most of the same conclusions.

ROCKEFELLER AID TO MUSIC CENTER

Times April 8

Foundation Grants $60,000 to Berkshire Festival Group for School Project

The Rockefeller Foundation has made a grant of $60,000 to the Berkshire Music Center for use during the next two years, it was announced yesterday in a report of the foundation's activities for 1939. The center will open a Summer music school on July 8 at Tanglewood, the home of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass.

The sum of $10,000 of the grant is available for physical improvements. The remaining $50,000 will make it possible during the Summer sessions of 1940 and 1941, according to the announcement, "to provide the finest instruction at relatively low cost to the student body."

The report added:

"In 1939 the foundation stepped outside its usual program in the humanities to make a contribution toward a project which it is hoped will have an important influence on the development of music in America. In the familiar setting of the annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival in Massachusetts, there is to be established in 1940 a center for musical education under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

The foundation grant was made because the center will offer six weeks of "living and working in music" in association with Dr. Koussevitzky and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It [illegible] equipment for the conduct of the school in all its branches with a student body of 300.

There are three buildings on the estate, known as Tanglewood, that can be remodeled for assembly, rehearsals and classes. The grant will also be sufficient to permit the construction of a practicable unit for a small theatre, which will be used for school rehearsals and chamber concerts and which will permit stage presentations by the class in opera dramatics.

The center will continue its work from July 8 to Aug. 18. During the first three weeks in August the annual festival will be held in the music shed at Tanglewood.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 7 - 1940

Koussevitzky Gives Season's Final Concert

Boston Orchestra Heard in 4thBeethovenSymphony and Tchaikovsky's Fifth

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall in the last concert of the fifty-fourth season of its visits to New York, and was called upon for several farewell bows by a cheering audience which had been stirred by an exceptional performance of Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony. Another symphony, the fourth of Beethoven, occupied the first half of the program.

As on Thursday night, when the Bostonians had played the sixth symphonies of both of these composers Dr. Koussevitzky's list consisted of music which has had several performances under his direction in this auditorium, and many interpretations by resident and other visiting organizations. Despite its familiarity, however, it was well chosen from the point of view of contrast. The Beethoven symphony was admirably executed, apart from a pair of brief lapses in the horn choir, with notable finesse of dynamic shading and clarity of detail the variety and range of its expressive atmosphere were also persuasively revealed.

The technical and interpretative qualities which have long given this orchestra standing as one of the foremost organizations of its kind in the Americas were, however, most strikingly revealed in the performance of Tchaikovsky's symphony in E minor. Dr. Koussevitzky, who is commemorating the centenary of the composer's birth in these two concerts, as well as in Boston later this spring, and next summer in the Berkshire Festival, is renowned for his particularly penetrating insight into Tchaikovsky's music, his ability to reveal its complete emotional content. But there were undoubtedly other members of yesterday's capacity gathering, in addition to the writer, who faced the prospects of another hearing of this hard-worked symphony with resignation rather than with fond anticipation.

And yet not many measures had been played before many who were so minded found themselves listening with fresh attention to one of the most memorable interpretations which this work has received in twenty years. Even while noting some rather overwrought changes of pace in the first movement, one could count such impressions as unimportant in comparison with the expressive force of the interpretation as a whole, the superb work of the orchestra and its instant responsiveness to its inspired director.

Obviously, Dr. Koussevitzky did not regard the symphony as a time-honored member of the standard repertoire, but as music to which he was intently devoted and whose full significance he was eager to convey to his orchestra's hearers. In this he was entirely successful, and his ability to cause his hearers to listen to this familiar music and relish its melodic fertility, its many-hued scoring and its unabashed emotionalism in the manner of a new artistic experience was, with the virtuosity of his musicians, one of the major factors in bringing about an unusually memorable result.

Under the same conductor, the Boston Symphony will return next season for its usual quota of five evening and five afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, beginning Nov. 21 and 23.

F. D. P.

Music Center in Berkshires Awarded $60,000

Globe April 8

Rockefeller Foundation Makes Grant to Help Organize Summer School

The Rockefeller Foundation, in a report of its activities for the year 1939, makes the first public announcement of a substantial grant to assist in establishing a Summer music school, to be known as the Berkshire Music Center.

The grant is a notable recognition of the ambitious project of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"In 1939," the report states, "the foundation stepped outside its usual program in the humanities to make a contribution toward a project which it is hoped will have an important influence on the development of music in America. In the familiar setting of the annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival in Massachusetts there is to be established in 1940 a center for musical education under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Sixty thousand dollars has been allocated to the Music Center for use during the next two years, of which $10,000 is available for physical improvements. The grant will also be sufficient to permit the construction of a practicable unit for a small theatre, which will be used for school rehearsals and chamber concerts and can permit stage presentations by the class in opera dramatics.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

APR 8 - 1940

MUSIC

Home-Grown Composer

Half a century ago, when frail, poetic Edward MacDowell was No. 1 U. S. composer, the models for high-brow music were Brahms, Grieg, Wagner. Just before World War I, Kulturbolschewiks Arnold Schönberg and Igor Stravinsky (TIME, March 11) led a revolution against musical romanticism. When the revolution was over, U. S. composers still found themselves writing European music. Such U. S. composers as Aaron Copland and John Alden Carpenter tried to go native by using jazz tunes, but only the tunes were American. The musical grammar and syntax still sounded like Brahms or Stravinsky. Today there is still probably no high-brow U. S. music that can be identified as such in a blindfold test.

ROY HARRIS

If not pure U. S., at least pure Harris.

If any U. S. composer can attain an authentically U. S. symphonic style, a spare, gangling, twangy Oklahoman named Roy Harris may well be the man. Born in a log cabin, Roy Harris is as independent as a Panhandle cowhand, as dryly American as the Dust Bowl where he spent his early childhood. When, in 1926, he appeared in Eastern concert halls with an awkward, homemade symphonic piece under his arm, critics took one look and decided that here was music's own Joaquin Miller. Sent to Paris to study with famed Teacher Nadia Boulanger (TIME, Feb. 28, 1938), Composer Harris showed for a time the influences of the French modernists who sat at Mlle Boulanger's feet. But Harris soon got over these pretty Parisian tricks, and went on composing in his own way.

Most of Harris' music has been experimental, patchy and gaunt. But unlike many a contemporary composer, he has gone on correcting his past mistakes, improving his tools, getting his music clearer & clearer. Last year, after groping steadily upward on a rickety ladder of complex, dry, carpentered scores (Symphony 1933, When Johnny Comes Marching Home, Song for Occupations, etc.), Harris really hit his stride with a Third Symphony. No sooner was it finished than Boston's pompous Sergei Koussevitzky rushed to give it a première. No sooner had Koussevitzky played it than excitable Maestro Arturo Toscanini (who conducts few U. S. compositions) asked a chance to broadcast it with his NBC Orchestra. Last month (TIME, April 1) Victor recorded it.

By last week, when solemn, plodding Hans Lange gave Chicagoans a chance to hear it with the Chicago Symphony, Harris' Third Symphony had become the most talked-about U. S. composition in a decade. Said Koussevitzky: "This is the first truly great symphonic work to be written in America." Chicago critics, admiring its lean economy, lack of bombast and its forthright poetic atmosphere, wrote that "something of the crudeness and strength of pioneer America has crept into this new symphony," found it "as completely outside European experience as the prairie morning itself." To more cautious listeners it was not so much pure U. S. music as pure Harris.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES

APR 5 - 1940

Secret of Roy Harris' long pull to success is his uncompromising individualism. He was 25 before he ever got a lesson in musical composition. Like Abraham Lincoln, on whose birthday he was born, he got his education the hard way, all by himself. In 1918, when he was mustered out of the Army, he drove a truck for a living, delivering 3,000 lb. of butter and 300 dozen eggs a day around Los Angeles.

Says Roy Harris: "If we create an indigenous music worthy of our people, it will make its way swiftly and unfalteringly. . . . Whether it be a little more or less 'dissonant' or 'original' is of small import—but it must have the pulsing life stuff in it—creative urge and necessity of continuity. It cannot be a scholarly mosaic of all the materials and forms of the last 200 European years. . . ."

April 7

Boston Orchestra

Mit dem Carnegie Hall=Konzert am geſtrigen Nachmittag beendete Serge Kouſſevitzky die New Yorker Spielzeit 1939/40 des Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra, das hier in dieſem Winter wiederum je fünf Konzerte an Donnerstagabenden und Samstagnachmittagen gegeben hat. Wie das letzte Abendprogramm ſo wurde auch das geſtrige von Symphonien Beethovens und Tſchaikowſkys ausgefüllt, diesmal von der vierten des deutſchen und der fünften des ruſſiſchen Meiſters.

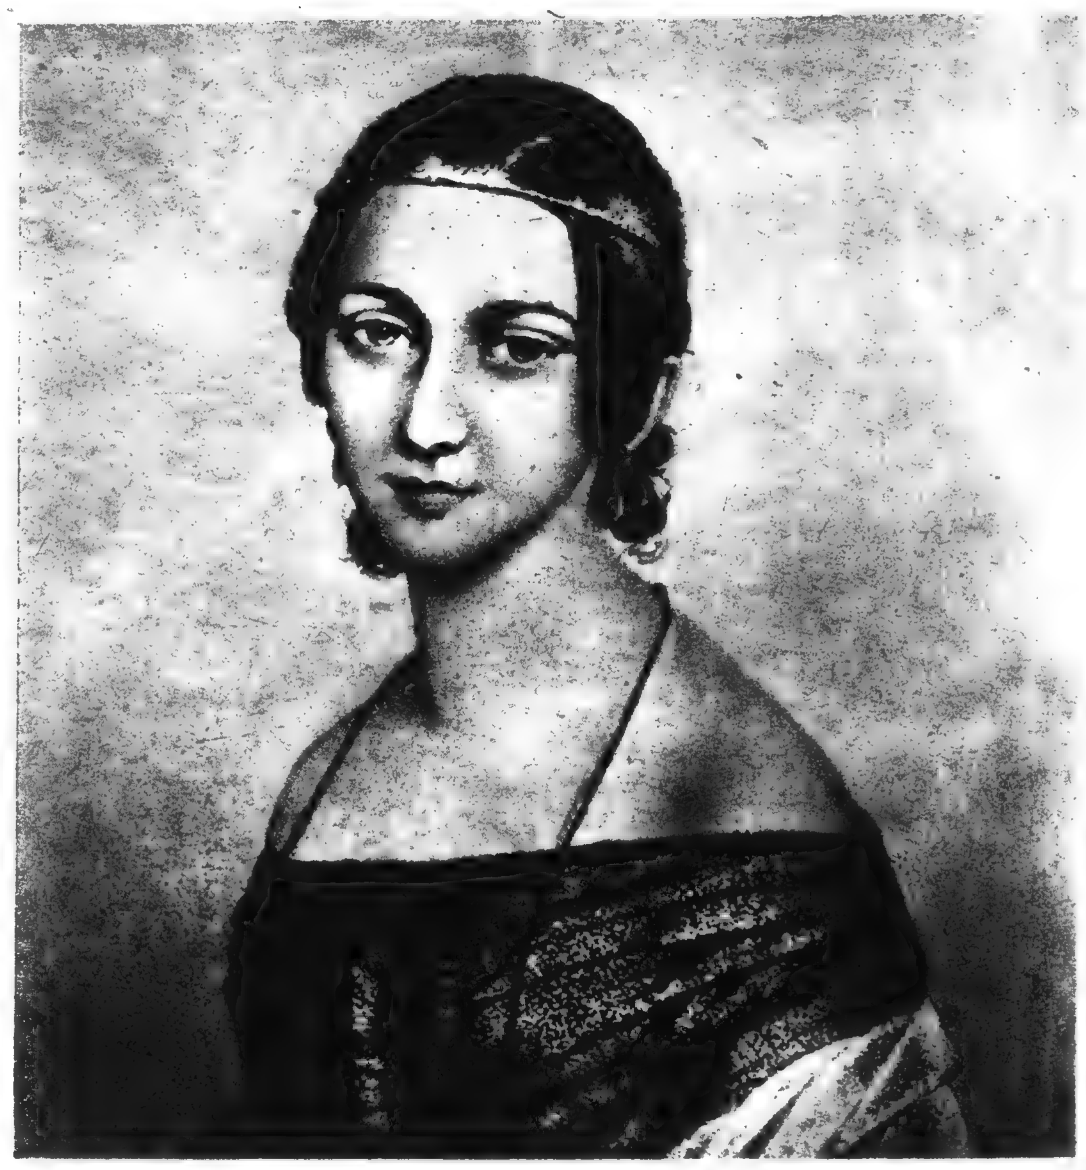
Kouſſevitzkys werktreue und lebendige Wiedergabe der Schöpfungen dieſer beiden Tondichter iſt hier ſchon eingehend gewürdigt worden, und es erübrigt ſich deshalb, erneut über die geſtrige Aufführung zu berichten. Zudem war das Programm wie auch das am vergangenen Donnerstag eigentlich nicht typiſch für Kouſſevitzky, der bekannten Werken gewöhnlich nicht den größten Teil ſeines Spielplans einräumt. Die vergangene Spielzeit der Boſtoner Muſiker machte uns wiederum mit einer Reihe mehr oder weniger hörenswerten neuen Werke bekannt: mit dem Violinkonzert von Erneſt Bloch, deſſen Solopart Joſeph Szigeti feſſelnd deutete; mit einer neuen Symphonie, der dritten, von Howard Hanſon, einem Violinkonzert von Edward Burlinghame Hill (Soliſtin: Ruth Poſſelt), einem Konzert für das gleiche Inſtrument von Prokofieff, das Heifetz als Soliſten hatte, einem Cello=Konzert des gleichen ruſſiſchen Komponiſten, deſſen Solopart ſein Landsmann Gregor Piatigorſky ſpielte, ſowie mit der „American Feſtival Overtüre" von William Schuman.

Nicht alles, was Kouſſevitzky uns da an Neuem beſcherte, war von gleichem Wert, aber er zeigte doch, daß es mit zeitgenöſſiſchen Tonſchöpfungen nicht ſo ſchlecht beſtellt iſt, wie die konſervativen Programme anderer Dirigenten uns glauben machen wollen. Außerdem wiederholten die Boſtoner hier auch eine ſtattliche Reihe bereits bekannter aber nur ganz ſelten gehörter Kompoſitionen, darunter vor allem amerikaniſche Werke, dann aber auch z. B. die Symphonie „Mathis der Maler" von Hindemith, die 2. Symphonie von d'Indy und Faurés „Pelleas et Meliſande"=Suite. Die Spielzeit zeigte wiederum, daß Kouſſevitzky nicht nur ein Dirigent ſondern auch ein Programmgeſtalter erſten Ranges iſt.

H. St.

The Romantic Life of a Pianist

Into His Biography of Clara Schumann, Mr. Burk Has Woven the Stories of Robert Schumann and Brahms

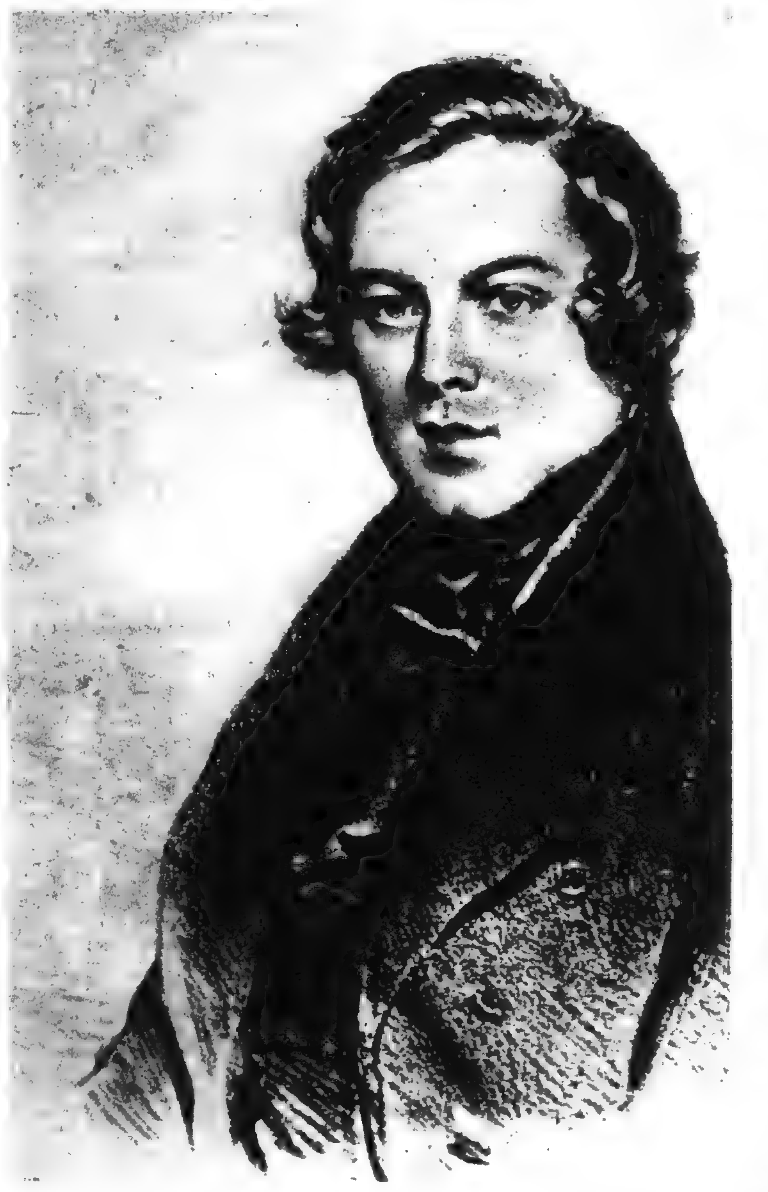


Clara Schumann.

CLARA SCHUMANN, A Romantic Biography. By John N. Burk. Illustrated. 438 pp. New York: Random House. $3.

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

CLARA SCHUMANN, née Wieck, was one of the foremost pianists of the nineteenth century, and there would appear to be no need to qualify that judgment by adding that she was outstanding among women pianists. But her talent as an interpretative artist was only a part of what made her life memorable. Her quality as a human being and her incalculable meaning to two men had momentous import for music. For, in a unique way, she lived close to the creative core of two of the world's great composers: Robert Schumann and Johannes Brahms.



Robert Schumann.

In telling Clara Schumann's story John N. Burk also weaves, as life itself wove, the histories of Schumann and Brahms. But Mr. Burk keeps Clara at the heart of his book and thus gives it focus and unity of feeling. He has given his story something more—a warm, pulsing, human emotion. Clara seems to emerge intact, as do Schumann and Brahms.

Mr. Burk, who took over some years ago the difficult task of following Philip Hale as program annotator for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has written a book that is not only accurate as to facts but reads like a novel. The lives of Clara and Robert Schumann make one of the most moving love stories in the annals of art. Mr. Burk has told it in detail, with delicacy of sentiment and with what appears to be unwavering insight. He has not relied on his imagination but has let the chief actors speak for themselves wherever possible.

He has combed available sources, and he has been fortunate in the riches at his disposal. Clara kept a diary through most of her life. There exists also a vast fund of correspondence between Clara and Robert and between her and Johannes Brahms. In his acknowledgment of sources Mr. Burk declares that he "has tried simply to order and select, sparing the characters undue assistance from his imagination, hoping to preserve the authenticity of their story by allowing them to act and speak for themselves." Mr. Burk has succeeded, translating into English from German sources some fresh material and producing a net of the best rounded life of Clara Schumann to be had in English.

Mr. Burk gives a fair and balanced picture of Clara's father, Friedrich Wieck, who has been much maligned by some historians. Wieck gave his daughter an excellent musical foundation, teaching her that "skill is a tool, never an aim." The musical progressives thronged his house in a time of fighting the Philistines. Later, of course, Wieck opposed the union of his daughter and Robert Schumann by every means at his disposal, forcing them to go to law. But even here Mr. Burk does not lose perspective.

Clara came to know Robert Schumann when she was a child and he a young man. Mr. Burk traces the enfoldment of their love with a sensitive hand. He lingers, but not unduly, over the years of their marriage, which brought the joyous flowering of Robert's genius. He tells touchingly of the decline of Robert's mental powers and the final two and a half years of his life in a sanatorium.

Clara's character grows with the story, from the young girl who stands firm in her faith in Robert to the bereaved wife in the years when tragedy overtakes the happy marriage. Brahms appears on the scene—uncouth, gruff, shy, tender, devoted. Clara and Robert encourage him; they see in him the successor to Robert's mantle as a romantic composer. He remains through more than forty years Clara's steadfast friend, and he draws strength from her ripe wisdom and from her responsiveness to his creative efforts.

Clara lived a full life, raised a large family and had the burden of seeing some of her children fade and die. But she had reservoirs of energy and will-power within her. Through decades that were filled with the turmoil of a large family and the troubles and discomforts of a traveling concert artist, her shining integrity remained untarnished. Mr. Burk lets these things come through as the story moves along its path.

With Clara, Schumann and Brahms are the principal characters of this book. But momentous figures of history are encountered in these pages, and there are brief but revealing glimpses of them. Mendelssohn, Liszt, Chopin, Wagner, Joachim, Jenny Lind and a host of others, great and near-great, visited the Schumanns or joined with them in making music.

If there is any deficiency in this book it is Mr. Burk's failure to paint in more of the environment and spirit of a time when tremendous issues were at stake. But that would probably have meant a three-volume book, like the life of Richard Wagner by Ernest Newman. Mr. Burk has accomplished admirably what he set out to do.

A Young German Convert to Freedom

CONVERT TO FREEDOM. By Eitel Wolf Dobert. 357 pp. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

By T. R. YBARRA

THIS book is a poignant record of the soul-searchings of a young German, too young to have served in the World War, driven by penniless desperation to join the Nazis, later alienated completely from their doctrines by blinding inner revelation of what he came to consider the real truth underlying human life and international relationships. Genuineness breathes from its pages. One feels instinctively that here is outlined the inner struggle of thousands of German youths of today.

Eitel Wolf Dobert was born in Prussia, dedicated from childhood to unquestioning obedience to the stern Prussian tradition of hardness and efficiency and militarism. When he was still a little boy the World War broke out. Soon its opening months of martial parading, of glorification of coming victory in the Germany of the Hohenzollerns, changed to the bitterness of defeat. All that the Prussian tradition signified—pomp of war, supremacy of the military caste, Germany's destiny to rule the universe—was ground into the dust. Victorious soldiers of other nations stood on German soil. The Treaty of Versailles shackled the Germans. Hunger and despair crushed them.

Yet the old spirit refused to die. Young Eitel Wolf Dobert—his first name was that of one of the fallen Kaiser's sons—was sent to the cadet school at Potsdam. There contempt of the new German Republic was drilled into the cadets day and night. They lived only to wreak vengeance on Germany's foreign enemies, to restore to their country the rule of monarchs and the cult of the grim Prussian tradition. The chapters in Herr Dobert's book in which this part of his life is narrated paint a vivid picture. They carry conviction. As a background for what comes afterward they are invaluable.

Into this post-war Germany of dull suffering and flaming thirst for revenge came Hitler. Around him rallied thousands of Germans of all sorts. In some burned the hope of victory over France and the rest of the nations which had driven the Kaiser from his throne; in others the main hope was for bread enough to keep alive.

Unable to find a job, almost at the end of his courage, young Dobert became a Nazi. Already he had imbibed doctrines of ultranationalism at the Potsdam Cadet School, especially from the head instructor, Schwandten, a super-Prussian; now he drank in a new nationalism, even more violent and uncompromising, from the followers of Hitler—particularly from one called Sassnitz, who soon shaped the impressionable young fellow into a thorough Nazi.

After he was duly shaped he was sent into Switzerland to spread the new doctrine. Instead, he fell in love with the air of freedom blowing over the Swiss valleys. He talked with disciples of democracy. For the first time he doubted.

A French worker in the cause of international reconciliation got him into France. There he mixed with French people of all classes, became convinced of the general French lack of desire for war, of French yearning for a better world, in which youth on both sides of the Rhine could bury the hatchet and live in harmony.

He found eagerness to listen to German arguments, willingness to let him have his say. Nor were all his audiences in France believers in the beauties of international good-will. Once, at a meeting of extremists of the Right, he was denounced as a "boche" and soundly thrashed. But he took it in his stride. It was all part of his new mission—already he felt himself a crusader—to make France and Germany understand each other and stop shedding the blood of their youth on meaningless battlefields.

He resigned from the Nazi party. He wrote a personal letter to Hitler. "I have come to see clearly," he told the Fuehrer, "that our movement is mistaken about the thoughts and sentiments of the French people." He offered to answer any questions that Hitler might put to him. No reply came.

Completely changed in his outlook, he returned to Germany. He rang up old associates. They had heard of his doings abroad. Schwandten, the icy Prussian disciplinarian of the cadet school, reviled him. Sassnitz, who had made him a Nazi, refused to speak to him.

While he was at home Hitler was swept to supreme power. The young man from the lands of freedom realized that, if he was to save his skin, he must get away. Back to Switzerland he fled—and the air of freedom was sweeter to him than ever.

Devoted heart and soul to his crusader's task, vowed absolutely to the propagation of the creed of international solidarity—which now presupposed the extinction of the Nazi doctrine of intolerance and violence—he returned to his lecturing, to informal talking with all sort and conditions of human beings. Now he is in America.

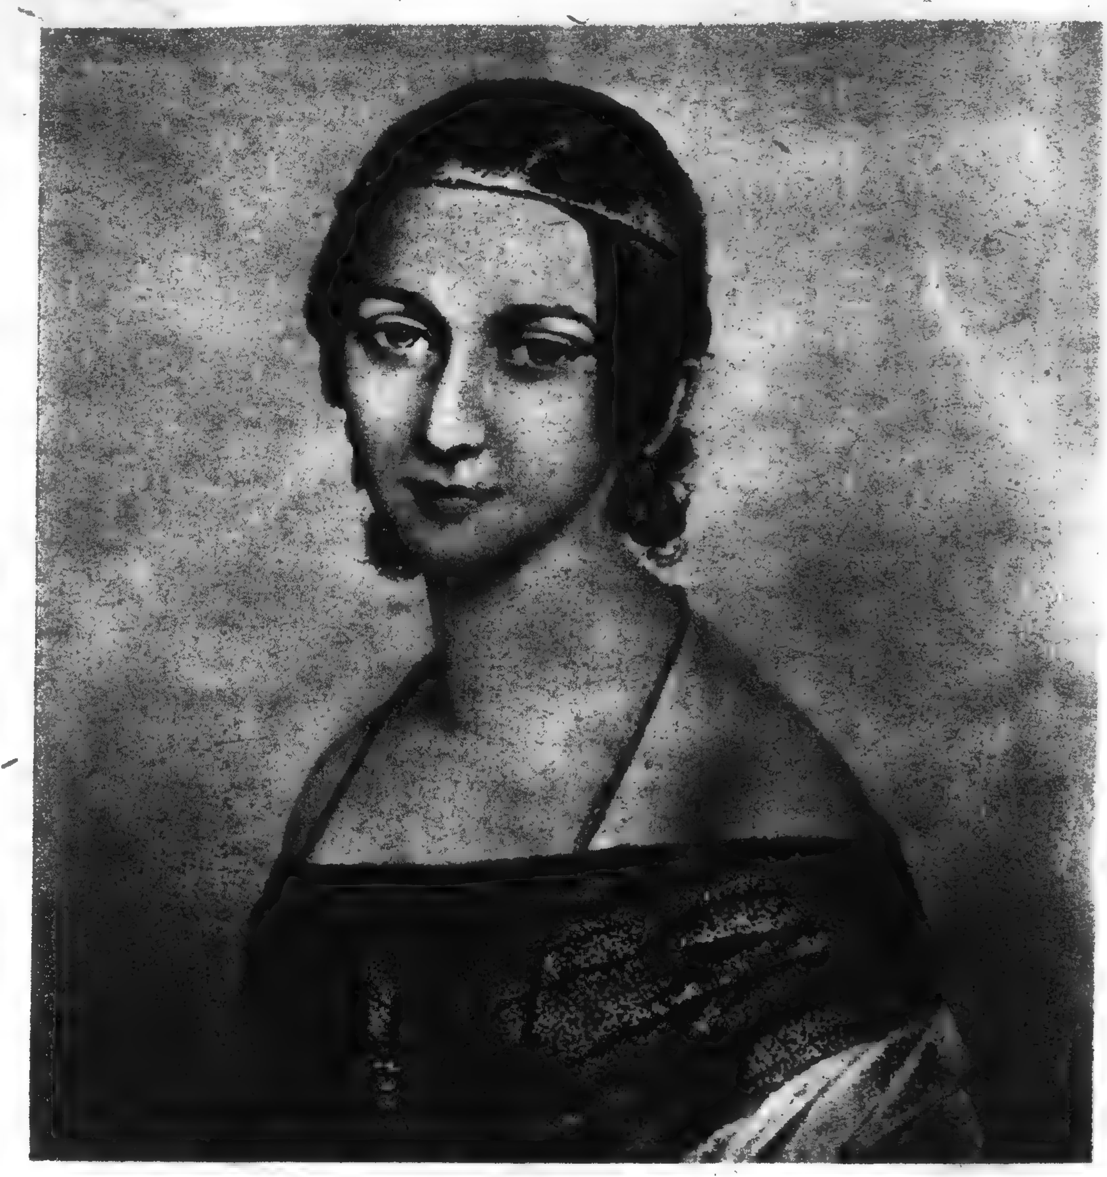
The agony that went into the making of Herr Dobert's book throbs from its author's words. The high resolve animating him commands respect and fervent good wishes for success. One of the most poignant impressions left by those words is the heartbreaking pathos of the position of men like Herr Dobert in this cruel world of today.

All over Europe young people are thinking thoughts like his; in their hearts is boundless fellow-feeling for mankind, the yearning for joy and beauty and peace. Yet again their Europe is at war—the Europe that includes the fair countryside of France and the glorious valley of the German Rhine. Again Europeans are engulfed in the insanity of wholesale bloodshed. The happenings of every day are a mockery of all the strivings and ideals of Herr Dobert and his fellows.

But—he continues his crusade. Even the humblest effort, he feels, is not wasted. May he succeed in his quest for a twentieth century Holy Grail!

The Romantic Life of a Pianist

Into His Biography of Clara Schumann, Mr. Burk Has Woven the Stories of Robert Schumann and Brahms

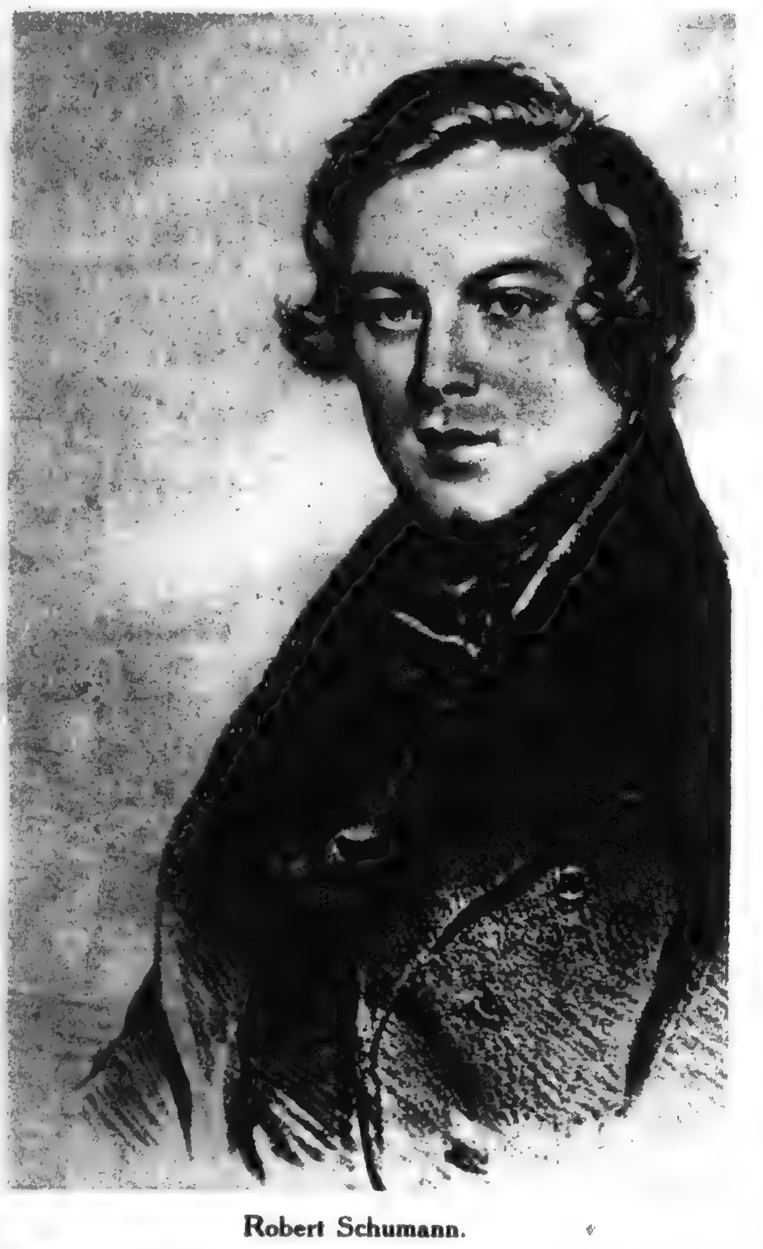


Clara Schumann.

CLARA SCHUMANN, A Romantic Biography. By John N. Burk. Illustrated. 438 pp. New York: Random House. $3.

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

CLARA SCHUMANN, née Wieck, was one of the foremost pianists of the nineteenth century, and there would appear to be no need to qualify that judgment by adding that she was outstanding among women pianists. But her talent as an interpretative artist was only a part of what made her life memorable. Her quality as a human being and her incalculable meaning to two men had momentous import for music. For, in a unique way, she lived close to the creative core of two of the world's great composers: Robert Schumann and Johannes Brahms.



Robert Schumann.

In telling Clara Schumann's story John N. Burk also weaves, as life itself wove, the histories of Schumann and Brahms. But Mr. Burk keeps Clara at the heart of his book and thus gives it focus and unity of feeling. He has given his story something more—a warm, pulsing, human emotion. Clara seems to emerge intact, as do Schumann and Brahms.

Mr. Burk, who took over some years ago the difficult task of following Philip Hale as program annotator for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has written a book that is not only accurate as to facts but reads like a novel. The lives of Clara and Robert Schumann make one of the most moving love stories in the annals of art. Mr. Burk has told it in detail, with delicacy of sentiment and with what appears to be unwavering insight. He has not relied on his imagination but has let the chief actors speak for themselves wherever possible.

He has combed available sources, and he has been fortunate in the riches at his disposal. Clara kept a diary through most of her life. There exists also a vast fund of correspondence between Clara and Robert and between her and Johannes Brahms. In his acknowledgment of sources Mr. Burk declares that he "has tried simply to order and select, sparing the characters undue assistance from his imagination, hoping to preserve the authenticity of their story by allowing them to act and speak for themselves." Mr. Burk has succeeded, translating into English from German sources some fresh material and producing a net of the best rounded life of Clara Schumann to be had in English.

Mr. Burk gives a fair and balanced picture of Clara's father, Friedrich Wieck, who has been much maligned by some historians. Wieck gave his daughter an excellent musical foundation, teaching her that "skill is a tool, never an aim." The musical progressives thronged his house in a time of fighting the Philistines. Later, of course, Wieck opposed the union of his daughter and Robert Schumann by every means at his disposal, forcing them to go to law. But even here Mr. Burk does not lose perspective.

Clara came to know Robert Schumann when she was a child and he a young man. Mr. Burk traces the enfoldment of their love with a sensitive hand. He lingers, but not unduly, over the years of their marriage, which brought the joyous flowering of Robert's genius. He tells touchingly of the decline of Robert's mental powers and the final two and a half years of his life in a sanatorium.

Clara's character grows with the story, from the young girl who stands firm in her faith in Robert to the bereaved wife in the years when tragedy overtakes the happy marriage. Brahms appears on the scene—uncouth, gruff, shy, tender, devoted. Clara and Robert encourage him; they see in him the successor to Robert's mantle as a romantic composer. He remains through more than forty years Clara's steadfast friend, and he draws strength from her ripe wisdom and from her responsiveness to his creative efforts.

Clara lived a full life, raised a large family and had the burden of seeing some of her children fade and die. But she had reservoirs of energy and will-power within her. Through decades that were filled with the turmoil of a large family and the troubles and discomforts of a traveling concert artist, her shining integrity remained untarnished. Mr. Burk lets these things come through as the story moves along its path.

With Clara, Schumann and Brahms are the principal characters of this book. But momentous figures of history are encountered in these pages, and there are brief but revealing glimpses of them. Mendelssohn, Liszt, Chopin, Wagner, Joachim, Jenny Lind and a host of others, great and near-great, visited the Schumanns or joined with them in making music.

If there is any deficiency in this book it is Mr. Burk's failure to paint in more of the environment and spirit of a time when tremendous issues were at stake. But that would probably have meant a three-volume book, like the life of Richard Wagner by Ernest Newman. Mr. Burk has accomplished admirably what he set out to do.

A Young German Convert to Freedom

CONVERT TO FREEDOM. By Eitel Wolf Dobert. 357 pp. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

By T. R. YBARRA

THIS book is a poignant record of the soul-searchings of a young German, too young to have served in the World War, driven by penniless desperation to join the Nazis, later alienated completely from their doctrines by blinding inner revelation of what he came to consider the real truth underlying human life and international relationships. Genuineness breathes from its pages. One feels instinctively that here is outlined the inner struggle of thousands of German youths of today.

Eitel Wolf Dobert was born in Prussia, dedicated from childhood to unquestioning obedience to the stern Prussian tradition of hardness and efficiency and militarism. When he was still a little boy the World War broke out. Soon its opening months of martial parading, of glorification of coming victory in the Germany of the Hohenzollerns, changed to the bitterness of defeat. All that the Prussian tradition signified—pomp of war, supremacy of the military caste, Germany's destiny to rule the universe—was ground into the dust. Victorious soldiers of other nations stood on German soil. The Treaty of Versailles shackled the Germans. Hunger and despair crushed them.

Yet the old spirit refused to die. Young Eitel Wolf Dobert—his first name was that of one of the fallen Kaiser's sons—was sent to the cadet school at Potsdam. There contempt of the new German Republic was drilled into the cadets day and night. They lived only to wreak vengeance on Germany's foreign enemies, to restore to their country the rule of monarchs and the cult of the grim Prussian tradition. The chapters in Herr Dobert's book in which this part of his life is narrated paint a vivid picture. They carry conviction. As a background for what comes afterward they are invaluable.

Into this post-war Germany of dull suffering and flaming thirst for revenge came Hitler. Around him rallied thousands of Germans of all sorts. In some burned the hope of victory over France and the rest of the nations which had driven the Kaiser from his throne; in others the main hope was for bread enough to keep alive.

Unable to find a job, almost at the end of his courage, young Dobert became a Nazi. Already he had imbibed doctrines of ultranationalism at the Potsdam Cadet School, especially from the head instructor, Schwandten, a super-Prussian; now he drank in a new nationalism, even more violent and uncompromising, from the followers of Hitler—particularly from one called Sassnitz, who soon shaped the impressionable young fellow into a thorough Nazi.

After he was duly shaped he was sent into Switzerland to spread the new doctrine. Instead, he fell in love with the air of freedom blowing over the Swiss valleys. He talked with disciples of democracy. For the first time he doubted.

A French worker in the cause of international reconciliation got him into France. There he mixed with French people of all classes, became convinced of the general French lack of desire for war, of French yearning for a better world, in which youth on both sides of the Rhine could bury the hatchet and live in harmony.

He found eagerness to listen to German arguments, willingness to let him have his say. Nor were all his audiences in France believers in the beauties of international good-will. Once, at a meeting of extremists of the Right, he was denounced as a "boche" and soundly thrashed. But he took it in his stride. It was all part of his new mission—already he felt himself a crusader—to make France and Germany understand each other and stop shedding the blood of their youth on meaningless battlefields.

He resigned from the Nazi party. He wrote a personal letter to Hitler. "I have come to see clearly," he told the Fuehrer, "that our movement is mistaken about the thoughts and sentiments of the French people." He offered to answer any questions that Hitler might put to him. No reply came.

Completely changed in his outlook, he returned to Germany. He rang up old associates. They had heard of his doings abroad. Schwandten, the icy Prussian disciplinarian of the cadet school, reviled him. Sassnitz, who had made him a Nazi, refused to speak to him.

While he was at home Hitler was swept to supreme power. The young man from the lands of freedom realized that, if he was to save his skin, he must get away. Back to Switzerland he fled—and the air of freedom was sweeter to him than ever.

Devoted heart and soul to his crusader's task, vowed absolutely to the propagation of the creed of international solidarity—which now presupposed the extinction of the Nazi doctrine of intolerance and violence—he returned to his lecturing, to informal talking with all sort and conditions of human beings. Now he is in America.

The agony that went into the making of Herr Dobert's book throbs from its author's words. The high resolve animating him commands respect and fervent good wishes for success. One of the most poignant impressions left by those words is the heartbreaking pathos of the position of men like Herr Dobert in this cruel world of today.

All over Europe young people are thinking thoughts like his; in their hearts is boundless fellow-feeling for mankind, the yearning for joy and beauty and peace. Yet again their Europe is at war—the Europe that includes the fair countryside of France and the glorious valley of the German Rhine. Again Europeans are engulfed in the insanity of wholesale bloodshed. The happenings of every day are a mockery of all the strivings and ideals of Herr Dobert and his fellows.

But—he continues his crusade. Even the humblest effort, he feels, is not wasted. May he succeed in his quest for a twentieth century Holy Grail!

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Koussevitzky Applauded in Sibelius Fourth, Works of Strauss and Berlioz

By EDWARD DOWNES

The return of Serge Koussevitzky to the podium of the Boston Symphony is always an occasion for rejoicing, even after the briefest of his absences. Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall the exceptionally rewarding program he offered made the pleasure a double one. It included Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Sibelius' Fourth Symphony, the Schubert "Unfinished" Symphony and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-Fashioned Rougish Manner—in Rondo Form" by Richard Strauss. Fascinating and instructive as it is to hear composers lead their own works, great as may be our well justified curiosity to hear other conductors of different styles and approach from Mr. Koussevitzky, there is no baton which makes our virtuoso musicians speak with quite the same unanimity and eloquence as Mr. Koussevitzky's.

The above remarks may be as familiar as the most shop-worn commonplace. Yet, yesterday afternoon, for the hundredth time, the miracle of this collaboration burst upon the ears with a fresh impact and a newness that was startling only because we had for the moment forgotten that it is a permanent characteristic of all great art.

Orchestral Sleight of Hand

The program was framed by two of the greatest wizards of modern orchestration: Berlioz and Richard Strauss. Hearing these composers in such close proximity made clearer than ever the amazing spiritual affinity of the two men. In a certain sense Berlioz was perhaps the more literary of the two geniuses but the Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," for all its extravagance and noise, is to this day a potent and exciting tone-poem in miniature. Seldom have we heard a performance which penetrated with such acute understanding and intuitive sympathy to the very core of Berlioz's exalted temperament. Passages, which in less sensitive interpretations emerge as mere bombast and theatricalism, sounded with a certain nobility and above all with deep sincerity.

"Till Eulenspiegel," of course, goes much farther than the Berlioz in orchestral eccentricity, and yet, oddly enough, it has a more classical aspect. The day is past when Strauss represented to us wildest of orchestral cacophony, and with the passing of that day has come a better understanding of his music. Strauss himself conducts "Till Eulenspiegel" with emphasis on the intimate humor of the score and of the tenderness which is there as well. Three-quarters of the time he makes the gigantic apparatus of the modern orchestra sound like a chamber music ensemble. The quiet chuckles of the wood-winds, the sly impudence of those muted brass, the light-hearted, skittery, violins: these are the things on which he bestows his most loving care, and the result is an Eulenspiegel the exact opposite of the noisy lout to whom many of us have been accustomed.

Yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky led his men with all the finesse and clarity of the Straussian interpretation and with classic restraint where restraint was in place. But this does not mean that his orchestra did not roar with boisterous glee at Till's most violent practical jokes or leer offensively with Strauss's irrepressible hero at the bourgeois complacencies which they both sought to disturb.

The trial and execution of Till had something of the mock horror of a fairy tale about it as did the last pathetic squeaks of the doomed ruffian. In the tender epilogue was captured all the atmosphere of "once upon a time."

The Mature Sibelius

Sibelius' Fourth Symphony will probably never have the popular appeal of his first two works in that form. As he himself said, there is "nothing, absolutely nothing of the circus about it." Spare, somber and introspective, there is little that is inviting about its exterior aspect. Yet it represents Sibelius' real maturity, the final casting off of external influences. Koussevitzky probed its depths with a restraint and conscientiousness that would probably have the composer's complete approval.

Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony was a rewarding contrast to the sophistications of modern orchestration and harmony. It reminded one again that the basis of all our music is song. And our orchestra sang with an eloquence that is given to few.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS
APR 9 _ 1940

Woman's Club Members To Hear Koussevitzky

Mrs. Austin A. McCaulin, chairman of the Music Department of the Woman's Club, and Mrs. Warren C. Herrick, member of the executive committee, will attend the Festival of Music of the Massachusetts State Federation of Women's Clubs at the Copley Plaza Hotel, Boston, tomorrow. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will address the gathering and tell of the Music Center at Tanglewood.

Also on the program, which starts at 10:15 A. M., are several musical presentations, among them those of the Women's Symphony Orchestra and the Massachusetts State Federation Choral Society. Composers and other soloists are scheduled to talk or demonstrate their talents.

THIS CLIPPING FROM McALLEN, TEXAS
PRESS

APR 9 - 1940

We Can All Enjoy Classical Music

THE mistaken idea of the "difficulty" of symphonic form and fear of classical music have kept many individuals from a richer enjoyment of life, in the opinion of Oscar Levant, famous musician and composer, who writes a music 'clinic' for Good Housekeeping Magazine.

In the April issue of the magazine, Mr. Levant discusses the comparative methods used by modern composers and the methods of such well-known impressionists as Debussy, Ravel and Strauss. For example, he points out two of the most popular songs of the past year, "My Reverie" and "The Lamp Is Low." The former was based on a Debussy piano piece and the latter is lifted almost literally from Ravel's Pavan for a Dead Princess.

Records recommended by Mr. Levant for those who would like to build a music library and learn to understand as they build include Serge Koussevitzky's direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Beethoven's Second Symphony, Gieseking's recording of Reverie, and the orchestral version of the Ravel Pavan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 8 - 1940

AMUSEMENTS

Music of Weekend Mostly Orchestral

Four Ranking Organizations Concentrate Attention on Works of Single Comp

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Great moments in Carnegie Hall occur during a musical season. Not infrequently phony Orchestra is on the stage and Serge the podium. Such a moment came on S when the first of symphony orchestras a ductor played Tchaikowsky's Fifth Sympho credible performance. Thrice familiar the music was, thrice familiar Koussevitzky's interpretation, but this was a moment of re-creation. All that had been done before was pushed aside and the music was played as though it were among the newest works in the repertoire. No wonder, then, that the audience was carried away by the stupendous performance. It was a triumph for the performers; it was perhaps a greater triumph for the much-maligned Tchaikowsky.

The Bostonians' final visit was designed to give due recognition to the approaching centenary of the composer's birth. In the concerts of Thursday in Carnegie Hall and of Friday in the Academy of Music, the Sixth Symphony had been given memorable performances. The performance of the Fifth promised to be equally memorable. It was. All the conductor's love for this music, all his understanding of the Russian temperament were expressed in this interpretation. There will probably be no more eloquent disclosures of this music during the entire observation of the Tchaikowsky centenary.

What Koussevitzky had in mind when he paired Beethoven and Tchaikowsky in these programs is not known, but their juxtaposition gave rise to certain inevitable comparisons which led to the credit of Tchaikowsky. The intellectuals have had their innings as to the "defects" of the composer's symphonic writing and the purists among them will still have cause for argument. But they have been unable to detract from the greatness of this music which touches the human heart. In these performances it was possible to admire the construction of the music and when that technical aspect was placed beside the craftsmanship of Beethoven it was far from being too shabby or inferior.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony was admirably set forth, making the audience aware once again how entrancing the "minor" Beethoven is.

RARE TOUCH OF SYMPHONIES

Bost

april 12

Dr. Koussevitzky Shows Brilliance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An unusual programme for Dr. Koussevitzky, that of this week's pair of Symphony Concerts, in that it groups four pieces not one of which could be described as unfamiliar, though Berlioz' Overture to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," was last played at these concerts in 1927 and Sibelius' Fourth Symphony in 1932. The other numbers were Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

It would be convenient to lump the above as four masterpieces, but it would take courage to do so. Schubert's Symphony and Strauss' tone poem are fairly safe, but Berlioz' Overture, though it has survived for over a hundred years, is too erratic for such classification; containing, for all its brilliance, its tonal excitements, too much "effect," too little real music. And that brings us to the most debatable work of the afternoon, the Symphony of Sibelius.

Composed in 1911, introduced to Boston by Dr. Muck, who protested that he did not in the least understand it, and played here in all a half dozen times, the Symphony still seems obscure; or rather, Sibelius' reason for writing such a symphony seems obscure. That he was trying to reduce his music to the barest essentials is clear enough, but that there is any profound significance in this elaborate understatement is not so plain. Granted that he never again reverted to the frank outspokenness of the First and Second Symphonies, there is no such reticence and self-denial in the Fifth, while even the Sixth and Seventh lack the Fourth's studied avoidance of the obvious. What a contrast to the Strauss of "Till," who makes use of the tritest harmonies and progressions, yet touches them with the spark of genius.

Though the last movement falls below the other three, this A minor Symphony may be classed with those works that speak intimately and persuasively to a limited number of listeners. And it might thus find itself in some very good company, too. Elusive and fragmentary, though they are, there are beauties in this Symphony, the more precious because they are so tantalizingly brief, such as the F-sharp section in the first movement and the delicious turn of melody near the beginning of the Scherzo.

From the conductor's standpoint the programme exacted much, since the four compositions were representative of four wholly different musical temperaments—Berlioz, all fire and fustian, exaggeration and exuberance; Sibelius, withdrawing as far as possible from the world in which Berloiz exulted; Schubert, lyrical, with a touch of tragedy, and obsessed with beauty for its own sake; and Strauss, witty, pictorial, ironic, sentimental and folksy, combining bizzarrerie and tenderness in a fashion pecular to himself, peculiar even to this particular piece. Time was when Dr. Koussevitzky might not have put each man in his niche quite so neatly as he did yesterday. It is probably not too much to say that it was a feat of interpretation that no other conductor, now before the American public, could have duplicated. The orchestra, needless to say, responded nobly to his every intention.

---

april 8 AMUSEMENTS Times 8 THE

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

OTHER MUSIC IN REVIEW

Toscanini Plays Tchaikovsky at NBC—Harvard Glee Club Heard With Radcliffe Choral Group

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

Harvard Club Concert

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Club, at their joint concert last night in Town Hall, under the direction of Wallace Woodworth, presented an unusually elaborate program, the first half of which was devoted to works by Giovanni Gabrieli, the seventeenth century Italian composer. Although Gabrieli was one of the greatest musical geniuses of his time and the most important composer in the Venetian school, his compositions are virtually unknown today except to connoisseurs. It was therefore, a most praiseworthy effort on the part of the combined choruses to bring public attention to the remarkable creations of this unaccountably neglected genius.

Assisted by the brass choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and E. Power Biggs, organist, the choristers were heard in four of Gabrieli's works from the "Sacrae Symphoniae" of 1597 and 1615. Each of these was preceded by an "Intonation" for organ by the same composer, who was for many years the organist at St. Mark's in Venice. These brief preludes served to establish the key of the choral numbers which they preceded on the program. A "canzona per sonare" played by the brasses completed the Gabrieli selections.

Gabrieli, who was the teacher of Heinrich Schuetz, Michael Praetorius and other celebrated composers of the time, had, as Riemann pointed out, a far weightier influence on the musical production of the first half of the seventeenth century than the famous Florentine monodists. His innovations in matters of form, harmonic modulations and the employment of repeated short phrases gave much of his music performed last night a strikingly modern effect.

The imaginative treatment of the antiphonal part-writing in Gabrieli's choral works presented, the richness of sonorities and the dynamic contrasts displayed in each of them, as well as the emotional impetus behind all of these extraordinary masterpieces made them uncommonly impressive. The powerful climaxes of "In Ecclesiis Benedicite Domino" and "Jubilate Deo" reached an almost unparalleled glory of sound, while the Benedictus for three choirs with its delicate echoings and unconventional coloring looked far into the musical future. But finest was the superb Nativity poem, "O Jesu Mi Dulcissime," with its strikingly modern employment of brief, reiterated phrases, its broad, solemn close, and surprisingly rich harmonic progressions.

The singers found the Gabrieli music more difficult to negotiate than the numbers of later origin on the lengthy list, and the tempi adopted were sometimes open to question. Surely the "Osanna" in the Benedictus should have gone at a brisker pace, and the first part of the whole more delicately set forth. But regardless of any such shortcomings there should be but gratitude for the opportunity granted to hear these magnificent examples of choral invention.

Mozart on Program

After them the three excerpts from Masonic works by Mozart seemed particularly tame affairs, and, in fact, they were very weak examples. The choruses from Handel's "Semele" and "L'Allegro" were not much more rewarding. But with the "Carnival Song" for men's voices and brass, the excellent "Howl Ye" from Randall Thompson's "The Peaceable Kingdom" and the "Casey Jones" in the clever arrangement by Edward B. Lawton, the choral forces came into their own.

All three of these contemporary American items were written especially for one or both of the performing forces. Mr. Piston's setting of the verses by Lorenzo de Medici was new here and proved to be an original and fanciful addition to the literature.

The choral body did its best singing of the evening in these compositions and in the extremely difficult Epilogue from Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex."

Here they were on sure ground emotionally and technically, giving each with a tonal solidity, carefully perfected ensemble and niceness of shading that did them great credit. The schedule was rounded out with the great fugal "Cum Sancto Spiritu" from Bach's Mass in B Minor.

H. M. Rainie was the tenor soloist in the finale from Mozart's "Die Maurerfreude," and R. E. L. Reiner was the Speaker, and F. C. Wing the Messenger in the Stravinsky contribution. N. S.

New York Times WEDNESDAY, APRIL 10, 1940

Sound Waves 'Rock' Carnegie Hall As 'Enhanced Music' Is Played

'Stereophonic Reproduction' Demonstrated by Bell Laboratories—Tones Near Limit That the Human Ear Can Hear

The loudest musical sounds ever created crashed and echoed through venerable Carnegie Hall last night as a specially invited audience listened, spellbound, and at times not a little terrified.

Staged by the engineers of the Bell Telephone Laboratories, the performance was not a concert but a demonstration of the seemingly unlimited capabilities of a new system of "stereophonic reproduction of enhanced music" previously recorded on films.

Three huge loudspeaking devices, concealed behind stage front drops of gossamer-like fabrics, over which various colored lighting effects were cast, received the electrical power created by three large amplifiers in the basement of the hall.

The musical impetus supplied to each bank of loudspeakers came from a separate sound track on the same film, each track feeding its respective tonal message to one of the speaker units. A fourth track on the film was used automatically to govern the overall tonal loudness of the program.

Demonstration Is Explained

Before the musical presentation, Dr. Frank B. Jewett, president of Bell Laboratories, explained that the music of orchestra or drama, first had been recorded in the usual way, after which the conductor or dramatic director again was called in to "enhance" the sound film. Dr. Jewett and others explained that in recording very wide dynamic ranges in music, the original sounds had been compressed automatically.

In the playback or performance of the music, the 2,000 odd guests were told, it finally was necessary to "expand" the music again to its original dynamic proportions. This is where the "enhancement" comes in.

As the music from the original film or films is heard, it is re-recorded on a fresh film, from which to be projected to listeners. At this point the conductor uses a small machine somewhat resembling a cash register. By moving three controls he is able relatively to expand or compress each of the sound tracks and thus to "enhance" the general output as a whole, or any specific part of it.

It was explained that in the original recording, three separate microphones, widely separated, are used. Each microphone puts its own version upon the film. Then, when reproduced through the separate loudspeakers at the final performance, after being "enhanced" the music is heard by the audience in "stereophonic" proportions, or in a kind of musical "third dimension."

The sounds heard varied in "level" or acoustical power by as much as one billion times. When the conductor who did the "enhancing" in making the film wanted a very faint sound, it did not seem to matter whether the performance was by a full orchestra or a giant chorus. The enhanser could tone it down. When he wanted a stupefying volume of tone, that in Carnegie Hall seemed to shake the building, he got it instantly.

Miss Hazel Hayes was the soloist. But, as the Bell Laboratory men pointed out, the performance was a demonstration, not a concert.

Huge Tone Variation

The musical tones heard varied, according to the engineers, from 40 to 15,000 cycles, completely covering the average range of human hearing. At the maximum sound level about 1,500 watts of acoustic energy was being generated. In comparison, the average home radio set is intolerable to most listeners when more than a small fraction of an acoustic watt is generated.

In preparing for the demonstration the Bell Laboratory men, by a series of tests, established the sound level of 120 decibels as that at which tone becomes painful. They chose the 100 decibel maximum level, therefore, as being safe to project in the demonstration.

At the 100 decibel level the tone created was said to be about equivalent to that which 2,000 musicians could produce if they played on the same stage at the same time.

The films used were prepared in cooperation with the Philadelphia Orchestra, with Dr. Leopold Stokowski conducting. Dr. Stokowski "enhanced" the films made from the music of his organization.

After intermission, Paul Robeson, baritone, was heard in a scene from "The Emperor Jones." This was enhanced by Harold Burris-Meyer. Next the Salt Lake City Tabernacle Choir, with Frank W. Asper at the organ, was heard in several choral selections and Mr. Asper played three organ compositions. The music ended with the immolation scene from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung."

Dr. Harvey Fletcher, director of the Bell Laboratories, and a large staff of assistants operated the equipment which was created under his direction in a long series of researches that began about 1933. The recordings heard last night were made in 1939.

The concert will be repeated tonight for anotther audience of invited guests.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OAKLAND, CAL.
POST-INQUIRER

APR 11 1940

THE HUMAN SIDE of IT

by A. E. Anderson

Mr. Anderson is a lecturer in the Extension Division of the University of California and a member of The Post-Enquirer editorial staff. His articles are a daily feature of this page.

Composer as a Freshman

With the performance of his Third Symphony by Arturo Toscanini conducting the N. B. C. Symphony orchestra, American composer Roy Harris has gained a recognition given to no other native composer in recent years. Boston Symphony orchestra's Sergei Koussevitzky is reported to have said of it: "This is the first truly great symphonic work to be written in America."

I can't claim enough technical knowledge of music to plunge recklessly into a controversial field and announce whether or not I appreciated the symphony as I heard it over the air. I'll admit it didn't seem to have the scope and power of a symphony by Beethoven nor the rich musical inventiveness of one by Mozart. Like most modern music, it sounded to me somewhat vague and loosely put together, rather casual and forced in spots, but I dare say the composer himself doesn't expect his friends to believe that in this effort to create an authentically American musical composition he has attained at one stride the perfection of the greatest masters of his art with their centuries of development back of them.

I know that Roy Harris is both an earnest artist and one not easily satisfied with his own achievements. You see, I knew him when he was starting to compose—in fact, before he had clearly made up his mind to be a composer.

That was about 20 years ago. He was taking some courses at the University of California when I was teaching on the campus and he happened to be enrolled in my course in English composition. I noticed the blond gangling young fellow from Oklahoma because he wrote interesting essays and free-verse poems and we became well acquainted. He used to like to come into my office to talk.

One day he put a problem before me. It was this: should he go into music as a life work, or into philosophy, or into writing poems like Walt Whitman's? He found these three possibilities almost equally alluring and couldn't make up his mind which to choose. Could he perhaps pursue all three of them?

It was an astonishing issue for a freshman to present to his instructor. He had been reading widely and had formed his own ideas and felt as much at home in the worlds of Plato, Wagner and Whitman as the average freshman in the realm of inter-collegiate football.

I advised him to go into music. His poems in Whitman's manner, I pointed out to him, were imitative and even crude, his philosophical thoughts and the essays in which he expressed them at once suggested Nietzsche as their source, but in music he had mastered a technique and developed an accent of his own. Wouldn't it be better to do in music what Nietzsche had done in philosophy and Whitman in poetry than to echo their effects in their own provinces?

He invited me to his room to hear some of his earliest compositions. Though a freshman student, he was married and lived with his young wife in a queer hexagonal cabin built for private theatricals. It had a platform across one end and on this platform stood his grand piano. Harris and his wife were raw food addicts at that time and sitting on the floor, we ate a meal of nuts, raisins and fruit. Then the youthful composer mounted the platform and played.

I seem to remember being struck by a note of independence in those early compositions of his. They were awkward and simple, but not trivial. He seemed to be groping his way towards some expression of his own.

I'm pretty sure he would have become a composer no matter what I had advised him, but it gives me a satisfaction to remember that I had the discernment to recommend the road he took.

Globe MUSIC April 13

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Of the seven symphonies by the Finnish Jean Sibelius only the Fourth and Sixth have not become fairly well known in Boston. The Fourth had, in fact, not been heard here for more than seven years until Serge Koussevitzky played it at the Boston Symphony concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program began with another comparative rarity, the "Benvenuto Cellini" Overture of Berlioz, and was completed with Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and the Strauss tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

How baffling the Sibelius Fourth must have sounded when it was new to Boston in 1913! Even today, after most people have become accustomed to the Sibelius idiom, it is not too readily assimilable. Most of the applicable words describing it were long since used—"enigmatic," "inscrutable," "elusive," "bleak," "spare,' "melancholy,' "improvisatory." Commonplace as these may now sound they all fit the Fourth Symphony in some degree. Assuredly this is the sort of music that, so far as the great public is concerned, must be heard repeatedly before there can be much comprehension.

Yet the A minor Symphony was a logical successor to the first three and a mark of progress in the instrumental compression, the emotional reticence and condensation of form that found its peak in the single movement of the Seventh Symphony. The brass in the first movement of the Fourth echo a little the Sibelius Second, and elsewhere there are suggestions of the "pastoral" quality of the Third.

The short phrases, seemingly unrelated but actually component parts of a shrewdly conceived form; the increasing use of dissonance; the sudden, capricious endings of the movements, a tendency to fewer big emotional outbursts, all these point the way to the later Sibelius. If any one characteristic persists all the way through, it is an introspective lonelines. Purely as music the Fourth Symphony is subtle and fascinating. Let us hope we shall hear it again before another seven years have passed.

It might not be a bad idea if the Boston Symphony were to play badly once in a while, just so that we may not take its incredible virtuosity for granted. The whole concert yesterday was astonishingly fine all the way through. The tone was magnificent and each piece was so performed that one is tempted to say: "This way, and no other, is the perfect interpretation."

Berlioz' Overture, one of the cleverest and noisiest of all compositions, and the lovable "Till" were musical equivalents of diamonds, sparkling with a thousand facets. The Schubert Symphony, too, was a joy from start to finish.

C. W. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMERICAN HEBREW
NEW YORK CITY

APR 12 1940

MUSIC

UPON Arturo Toscanini's return to the conductor's stand of the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra, he presented Roy Harris' Third Symphony, a work which impressed this critic as one of the finest works yet produced by this brilliant American composer. Not only strength and originality are in this work, but also a fine brooding vein of poetry, even a tender melancholy. This is poetic music, sensitively written, one of the most creditable contributions to the American music of our time.

By a singular coincidence Victor issues this very symphony this month in a recording by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Roy Harris. Toscanini's performance emphasized the poetry of the music, Koussevitzky's intensifies the dramatic thrust. In either performance, the work emerges forcefully; and the Victor recording is superb.

The first of the Mozart-Handel series by the New Friends of Music Orchestra, conducted by Fritz Stiedry, brought us two Mozart piano concertos exquisitely played by Arthur Schnabel (has anyone ever heard a more eloquent reading of the slow movement of the C-major, than that given by Schnabel that afternoon?) and the Prague Symphony in a vivid and forceful reading by conductor and orchestra.

At the Philharmonic concerts, Rosalyn Tureck gave a rather unimpressive interpretation of the Emperor concerto of Beethoven.

Pianism of an extraordinary character, however, was to be heard at Josef Hofmann's only recital. To speak of Hofmann's command of his instrument, to describe his tone, touch, command of dynamics, is to indulge in lavish rhapsodies; there is no one quite like him. We had an opportunity to hear him play for the first time the Bach-Busoni Chaconne. True he did not adhere meticulously to the printed page; but what matter, if the result was a performance of such power and majesty?

Interesting piano performances can be heard on current records. Ernest Victor Wolff plays the Haydn D-major piano sonata with beautiful style and fine taste for Columbia Records. Haydn sonatas for piano are such strangers on records that you will undoubtedly welcome this recording. Alfred Mirovitch has recorded some unusual piano gems for Royale, including the Varations Come un' Agnello by Mozart and a disc of Mehul, a delightful Rondo. Mirovitch plays pleasantly, and the Royale recording is generally good.

Another interesting new Columbia recording is the Jean Francaix arrangement of Boccherini music for ballet entitled Scuola di Ballo. This is not very important music, but if it is a light and infectious idiom that delights you, you will be enchanted by this work. It is nicely played by the London Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Antal Dorati.

—David Ewen.

Her. Apr 13

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Berlioz....Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"
Sibelius..Symphony No. 4 in A minor Op. 63
Schubert..."Unfinished" Symphony in B minor Strauss.
"Till Eulenspiegel," Tone Poem Op. 28

The credentials of a dyed-in-the-wool Sibelius enthusiast are to be found in unswerving admiration of the Fourth Symphony. You have but to read such authorities as Cecil Gray on this subject to learn what it requires to rank in this group. Another test of the true Sibelian is the String Quartet, "Voces Intimae"; but the Fourth Symphony is even starker and bleaker and hence less easy to enjoy at a first hearing.

All this is by way of prelude to the reluctant confession that we can not count ourselves among the elect. Anyone, of course, must respect the tremendous individuality of the music. Nor should we wish to deny the touches of genius, especially in the finale. It is only that we feel these to be rare and occasional flashes that do not for us illuminate the whole symphony. Possibly this is a long way of saying that much of the Symphony is a bore, but out of respect to Sibelius one must find at first polite terms for expressing an impolite attitude.

We are fully prepared to admit that this attitude may be a blind spot and that we missed yesterday a great musical experience. It should be remembered, however, that Sibelius is one of the most uneven composers, with a wide gulf between his finest and his poorest scores. Yet his admirers agree in thinking the Fourth Symphony a masterpiece from start to finish. It was interesting to hear it again yesterday after eight years, though for us something of a disappointment. The expression this lcak of appreciation is made with some embarrassment, as when one is caught napping in church.

The rest of the music on yesterday's program does not need much comment. The familiar beauties of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the wit and vigor of "Till Eulenspiegel" were marvellously recreated for us by the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky. Actually the performance of "Till" was a miracle of precision, sonority and rythmical vitality. To open the program Mr. Koussevitzky gave us, as he does not often do, an overture, the noisy and effective "Benevenuto Cellini" by Berlioz.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program is as follows: Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for string orchestra Op. 46 (for the first time); Paul Hindemith's Violin Concerto (also for the first time, with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concert master, as soloist); Alexander Scriabin's "The Divine Poem," Symphony No. 3 in C minor Op. 43.

New York Times

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 10, 1940

Sound Waves 'Rock' Carnegie Hall As 'Enhanced Music' Is Played

'Stereophonic Reproduction' Demonstrated by Bell Laboratories—Tones Near Limit That the Human Ear Can Hear

The loudest musical sounds ever created crashed and echoed through venerable Carnegie Hall last night as a specially invited audience listened, spellbound, and at times not a little terrified.

Staged by the engineers of the Bell Telephone Laboratories, the performance was not a concert but a demonstration of the seemingly unlimited capabilities of a new system of "stereophonic reproduction of enhanced music" previously recorded on films.

Three huge loudspeaking devices, concealed behind stage front drops of gossamer-like fabrics, over which various colored lighting effects were cast, received the electrical power created by three large amplifiers in the basement of the hall.

The musical impetus supplied to each bank of loudspeakers came from a separate sound track on the same film, each track feeding its respective tonal message to one of the speaker units. A fourth track on the film was used automatically to govern the overall tonal loudness of the program.

Demonstration Is Explained

Before the musical presentation, Dr. Frank B. Jewett, president of Bell Laboratories, explained that the music of orchestra or drama, first had been recorded in the usual way, after which the conductor or dramatic director again was called in to "enhance" the sound film. Dr. Jewett and others explained that in recording very wide dynamic ranges in music, the original sounds had been compressed automatically.

In the playback or performance of the music, the 2,000 odd guests were told, it finally was necessary to "expand" the music again to its original dynamic proportions. This is where the "enhancement" comes in.

As the music from the original film or films is heard, it is rerecorded on a fresh film, from which to be projected to listeners. At this point the conductor uses a small machine somewhat resembling a cash register. By moving three controls he is able relatively to expand or compress each of the sound tracks and thus to "enhance" the general output as a whole, or any specific part of it.

It was explained that in the original recording, three separate microphones, widely separated, are used. Each microphone puts its own version upon the film. Then, when reproduced through the separate loudspeakers at the final performance, after being "enhanced" the music is heard by the audience in "stereophonic" proportions, or in a kind of musical "third dimension."

The sounds heard varied in "level" or acoustical power by as much as one billion times. When the conductor who did the "enhancing" in making the film wanted a very faint sound, it did not seem to matter whether the performance was by a full orchestra or a giant chorus. The enhanser could tone it down. When he wanted a stupefying volume of tone, that in Carnegie Hall seemed to shake the building, he got it instantly.

Miss Hazel Hayes was the soloist. But, as the Bell Laboratory men pointed out, the performance was a demonstration, not a concert.

Huge Tone Variation

The musical tones heard varied, according to the engineers, from 40 to 15,000 cycles, completely covering the average range of human hearing. At the maximum sound level about 1,500 watts of acoustic energy was being generated. In comparison, the average home radio set is intolerable to most listeners when more than a small fraction of an acoustic watt is generated.

In preparing for the demonstration the Bell Laboratory men, by a series of tests, established the sound level of 120 decibels as that at which tone becomes painful. They chose the 100 decibel maximum level, therefore, as being safe to project in the demonstration.

At the 100 decibel level the tone created was said to be about equivalent to that which 2,000 musicians could produce if they played on the same stage at the same time.

The films used were prepared in cooperation with the Philadelphia Orchestra, with Dr. Leopold Stokowski conducting. Dr. Stokowski "enhanced" the films made from the music of his organization.

After intermission, Paul Robeson, baritone, was heard in a scene from "The Emperor Jones." This was enhanced by Harold Burris-Meyer. Next the Salt Lake City Tabernacle Choir, with Frank W. Asper at the organ, was heard in several choral selections and Mr. Asper played three organ compositions. The music ended with the immolation scene from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung."

Dr. Harvey Fletcher, director of the Bell Laboratories, and a large staff of assistants operated the equipment which was created under his direction in a long series of researches that began about 1933. The recordings heard last night were made in 1939.

The concert will be repeated tonight for anotther audience of invited guests.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OAKLAND, CAL.
POST-INQUIRER

APR 11 1940

THE HUMAN SIDE of IT

by A. E. Anderson

Mr. Anderson is a lecturer in the Extension Division of the University of California and a member of The Post-Enquirer editorial staff. His articles are a daily feature of this page.

Composer as a Freshman

With the performance of his Third Symphony by Arturo Toscanini conducting the N. B. C. Symphony orchestra, American composer Roy Harris has gained a recognition given to no other native composer in recent years. Boston Symphony orchestra's Sergei Koussevitzky is reported to have said of it: "This is the first truly great symphonic work to be written in America."

I can't claim enough technical knowledge of music to plunge recklessly into a controversial field and announce whether or not I appreciated the symphony as I heard it over the air. I'll admit it didn't seem to have the scope and power of a symphony by Beethoven nor the rich musical inventiveness of one by Mozart. Like most modern music, it sounded to me somewhat vague and loosely put together, rather casual and forced in spots, but I dare say the composer himself doesn't expect his friends to believe that in this effort to create an authentically American musical composition he has attained at one stride the perfection of the greatest masters of his art with their centuries of development back of them.

I know that Roy Harris is both an earnest artist and one not easily satisfied with his own achievements. You see, I knew him when he was starting to compose—in fact, before he had clearly made up his mind to be a composer.

That was about 20 years ago. He was taking some courses at the University of California when I was teaching on the campus and he happened to be enrolled in my course in English composition. I noticed the blond gangling young fellow from Oklahoma because he wrote interesting essays and free-verse poems and we became well acquainted. He used to like to come into my office to talk.

One day he put a problem before me. It was this: should he go into music as a life work, or into philosophy, or into writing poems like Walt Whitman's? He found these three possibilities almost equally alluring and couldn't make up his mind which to choose. Could he perhaps pursue all three of them?

It was an astonishing issue for a freshman to present to his instructor. He had been reading widely and had formed his own ideas and felt as much at home in the worlds of Plato, Wagner and Whitman as the average freshman in the realm of inter-collegiate football.

I advised him to go into music. His poems in Whitman's manner, I pointed out to him, were imitative and even crude, his philosophical thoughts and the essays in which he expressed them at once suggested Nietzsche as their source, but in music he had mastered a technique and developed an accent of his own. Wouldn't it be better to do in music what Nietzsche had done in philosophy and Whitman in poetry than to echo their effects in their own provinces?

He invited me to his room to hear some of his earliest compositions. Though a freshman student, he was married and lived with his young wife in a queer hexagonal cabin built for private theatricals. It had a platform across one end and on this platform stood his grand piano. Harris and his wife were raw food addicts at that time and sitting on the floor, we ate a meal of nuts, raisins and fruit. Then the youthful composer mounted the platform and played.

I seem to remember being struck by a note of independence in those early compositions of his. They were awkward and simple, but not trivial. He seemed to be groping his way towards some expression of his own.

I'm pretty sure he would have become a composer no matter what I had advised him, but it gives me a satisfaction to remember that I had the discernment to recommend the road he took.

Globe April 13

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Of the seven symphonies by the Finnish Jean Sibelius only the Fourth and Sixth have not become fairly well known in Boston. The Fourth had, in fact, not been heard here for more than seven years until Serge Koussevitzky played it at the Boston Symphony concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program began with another comparative rarity, the "Benvenuto Cellini" Overture of Berlioz, and was completed with Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and the Strauss tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

How baffling the Sibelius Fourth must have sounded when it was new to Boston in 1913! Even today, after most people have become accustomed to the Sibelius idiom, it is not too readily assimilable. Most of the applicable words describing it were long since used—"enigmatic," "inscrutable," "elusive," "bleak," "spare,' "melancholy,' "improvisatory." Commonplace as these may now sound they all fit the Fourth Symphony in some degree. Assuredly this is the sort of music that, so far as the great public is concerned, must be heard repeatedly before there can be much comprehension.

Yet the A minor Symphony was a logical successor to the first three and a mark of progress in the instrumental compression, the emotional reticence and condensation of form that found its peak in the single movement of the Seventh Symphony. The brass in the first movement of the Fourth echo a little the Sibelius Second, and elsewhere there are suggestions of the "pastoral" quality of the Third.

The short phrases, seemingly unrelated but actually component parts of a shrewdly conceived form; the increasing use of dissonance; the sudden, capricious endings of the movements, a tendency to fewer big emotional outbursts, all these point the way to the later Sibelius. If any one characteristic persists all the way through, it is an introspective lonelines. Purely as music the Fourth Symphony is subtle and fascinating. Let us hope we shall hear it again before another seven years have passed.

It might not be a bad idea if the Boston Symphony were to play badly once in a while, just so that we may not take its incredible virtuosity for granted. The whole concert yesterday was astonishingly fine all the way through. The tone was magnificent and each piece was so performed that one is tempted to say: "This way, and no other, is the perfect interpretation."

Berlioz' Overture, one of the cleverest and noisiest of all compositions, and the lovable "Till" were musical equivalents of diamonds, sparkling with a thousand facets. The Schubert Symphony, too, was a joy from start to finish.

C. W. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMERICAN HEBREW
NEW YORK CITY

APR 12 1940

MUSIC

UPON Arturo Toscanini's return to the conductor's stand of the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra, he presented Roy Harris' Third Symphony, a work which impressed this critic as one of the finest works yet produced by this brilliant American composer. Not only strength and originality are in this work, but also a fine brooding vein of poetry, even a tender melancholy. This is poetic music, sensitively written, one of the most creditable contributions to the American music of our time.

By a singular coincidence Victor issues this very symphony this month in a recording by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Roy Harris. Toscanini's performance emphasized the poetry of the music, Koussevitzky's intensifies the dramatic thrust. In either performance, the work emerges forcefully; and the Victor recording is superb.

The first of the Mozart-Handel series by the New Friends of Music Orchestra, conducted by Fritz Stiedry, brought us two Mozart piano concertos exquisitely played by Arthur Schnabel (has anyone ever heard a more eloquent reading of the slow movement of the C-major, than that given by Schnabel that afternoon?) and the Prague Symphony in a vivid and forceful reading by conductor and orchestra.

At the Philharmonic concerts, Rosalyn Tureck gave a rather unimpressive interpretation of the Emperor concerto of Beethoven.

Pianism of an extraordinary character, however, was to be heard at Josef Hofmann's only recital. To speak of Hofmann's command of his instrument, to describe his tone, touch, command of dynamics, is to indulge in lavish rhapsodies; there is no one quite like him. We had an opportunity to hear him play for the first time the Bach-Busoni Chaconne. True he did not adhere meticulously to the printed page; but what matter, if the result was a performance of such power and majesty?

Interesting piano performances can be heard on current records. Ernest Victor Wolff plays the Haydn D-major piano sonata with beautiful style and fine taste for Columbia Records. Haydn sonatas for piano are such strangers on records that you will undoubtedly welcome this recording. Alfred Mirovitch has recorded some unusual piano gems for Royale, including the Varations Come un' Agnello by Mozart and a disc of Mehul, a delightful Rondo. Mirovitch plays pleasantly, and the Royale recording is generally good.

Another interesting new Columbia recording is the Jean Francaix arrangement of Boccherini music for ballet entitled Scuola di Ballo. This is not very important music, but if it is a light and infectious idiom that delights you, you will be enchanted by this work. It is nicely played by the London Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Antal Dorati.

—David Ewen.

Her. Apr 13

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Berlioz....Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"
Sibelius..Symphony No. 4 in A minor Op. 63
Schubert..."Unfinished" Symphony in B minor Strauss.
"Till Eulenspiegel," Tone Poem Op. 28

The credentials of a dyed-in-the-wool Sibelius enthusiast are to be found in unswerving admiration of the Fourth Symphony. You have but to read such authorities as Cecil Gray on this subject to learn what it requires to rank in this group. Another test of the true Sibelian is the String Quartet, "Voces Intimae": but the Fourth Symphony is even starker and bleaker and hence less easy to enjoy at a first hearing.

All this is by way of prelude to the reluctant confession that we can not count ourselves among the elect. Anyone, of course, must respect the tremendous individuality of the music. Nor should we wish to deny the touches of genius, especially in the finale. It is only that we feel these to be rare and occasional flashes that do not for us illuminate the whole symphony. Possibly this is a long way of saying that much of the Symphony is a bore, but out of respect to Sibelius one must find at first polite terms for expressing an impolite attitude.

We are fully prepared to admit that this attitude may be a blind spot and that we missed yesterday a great musical experience. It should be remembered, however, that Sibelius is one of the most uneven composers, with a wide gulf between his finest and his poorest scores. Yet his admirers agree in thinking the Fourth Symphony a masterpiece from start to finish. It was interesting to hear it again yesterday after eight years, though for us something of a disappointment. The expression this lcak of appreciation is made with some embarrassment, as when one is caught napping in church.

The rest of the music on yesterday's program does not need much comment. The familiar beauties of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the wit and vigor of "Till Eulenspiegel" were marvellously recreated for us by the orcheatra under Mr. Koussevitzky. Actually the performance of "Till" was a miracle of precision, sonerity and rythmical vitality. To open the program Mr. Koussevitzky gave us, as he does not often do, an overture, the noisy and effective "Benevenuto Cellini" by Berlioz.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program is as follows: Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for string orchestra Op. 46 (for the first time); Paul Hindemith's Violin Concerto (also for the first time, with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concert master, as soloist); A[illegible] Scriabin's "The Divine Po[illegible] Symphony No. 3 in C

Hannikainen Here

Transcript April 12

Finnish Conductor Leads Special Pops Concert for Finnish Relief on May 12

Tauno Hannikainen, famous Finnish conductor, who came recently from Helsinki with his charming wife Arvida, dramatic opera singer, to direct as guest conductor the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and New York and to give some other concerts for Finnish relief, has given no interviews the last few days.

More than one newspaperman who has tried to ask his reaction to the late news from the Scandinavian countries, has been told: "Please excuse us if we cannot answer your questions. We cannot think. We cannot talk. We have been waiting for six weeks from minute to minute for news of our 19-year-old son, Ylermi, who has been fighting in Finland. . . ."

But those who have seen the Hannikainens lately in their Boston residence, are aware of the anguish and anxiety which they bravely conceal in their gallant attempt to do their part for their mutilated homeland through their own distinguished musical talents.

The other evening, Mrs. Hannikainen, in a conversation after dinner, said pathetically: "No news from our son. . . . No news from our parents. . . . We have recently learned that our beautiful home in Turku has been bombed and burned by Russian planes

Mrs. Hannikainen, a slender attractive woman, who, though Finnish has dark hair but typical blue eyes, in her pretty broken accent continued: "When I first came to this country I had planned to assist my husband in his work for Finland, by giving supplementary recitals of vocal music. You see, I am an opera singer. I have studied dramatic opera in Milan with Mr. Wigley and Giraldoni and in Paris with Madame Litwinne, whose husband was a conductor at the Metropolitan in New York.

"My last appearance on the stage was in 'La Tosca' in Helsinki with the Finnish Opera Company one year ago. But I have experienced so many horrors of war in Finland before I left, and news from Finland has been so frightful since our arrival in this country, that I really do not find it in my heart to sing. . . . Not knowing anything of my Ylermi I was planning to go back to Finland as soon as possible, to do my part in helping my country over there, where help of every kind is now much needed."

"But Finland is in a bag now" Mr. Hannikainen interrupted. "With the Baltic sea full of German mines, with fighting in Norway, with Russia not allowing any trespassing of foreigners, how can my wife go back to Finland?"

Mrs. Hannikainen left us and walked alone into an adjoining room, which was unlighted. In a moment Mr. Hannikainen followed her. "Would you like to come for a walk, Arvida?" he asked. "No, Tauno," she answered "you must stay at home and practice for your next concerts, and I should practice for mine, too."

Then in a few minutes, from the music room, came the opening of a stirring Finnish folksong.

Tomorrow afternoon at 2.45 Mr. Hannikainen appears at the Gardner Museum as 'cello soloist in a Corelli Sonata, a Bach Chorale-Prelude, a Handel Menuett, an Elegy by Van Goens, Sibelius's "Song of My Heart," a Finnish folksong arranged for 'cello by Palmgren, Kreisler's "Liebebleid" and a Tarantella by Popper.

On the 12th of May Mr. Hannikainen will conduct a special Boston Symphony "Pop" Concert for the Finnish Relief. The first half of his program will consist of works by Sibelius.

Renato Mazza

Boston Symphony At Sanders Theater

The Boston Symphony concluded its Cambridge season last night with a brilliant concert at Sanders Theater. The program, including only three numbers, was an ascending series in effectiveness and enthusiasm.

The evening began with the overture to Berlioz's opera "Benvenuto Cellini," still a striking piece of music after a hundred years, if a bit too clamorous for the narrow confines of Sanders. It should go better in Symphony Hall, where it has not been heard for more than a decade.

The gentle lyricism of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony was a happy contrast. Mr. Koussevitzky, blessed with unparalleled woodwinds and horns, gave it a restrained and beautiful performance that lent all the more credibility to the theory that Schubert left the symphony in its two brief movements because thus it was a complete and perfect whole.

The playing of Tchaikovsky's Fifth was a rare and eloquent triumph for both conductor and orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky is noted for his ability to find a meaning, a genuineness, in Tchaikovsky that other conductors miss. Last night he offered a performance that will not soon be surpassed, one which brought the Harvard audience to its feet cheering. Particularly memorable was the second movement with its marvelous interplay of the two themes between strings and woodwinds, in which Mr. Koussevitzky kept each voice separated and yet unified.

E. B. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 13 1940

Final Symphony Program

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its fifth and last concert of the season in Providence next Tuesday evening in the Metropolitan Theatre. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen Tchaikovsky as the composer for the closing number, this in observance of the 100th anniversary of the Russian composer's birth being celebrated this spring. The program will open with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and also include the Symphony in B minor, known as the "Unfinished" Symphony, by Franz Schubert. Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor will conclude the concert and the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

APR 13 1940

AT RADCLIFFE—

Miss Barbara Gatchell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Theodore A. Gatchell, will be one of the members of the Choral Society of Radcliffe College to take part in the annual pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, April 21. This year the orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will present Bach's "Mass in B-minor," assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society, the Harvard Glee Club and soloists.

The appearance of the Radcliffe and Harvard singers with the orchestra has been an annual occurrence since 1924. This year marks the fortieth anniversary of the organization of the Radcliffe group.

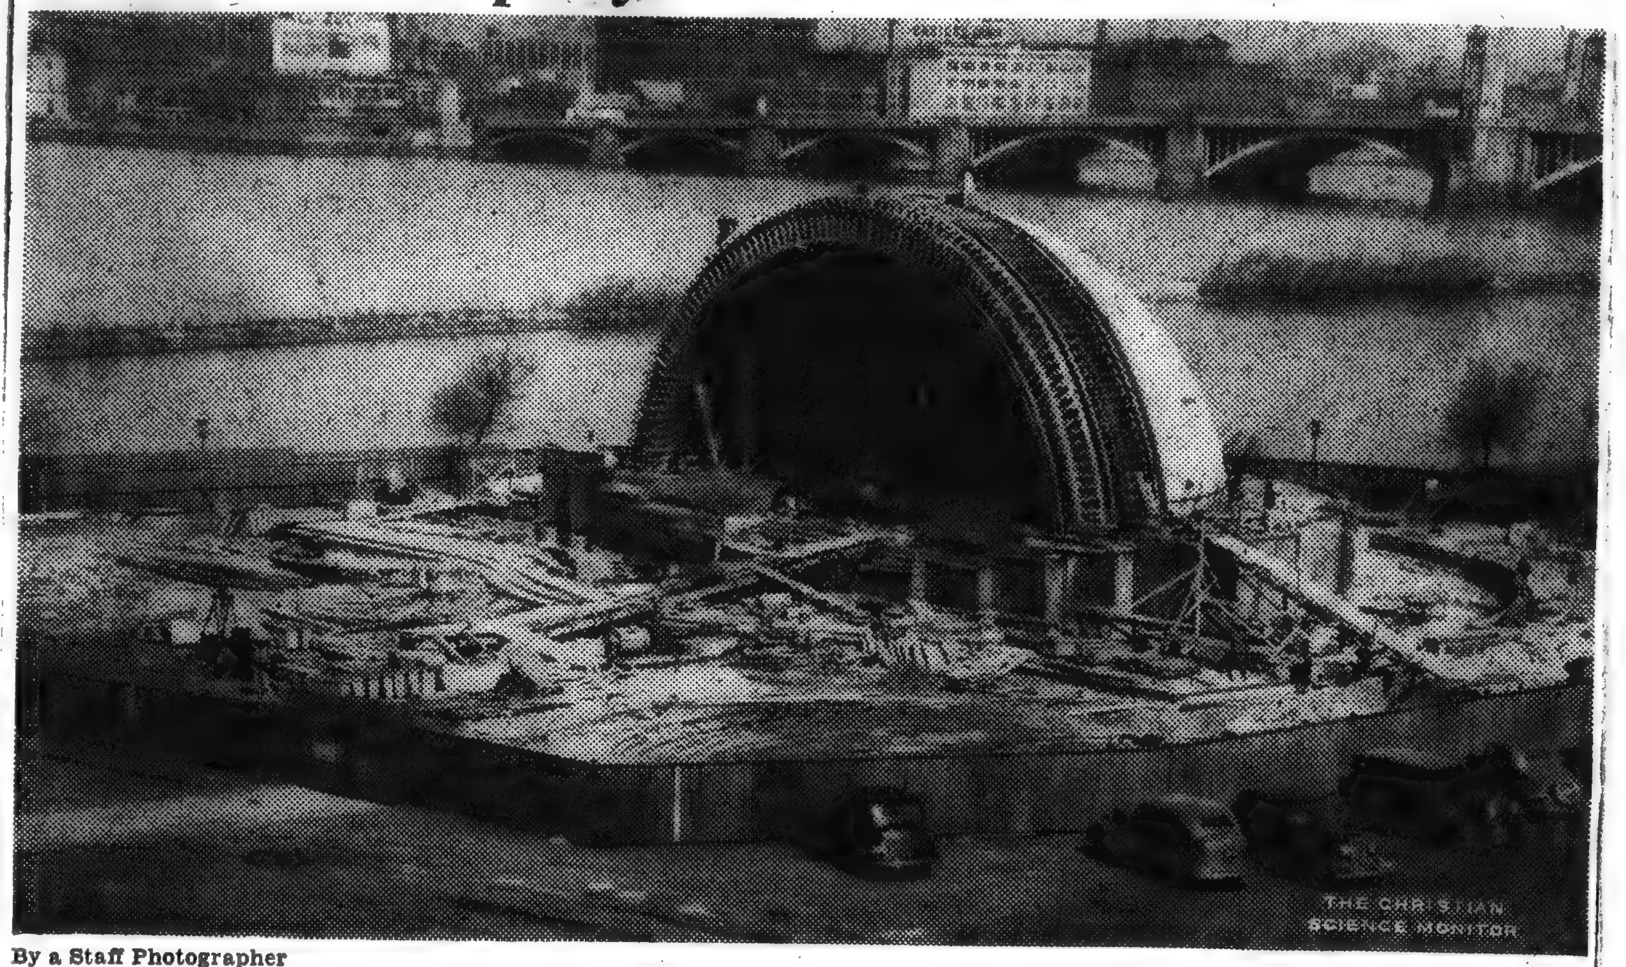
YORK VILLAGE, ME
OLD YORK
TRANSCRIPT
4/15/40

Among those who were in attendance when Mrs. Carl Dreyfus gave, at the Chilton Club in Boston recently, a lecture on "Serge Koussevitsky—A Personal Portrait," were Mrs. Robert Farley Clark and Mrs. Eben Stanwood. The lecture was given under the auspices of the Woman's Civic Federation of Massachusetts.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, FRIDAY, APRIL 12, 1940

20

Will Amplify Summer Music Tones



By a Staff Photographer

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

How Edward Hatch Memorial Shell Looks Now

Workmen are making satisfying progress toward completing this $270,000 acoustical structure on the Charles River Esplanade at Boston, which will add to the enjoyment of many thousands of listeners at the popular outdoor Pop Concerts. The shell diffuses and multiplies the sound of the orchestra by sounding board methods. New shell is three times size of one formerly used by Arthur Fiedler.

Concert Shell Work Gains

Rapid progress is being made toward completion of the new $270,000 Edward Hatch Memorial Shell, which will house the Charles River Esplanade Concerts this coming summer. This shell will be three times the size of the former acoustical shell used by Conductor Arthur Fiedler, and will have a seating capacity for 150 musicians.

Green granite from Conway, N. H., in an 18-inch base, will mark the shrubbery line on the horizontal of the shell. Pink granite, according to the architects' specifications, will trim the front. A retreating "cone" of teakwood, brushed and filled with aluminum paint will make up the interior of the shell.

The exterior—now well along—will have an unusual composition. It may be of garnet, or, if not, of a quartz terrazzo of undetermined color, but with the effect of thousands of reflecting mirrors.

The new shell will have seven concentric rings or sounding boards. The old 60-foot apron has increased to 150 feet. The stage will be 101 feet deep and will have a 51-foot span from apex to stage. The floor space thus will be slightly larger than the stage in Symphony Hall.

Another feature of the shell will be the use of reflectors providing indirect light and producing the illusion of lifting the musicians out against a background. Showers and locker rooms for the musicians will be built beneath the stage.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
EXAMINER

APR 13 1940

Koussevitzky Style Wins N. Y. Plaudits

By Florence Lawrence

NEW YORK, April 12.—This symphony-mad city is still unwilling to see the end of the orchestral season, and recently packed Carnegie Hall to its utmost in standing room to hear Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. Final in a concert series which has brought the Massachusetts group regularly to delight New York sponsors, the reception to conductor and instrumentalists was thrilling, and the program itself of dramatically contrasting effect.

* * *

Koussevitzky has great dignity and a masterful but extremely simple directorial method. He admits of no physical gyrations, uses a baton and, on rare occasions where he must turn from his full face to his men, makes an almost military about face without disturbing the elegance of his upright posture or bending of the body from the waist. The orchestra and the music is apparently the sole object of his presence on the podium, and he seems to essay a formality which aims to be inconspicuous. Not that he is. The audience watches him closely and, like the instrumentalists before him, responds to every change of rhythm or tempo.

Two symphonies, the Beethoven No. 4 in B flat major, opus 60, and Tschaikowsky's No. 5, in E minor, constituted the program. Most notable feature of the Beethoven was the amazing tone color of the strings. In this work, with its limited use of woodwinds and brasses, violas and cellos have frequent opportunity to lend unusual poignancy to the score. The gracious and concise beauty of this symphony was magnificently expressed and the performance was greeted with storms of plaudits.

* * *

A studied interpretation of the Tschaikowsky gave little leeway to Russian temperament, but the magnificent crescendo which completed the second movement was brilliantly handled. Despite several fortissimo passages, the strings were always singing and melodious, and the Andanté Maestoso and Allegro Vivace of the last movement were powerful and moving, enriched by brilliant elucidation of secondary themes.

Cheers and plaudits which lasted for nearly 10 minutes at the conclusion of the concert marked the audience's approval of this event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER

APR 14 1940

Three girls from the suburbs are members of the Choral Society at Radcliffe College and will take part in the annual Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Sunday. They are: Miss Joyce Peloubet, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Wardell Peloubet, of Sagamore rd., Maplewood, and Miss Doris Ann Hoagland, daughter of Mrs. W. C. Hoagland, of Summit st., and Miss Jane Hyde, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Reed Warren Hyde, of Mountain ave., both of Summit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

APR 13 1940

seems to me that this music is more welcome as a revival than as something to be heard frequently. Certain awkward or repetitious passages grow too obvious when one listens more or less constantly to the symphony. If one takes it sparingly, one isn't so aware of these infelicities. The emotional power then reasserts itself, and, unless one has developed an allergy to the score, the symphony becomes a stimulating experience.

Mr. Toscanini's Tchaikovsky session included, along with the symphony, the "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasy and the "Nutcracker" suite. Mr. Toscanini's last previous performance of the suite took place, it is said, more than forty years ago, and he made up for his abstinence from this charming collection of ballet bits with a fascinating projection of their merits.

The normally well-behaved studio audience broke with convention at two points during the symphony. After the second movement, somebody tried to start applause, and after the third, everybody tried—and succeeded. Nobody, however, emulated the example of a Western concert audience which, if the story isn't an invention, accompanied the "Our Love" melody in "Romeo and Juliet" with a whistling obbligato.

naps you'll recall Vladimir Horowitz's brilliant performance of the B-flat minor piano concerto with the Philharmonic-Symphony, especially if you heard it—in Carnegie Hall or on the radio.

Fifteen years ago, Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony, the "Pathetic," was the nation's No. 1 on the orchestral hit parade. Almost every conductor shook a stick at it, and the mere announcement that it would be played was money in the box office. Since then the symphony's career hasn't been so spectacular. The music hasn't been neglected, but, except for Mr. Toscanini's performances of it last season (the first times he had directed it here), most of the hearings haven't started any especial ruckus.

Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Toscanini presented this symphony only three days apart, so now is probably as good a time as any to check on one's reactions to it. Mr. Koussevitzky's handling was dramatic and sometimes florid, with emphasis on details; Mr. Toscanini's was pointed and unified. The former's interpretation may have appeared more high-tension than it really was because it had been preceded by a singularly gracious and delicately modelled performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

Tossing out any literary or personal associations the "Pathetic" may have, it 20

Hannikainen Here

Transcript April 12

Finnish Conductor Leads Special Pops Concert for Finnish Relief on May 12

Tauno Hannikainen, famous Finnish conductor, who came recently from Helsinki with his charming wife Arvida, dramatic opera singer, to direct as guest conductor the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and New York and to give some other concerts for Finnish relief, has given no interviews the last few days.

More than one newspaperman who has tried to ask his reaction to the late news from the Scandinavian countries, has been told: "Please excuse us if we cannot answer your questions. We cannot think. We cannot talk. We have been waiting for six weeks from minute to minute for news of our 19-year-old son, Ylermi, who has been fighting in Finland. . . ."

But those who have seen the Hannikainens lately in their Boston residence, are aware of the anguish and anxiety which they bravely conceal in their gallant attempt to do their part for their mutilated homeland through their own distinguished musical talents.

The other evening, Mrs. Hannikainen, in a conversation after dinner, said pathetically: "No news from our son. . . . No news from our parents. . . . We have recently learned that our beautiful home in Turku has been bombed and burned by Russian planes."

Mrs. Hannikainen, a slender attractive woman, who, though Finnish has dark hair but typical blue eyes, in her pretty broken accent continued: "When I first came to this country I had planned to assist my husband in his work for Finland, by giving supplementary recitals of vocal music. You see, I am an opera singer. I have studied dramatic opera in Milan with Mr. Wigley and Giraldoni and in Paris with Madame Litwinne, whose husband was a conductor at the Metropolitan in New York.

"My last appearance on the stage was in 'La Tosca' in Helsinki with the Finnish Opera Company one year ago. But I have experienced so many horrors of war in Finland before I left, and news from Finland has been so frightful since our arrival in this country, that I really do not find it in my heart to sing. . . . Not knowing anything of my Ylermi I was planning to go back to Finland as soon as possible, to do my part in helping my country over there, where help of every kind is now much needed."

"But Finland is in a bag now" Mr. Hannikainen interrupted. "With the Baltic sea full of German mines, with fighting in Norway, with Russia not allowing any trespassing of foreigners, how can my wife go back to Finland?"

Mrs. Hannikainen left us and walked alone into an adjoining room, which was unlighted. In a moment Mr. Hannikainen followed her. "Would you like to come for a walk, Arvida?" he asked. "No, Tauno," she answered "you must stay at home and practice for your next concerts, and I should practice for mine, too."

Then in a few minutes, from the music room, came the opening of a stirring Finnish folksong.

Tomorrow afternoon at 2.45 Mr. Hannikainen appears at the Gardner Museum as 'cello soloist in a Corelli Sonata, a Bach Chorale-Prelude, a Handel Menuett, an Elegy by Van Goens, Sibelius's "Song of My Heart," a Finnish folksong arranged for 'cello by Palmgren, Kreisler's "Liebebleid" and a Tarantella by Popper.

On the 12th of May Mr. Hannikainen will conduct a special Boston Symphony "Pop" Concert for the Finnish Relief. The first half of his program will consist of works by Sibelius.

Renato Massa

Boston Symphony At Sanders Theater

The Boston Symphony concluded its Cambridge season last night with a brilliant concert at Sanders Theater. The program, including only three numbers, was an ascending series in effectiveness and enthusiasm.

The evening began with the overture to Berlioz's opera "Benvenuto Cellini," still a striking piece of music after a hundred years, if a bit too clamorous for the narrow confines of Sanders. It should go better in Symphony Hall, where it has not been heard for more than a decade.

The gentle lyricism of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony was a happy contrast. Mr. Koussevitzky, blessed with unparalleled woodwinds and horns, gave it a restrained and beautiful performance that lent all the more credibility to the theory that Schubert left the symphony in its two brief movements because thus it was a complete and perfect whole.

The playing of Tchaikovsky's Fifth was a rare and eloquent triumph for both conductor and orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky is noted for his ability to find a meaning, a genuineness, in Tchaikovsky that other conductors miss. Last night he offered a performance that will not soon be surpassed, one which brought the Harvard audience to its feet cheering. Particularly memorable was the second movement with its marvelous interplay of the two themes between strings and woodwinds, in which Mr. Koussevitzky kept each voice separated and yet unified.

E. B. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 13 1940

Final Symphony Program

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its fifth and last concert of the season in Providence next Tuesday evening in the Metropolitan Theatre. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen Tchaikovsky as the composer for the closing number, this in observance of the 100th anniversary of the Russian composer's birth being celebrated this spring. The program will open with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and also include the Symphony in B minor, known as the "Unfinished" Symphony, by Franz Schubert. Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor will conclude the concert and the season.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, FRIDAY, APRIL 12, 1940

Will Amplify Summer Music Tones

By a Staff Photographer

How Edward Hatch Memorial Shell Looks Now

Workmen are making satisfying progress toward completing this $270,000 acoustical structure on the Charles River Esplanade at Boston, which will add to the enjoyment of many thousands of listeners at the popular outdoor Pop Concerts. The shell diffuses and multiplies the sound of the orchestra by sounding board methods. New shell is three times size of one formerly used by Arthur Fiedler.

Concert Shell Work Gains

Rapid progress is being made toward completion of the new $270,000 Edward Hatch Memorial Shell, which will house the Charles River Esplanade Concerts this coming summer. This shell will be three times the size of the former acoustical shell used by Conductor Arthur Fiedler, and will have a seating capacity for 150 musicians.

Green granite from Conway, N. H., in an 18-inch base, will mark the shrubbery line on the horizontal of the shell. Pink granite, according to the architects' specifications, will trim the front. A retreating "cone" of teakwood, brushed and filled with aluminum paint will make up the interior of the shell.

The exterior—now well along—will have an unusual composition. It may be of garnet, or, if not, of a quartz terrazzo of undetermined color, but with the effect of thousands of reflecting mirrors.

The new shell will have seven concentric rings or sounding boards. The old 60-foot apron has increased to 150 feet. The stage will be 101 feet deep and will have a 51-foot span from apex to stage. The floor space thus will be slightly larger than the stage in Symphony Hall.

Another feature of the shell will be the use of reflectors providing indirect light and producing the illusion of lifting the musicians out against a background. Showers and locker rooms for the musicians will be built beneath the stage.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

APR 13 1940

AT RADCLIFFE—

Miss Barbara Gatchell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Theodore A. Gatchell, will be one of the members of the Choral Society of Radcliffe College to take part in the annual pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, April 21. This year the orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will present Bach's "Mass in B-minor," assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society, the Harvard Glee Club and soloists.

The appearance of the Radcliffe and Harvard singers with the orchestra has been an annual occurrence since 1924. This year marks the fortieth anniversary of the organization of the Radcliffe group.

YORK VILLAGE, ME
OLD YORK
TRANSCRIPT
4/15/40

Among those who were in attendance when Mrs. Carl Dreyfus gave, at the Chilton Club in Boston recently, a lecture on "Serge Koussevitzky—A Personal Portrait," were Mrs. Robert Farley Clark and Mrs. Eben Stanwood. The lecture was given under the auspices of the [illegible] Civic Federation of Mass-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
EXAMINER

APR 13 1940

Koussevitzky Style Wins N. Y. Plaudits

By Florence Lawrence

NEW YORK, April 12.—This symphony-mad city is still unwilling to see the end of the orchestral season, and recently packed Carnegie Hall to its utmost in standing room to hear Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. Final in a concert series which has brought the Massachusetts group regularly to delight New York sponsors, the reception to conductor and instrumentalists was thrilling, and the program itself of dramatically contrasting effect.

* * *

Koussevitzky has great dignity and a masterful but extremely simple directorial method. He admits of no physical gyrations, uses a baton and, on rare occasions where he must turn from his full face to his men, makes an almost military about face without disturbing the elegance of his upright posture or bending of the body from the waist. The orchestra and the music is apparently the sole object of his presence on the podium, and he seems to essay a formality which aims to be inconspicuous. Not that he is. The audience watches him closely and, like the instrumentalists before him, responds to every change of rhythm or tempo.

Two symphonies, the Beethoven No. 4 in B flat major, opus 60, and Tschaikowsky's No. 5, in E minor, constituted the program. Most notable feature of the Beethoven was the amazing tone color of the strings. In this work, with its limited use of woodwinds and brasses, violas and cellos have frequent opportunity to lend unusual poignancy to the score. The gracious and concise beauty of this symphony was magnificently expressed and the performance was greeted with storms of plaudits.

* * *

A studied interpretation of the Tschaikowsky gave little leeway to Russian temperament, but the magnificent crescendo which completed the second movement was brilliantly handled. Despite several fortissimo passages, the strings were always singing and melodious, and the Andante Maestoso and Allegro Vivace of the last movement were powerful and moving, enriched by brilliant elucidation of secondary themes.

Cheers and plaudits which lasted for nearly 10 minutes at the conclusion of the concert marked the audience's approval of this event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER

APR 14 1940

Three girls from the suburbs are members of the Choral Society at Radcliffe College and will take part in the annual Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Sunday. They are: Miss Joyce Peloubet, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Wardell Peloubet, of Sagamore rd., Maplewood, and Miss Doris Ann Hoagland, daughter of Mrs. W. O. Hoagland, of Summit st., and Miss Jane Hyde, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Reed Warren Hyde, of Mountain ave., both of Summit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

APR 13 1940

seems to me that this music is more welcome as a revival than as something to be heard frequently. Certain awkward or repetitious passages grow too obvious when one listens more or less constantly to the symphony. If one takes it sparingly, one isn't so aware of these infelicities. The emotional power then reasserts itself, and, unless one has developed an allergy to the score, the symphony becomes a stimulating experience.

MR. TOSCANINI'S Tchaikovsky session included, along with the symphony, the "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasy and the "Nutcracker" suite. Mr. Toscanini's last previous performance of the suite took place, it is said, more than forty years ago, and he made up for his abstinence from this charming collection of ballet bits with a fascinating projection of their merits.

The normally well-behaved studio audience broke with convention at two points during the symphony. After the second movement, somebody tried to start applause, and after the third, everybody tried—and succeeded. Nobody, however, emulated the example of a Western concert audience which, if the story isn't an invention, accompanied the "Our Love" melody in "Romeo and Juliet" with a whistling obbligato.

naps you'll recall Vladimir Horowitz's brilliant performance of the B-flat minor piano concerto with the Philharmonic-Symphony, especially if you heard it—in Carnegie Hall or on the radio.

Fifteen years ago, Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony, the "Pathetic," was the nation's No. 1 on the orchestral hit parade. Almost every conductor shook a stick at it, and the mere announcement that it would be played was money in the box office. Since then the symphony's career hasn't been so spectacular. The music hasn't been neglected, but, except for Mr. Toscanini's performances of it last season (the first times he had directed it here), most of the hearings haven't started any especial ruckus.

Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Toscanini presented this symphony only three days apart, so now is probably as good a time as any to check on one's reactions to it. Mr. Koussevitzky's handling was dramatic and sometimes florid, with emphasis on details; Mr. Toscanini's was pointed and unified. The former's interpretation may have appeared more high-tension than it really was because it had been preceded by a singularly gracious and delicately modelled performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

Tossing out any literary or personal associations the "Pathetic" may have, it 20

Hannikainen Here

Transcript April 12

Finnish Conductor Leads Special Pops Concert for Finnish Relief on May 12

Tauno Hannikainen, famous Finnish conductor, who came recently from Helsinki with his charming wife Arvida, dramatic opera singer, to direct as guest conductor the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and New York and to give some other concerts for Finnish relief, has given no interviews the last few days.

More than one newspaperman who has tried to ask his reaction to the late news from the Scandinavian countries, has been told: "Please excuse us if we cannot answer your questions. We cannot think. We cannot talk. We have been waiting for six weeks from minute to minute for news of our 19-year-old son, Ylermi, who has been fighting in Finland. . . ."

But those who have seen the Hannikainens lately in their Boston residence, are aware of the anguish and anxiety which they bravely conceal in their gallant attempt to do their part for their mutilated homeland through their own distinguished musical talents.

The other evening, Mrs. Hannikainen, in a conversation after dinner, said pathetically: "No news from our son . . . No news from our parents. . . . We have recently learned that our beautiful home in Turku has been bombed and burned by Russian planes . . ."

Mrs. Hannikainen, a slender attractive woman, who, though Finnish has dark hair but typical blue eyes, in her pretty broken accent continued: "When I first came to this country I had planned to assist my husband in his work for Finland, by giving supplementary recitals of vocal music. You see, I am an opera singer. I have studied dramatic opera in Milan with Mr. Wigley and Giraldoni and in Paris with Madame Litwinne, whose husband was a conductor at the Metropolitan in New York.

"My last appearance on the stage was in 'La Tosca' in Helsinki with the Finnish Opera Company one year ago. But I have experienced so many horrors of war in Finland before I left, and news from Finland has been so frightful since our arrival in this country, that I really do not find it in my heart to sing. . . . Not knowing anything of my Ylermi I was planning to go back to Finland as soon as possible, to do my part in helping my country over there, where help of every kind is now much needed."

"But Finland is in a bag now" Mr. Hannikainen interrupted. "With the Baltic sea full of German mines, with fighting in Norway, with Russia not allowing any trespassing of foreigners, how can my wife go back to Finland?"

Mrs. Hannikainen left us and walked alone into an adjoining room, which was unlighted. In a moment Mr. Hannikainen followed her. "Would you like to come for a walk, Arvida?" he asked. "No, Tauno," she answered "you must stay at home and practice for your next concerts, and I should practice for mine, too."

Then in a few minutes, from the music room, came the opening of a stirring Finnish folksong.

Tomorrow afternoon at 2.45 Mr. Hannikainen appears at the Gardner Museum as 'cello soloist in a Corelli Sonata, a Bach Chorale-Prelude, a Handel Menuett, an Elegy by Van Goens, Sibelius's "Song of My Heart," a Finnish folksong arranged for 'cello by Palmgren, Kreisler's "Liebesleid" and a Tarantella by Popper.

On the 12th of May Mr. Hannikainen will conduct a special Boston Symphony "Pop" Concert for the Finnish Relief. The first half of his program will consist of works by Sibelius.

Renato Mazza

Boston Symphony At Sanders Theater

The Boston Symphony concluded its Cambridge season last night with a brilliant concert at Sanders Theater. The program, including only three numbers, was an ascending series in effectiveness and enthusiasm.

The evening began with the overture to Berlioz's opera "Benvenuto Cellini," still a striking piece of music after a hundred years, if a bit too clamorous for the narrow confines of Sanders. It should go better in Symphony Hall, where it has not been heard for more than a decade.

The gentle lyricism of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony was a happy contrast. Mr. Koussevitzky, blessed with unparalleled woodwinds and horns, gave it a restrained and beautiful performance that lent all the more credibility to the theory that Schubert left the symphony in its two brief movements because thus it was a complete and perfect whole.

The playing of Tchaikovsky's Fifth was a rare and eloquent triumph for both conductor and orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky is noted for his ability to find a meaning, a genuineness, in Tchaikovsky that other conductors miss. Last night he offered a performance that will not soon be surpassed, one which brought the Harvard audience to its feet cheering. Particularly memorable was the second movement with its marvelous interplay of the two themes between strings and woodwinds, in which Mr. Koussevitzky kept each voice separated and yet unified.

E. B. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 13 1940

Final Symphony Program

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its fifth and last concert of the season in Providence next Tuesday evening in the Metropolitan Theatre. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen Tchaikovsky as the composer for the closing number, this in observance of the 100th anniversary of the Russian composer's birth being celebrated this spring. The program will open with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and also include the Symphony in B minor, known as the "Unfinished" Symphony, by Franz Schubert. Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor will conclude the concert and the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

APR 13 1940

AT RADCLIFFE—

Miss Barbara Gatchell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Theodore A. Gatchell, will be one of the members of the Choral Society of Radcliffe College to take part in the annual pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, April 21. This year the orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will present Bach's "Mass in B-minor," assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society, the Harvard Glee Club and soloists.

The appearance of the Radcliffe and Harvard singers with the orchestra has been an annual occurrence since 1924. This year marks the fortieth anniversary of the organization of the Radcliffe group.

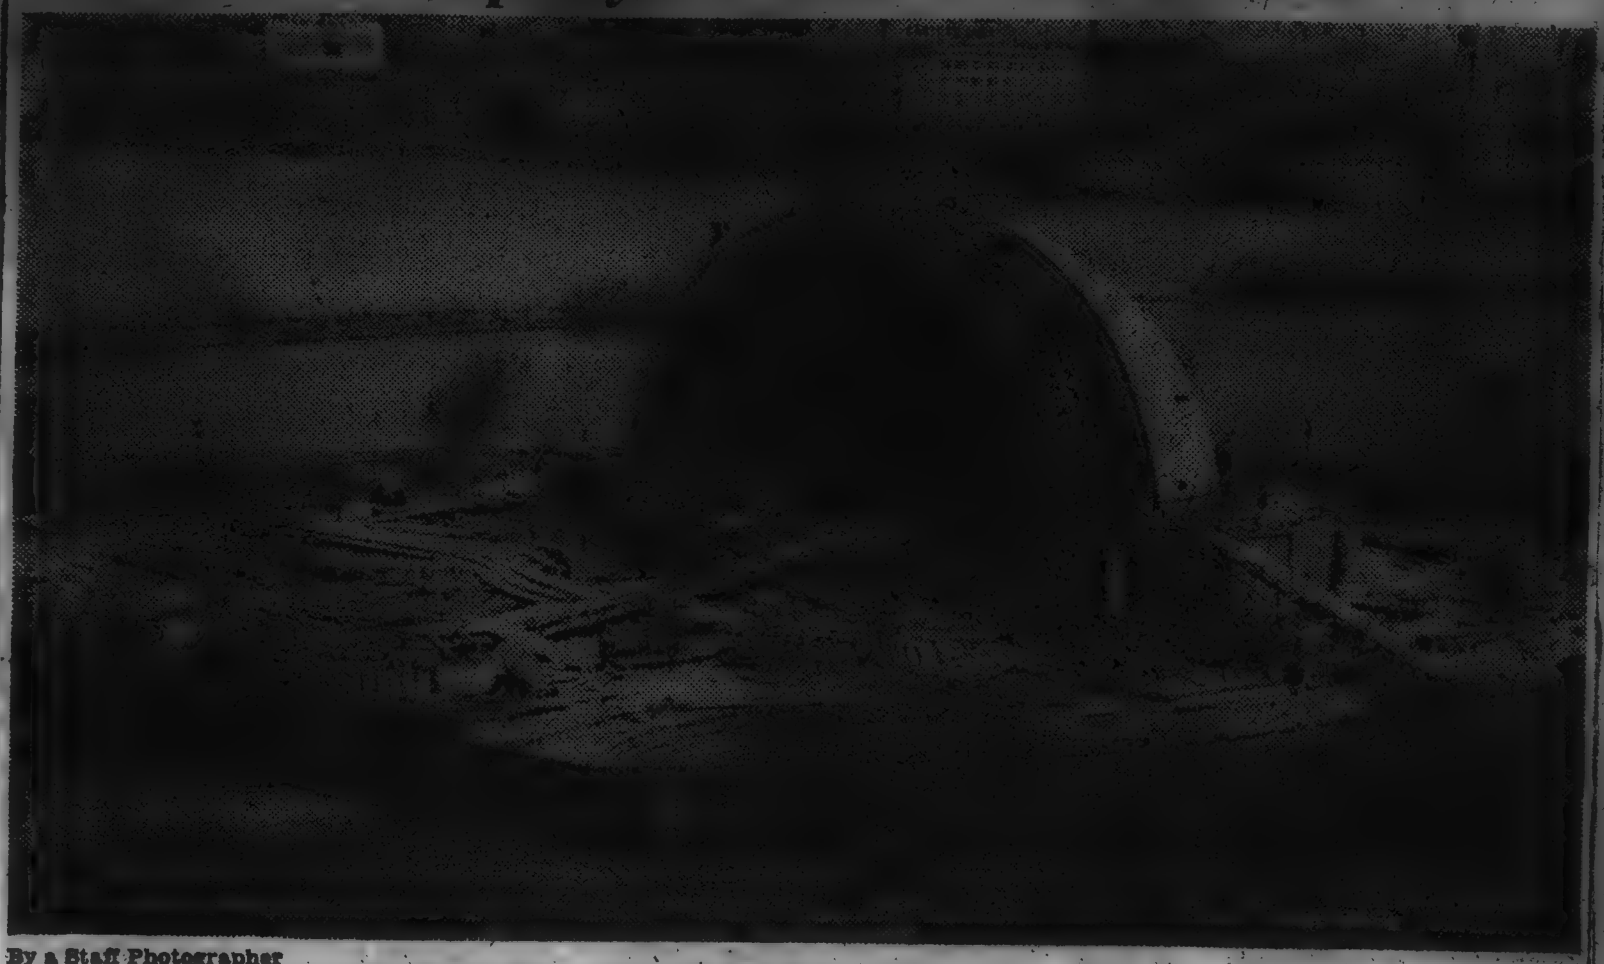
YORK VILLAGE, ME
OLD YORK
TRANSCRIPT
4/15/40

Among those who were in attendance when Mrs. Carl Dreyfus gave, at the Chilton Club in Boston recently, a lecture on "Serge Koussevitsky—A Personal Portrait," were Mrs. Robert Farley Clark and Mrs. Eben Stanwood. The lecture was given under the auspices of the [illegible] Civic Federation of Mass-

---

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, FRIDAY, APRIL 12, 1940

Will Amplify Summer Music Tones



By a Staff Photographer

How Edward Hatch Memorial Shell Looks Now

Workmen are making satisfying progress toward completing this $270,000 acoustical structure on the Charles River Esplanade at Boston, which will add to the enjoyment of many thousands of listeners at the popular outdoor Pop Concerts. The shell diffuses and multiplies the sound of the orchestra by sounding board methods. New shell is three times size of one formerly used by Arthur Fiedler.

Concert Shell Work Gains

Rapid progress is being made toward completion of the new $270,000 Edward Hatch Memorial Shell, which will house the Charles River Esplanade Concerts this coming summer. This shell will be three times the size of the former acoustical shell used by Conductor Arthur Fiedler, and will have a seating capacity for 150 musicians.

Green granite from Conway, N. H., in an 18-inch base, will mark the shrubbery line on the horizontal of the shell. Pink granite, according to the architects' specifications, will trim the front. A retreating "cone" of teakwood, brushed and filled with aluminum paint will make up the interior of the shell.

The exterior—now well along—will have an unusual composition. It may be of garnet, or, if not, of a quartz terrazzo of undetermined color, but with the effect of thousands of reflecting mirrors.

The new shell will have seven concentric rings or sounding boards. The old 60-foot apron has increased to 150 feet. The stage will be 101 feet deep and will have a 51-foot span from apex to stage. The floor space thus will be slightly larger than the stage in Symphony Hall.

Another feature of the shell will be the use of reflectors providing indirect light and producing the illusion of lifting the musicians out against a background. Showers and locker rooms for the musicians will be built beneath the stage.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
EXAMINER

APR 13 1940

Koussevitzky Style Wins N.Y. Plaudits

By Florence Lawrence

NEW YORK, April 12.—This symphony-mad city is still unwilling to see the end of the orchestral season, and recently packed Carnegie Hall to its utmost in standing room to hear Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. Final in a concert series which has brought the Massachusetts group regularly to delight New York sponsors, the reception to conductor and instrumentalists was thrilling, and the program itself of dramatically contrasting effect.

* * *

Koussevitzky has great dignity and a masterful but extremely simple directorial method. He admits of no physical gyrations, uses a baton and, on rare occasions where he must turn from his full face to his men, makes an almost military about face without disturbing the elegance of his upright posture or bending of the body from the waist. The orchestra and the music is apparently the sole object of his presence on the podium, and he seems to essay a formality which aims to be inconspicuous. Not that he is. The audience watches him closely and, like the instrumentalists before him, responds to every change of rhythm or tempo.

Two symphonies, the Beethoven No. 4 in B flat major, opus 60, and Tschaikowsky's No. 5, in E minor, constituted the program. Most notable feature of the Beethoven was the amazing tone color of the strings. In this work, with its limited use of woodwinds and brasses, violas and cellos have frequent opportunity to lend unusual poignancy to the score. The gracious and concise beauty of this symphony was magnificently expressed and the performance was greeted with storms of plaudits.

* * *

A studied interpretation of the Tschaikowsky gave little leeway to Russian temperament, but the magnificent crescendo which completed the second movement was brilliantly handled. Despite several fortissimo passages, the strings were always singing and melodious, and the Andante Maestoso and Allegro Vivace of the last movement were powerful and moving, enriched by brilliant elucidation of secondary themes.

Cheers and plaudits which lasted for nearly 10 minutes at the conclusion of the concert marked the audience's approval of this event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER

APR 14 1940

Three girls from the suburbs are members of the Choral Society at Radcliffe College and will take part in the annual Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Sunday. They are: Miss Joyce Peloubet, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Wardell Peloubet, of Sagamore rd., Maplewood, and Miss Doris Ann Hoagland, daughter of Mrs. W. C. Hoagland, of Summit st., and Miss Jane Hyde, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Reed Warren Hyde, of Mountain ave., both of Summit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

APR 13 1940

MUSICAL EVENTS

Tchaikovsky Returns

In the past few years, Tchaikovsky hasn't been a great drawing card for the symphony orchestras, but at least three song hits, officially derived from Tchaikovsky melodies, have done well for all concerned. "Our Love," based on a theme from Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," "Moon Love," fashioned from a bit of his fifth symphony, and "On the Isle of May," built about the andante cantabile from his first string quartet, have made the populace aware of Tchaikovsky.

With the hundredth anniversary of Tchaikovsky's birth coming up on the seventh of next month, however, Tchaikovsky's compositions, in the original, have become fashionable again. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the fifth and sixth symphonies with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week in Carnegie Hall. Arturo Toscanini and the N.B.C. Symphony broadcast an all-Tchaikovsky program. Going back a bit further, perhaps you'll recall Vladimir Horowitz's brilliant performance of the B-flat minor piano concerto with the Philharmonic-Symphony, especially if you heard it—in Carnegie Hall or on the radio.

Fifteen years ago, Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony, the "Pathetic," was the nation's No. 1 on the orchestral hit parade. Almost every conductor shook a stick at it, and the mere announcement that it would be played was money in the box office. Since then the symphony's career hasn't been so spectacular. The music hasn't been neglected, but, except for Mr. Toscanini's performances of it last season (the first times he had directed it here), most of the hearings haven't started any especial ruckus.

Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Toscanini presented this symphony only three days apart, so now is probably as good a time as any to check on one's reactions to it. Mr. Koussevitzky's handling was dramatic and sometimes florid, with emphasis on details; Mr. Toscanini's was pointed and unified. The former's interpretation may have appeared more high-tension than it really was because it had been preceded by a singularly gracious and delicately modelled performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

Tossing out any literary or personal associations the "Pathetic" may have, it 20

Hannikainen Here

Transcript April 12

Finnish Conductor Leads Special Pops Concert for Finnish Relief on May 12

Tauno Hannikainen, famous Finnish conductor, who came recently from Helsinki with his charming wife Arvida, dramatic opera singer, to direct as guest conductor the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and New York and to give some other concerts for Finnish relief, has given no interviews the last few days.

More than one newspaperman who has tried to ask his reaction to the late news from the Scandinavian countries, has been told: "Please excuse us if we cannot answer your questions. We cannot think. We cannot talk. We have been waiting for six weeks from minute to minute for news of our 19-year-old son, Ylermi, who has been fighting in Finland. . . ."

But those who have seen the Hannikainens lately in their Boston residence, are aware of the anguish and anxiety which they bravely conceal in their gallant attempt to do their part for their mutilated homeland through their own distinguished musical talents.

The other evening, Mrs. Hannikainen, in a conversation after dinner, said pathetically: "No news from our son . . . No news from our parents. . . We have recently learned that our beautiful home in Turku has been bombed and burned by Russian planes."

Mrs. Hannikainen, a slender attractive woman, who, though Finnish has dark hair but typical blue eyes, in her pretty broken accent continued: "When I first came to this country I had planned to assist my husband in his work for Finland, by giving supplementary recitals of vocal music. You see, I am an opera singer. I have studied dramatic opera in Milan with Mr. Wigley and Giraldoni and in Paris with Madame Litwinne, whose husband was a conductor at the Metropolitan in New York.

"My last appearance on the stage was in 'La Tosca' in Helsinki with the Finnish Opera Company one year ago. But I have experienced so many horrors of war in Finland before I left, and news from Finland has been so frightful since our arrival in this country, that I really do not find it in my heart to sing. . . . Not knowing anything of my Ylermi I was planning to go back to Finland as soon as possible, to do my part in helping my country over there, where help of every kind is now much needed."

"But Finland is in a bag now" Mr. Hannikainen interrupted. "With the Baltic sea full of German mines, with fighting in Norway, with Russia not allowing any trespassing of foreigners, how can my wife go back to Finland?"

Mrs. Hannikainen left us and walked alone into an adjoining room, which was unlighted. In a moment Mr. Hannikainen followed her. "Would you like to come for a walk, Arvida?" he asked. "No, Tauno," she answered "you must stay at home and practice for your next concerts, and I should practice for mine, too."

Then in a few minutes, from the music room, came the opening of a stirring Finnish folksong.

Tomorrow afternoon at 2.45 Mr. Hannikainen appears at the Gardner Museum as 'cello soloist in a Corelli Sonata, a Bach Chorale-Prelude, a Handel Menuett, an Elegy by Van Goens, Sibelius's "Song of My Heart," a Finnish folksong arranged for 'cello by Palmgren, Kreisler's "Liebeleid" and a Tarantella by Popper.

On the 12th of May Mr. Hannikainen will conduct a special Boston Symphony "Pop" Concert for the Finnish Relief. The first half of his program will consist of works by Sibelius.

Renato Massa

Boston Symphony At Sanders Theater

The Boston Symphony concluded its Cambridge season last night with a brilliant concert at Sanders Theater. The program, including only three numbers, was an ascending series in effectiveness and enthusiasm.

The evening began with the overture to Berlioz's opera "Benvenuto Cellini," still a striking piece of music after a hundred years, if a bit too clamorous for the narrow confines of Sanders. It should go better in Symphony Hall, where it has not been heard for more than a decade.

The gentle lyricism of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony was a happy contrast. Mr. Koussevitzky, blessed with unparalleled woodwinds and horns, gave it a restrained and beautiful performance that lent all the more credibility to the theory that Schubert left the symphony in its two brief movements because thus it was a complete and perfect whole.

The playing of Tchaikovsky's Fifth was a rare and eloquent triumph for both conductor and orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky is noted for his ability to find a meaning, a genuineness, in Tchaikovsky that other conductors miss. Last night he offered a performance that will not soon be surpassed, one which brought the Harvard audience to its feet cheering. Particularly memorable was the second movement with its marvelous interplay of the two themes between strings and woodwinds, in which Mr. Koussevitzky kept each voice separated and yet unified.

E. B. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 13 1940

Final Symphony Program

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its fifth and last concert of the season in Providence next Tuesday evening in the Metropolitan Theatre. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen Tchaikovsky as the composer for the closing number, this in observance of the 100th anniversary of the Russian composer's birth being celebrated this spring. The program will open with Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and also include the Symphony in B minor, known as the "Unfinished" Symphony, by Frans Schubert. Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor will conclude the concert and the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

APR 13 1940

AT RADCLIFFE—

Miss Barbara Gatchell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Theodore A. Gatchell, will be one of the members of the Choral Society of Radcliffe College to take part in the annual pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, April 21. This year the orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will present Bach's "Mass in B-minor," assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society, the Harvard Glee Club and soloists.

The appearance of the Radcliffe and Harvard singers with the orchestra has been an annual occurrence since 1924. This year marks the fortieth anniversary of the organization of the Radcliffe group.

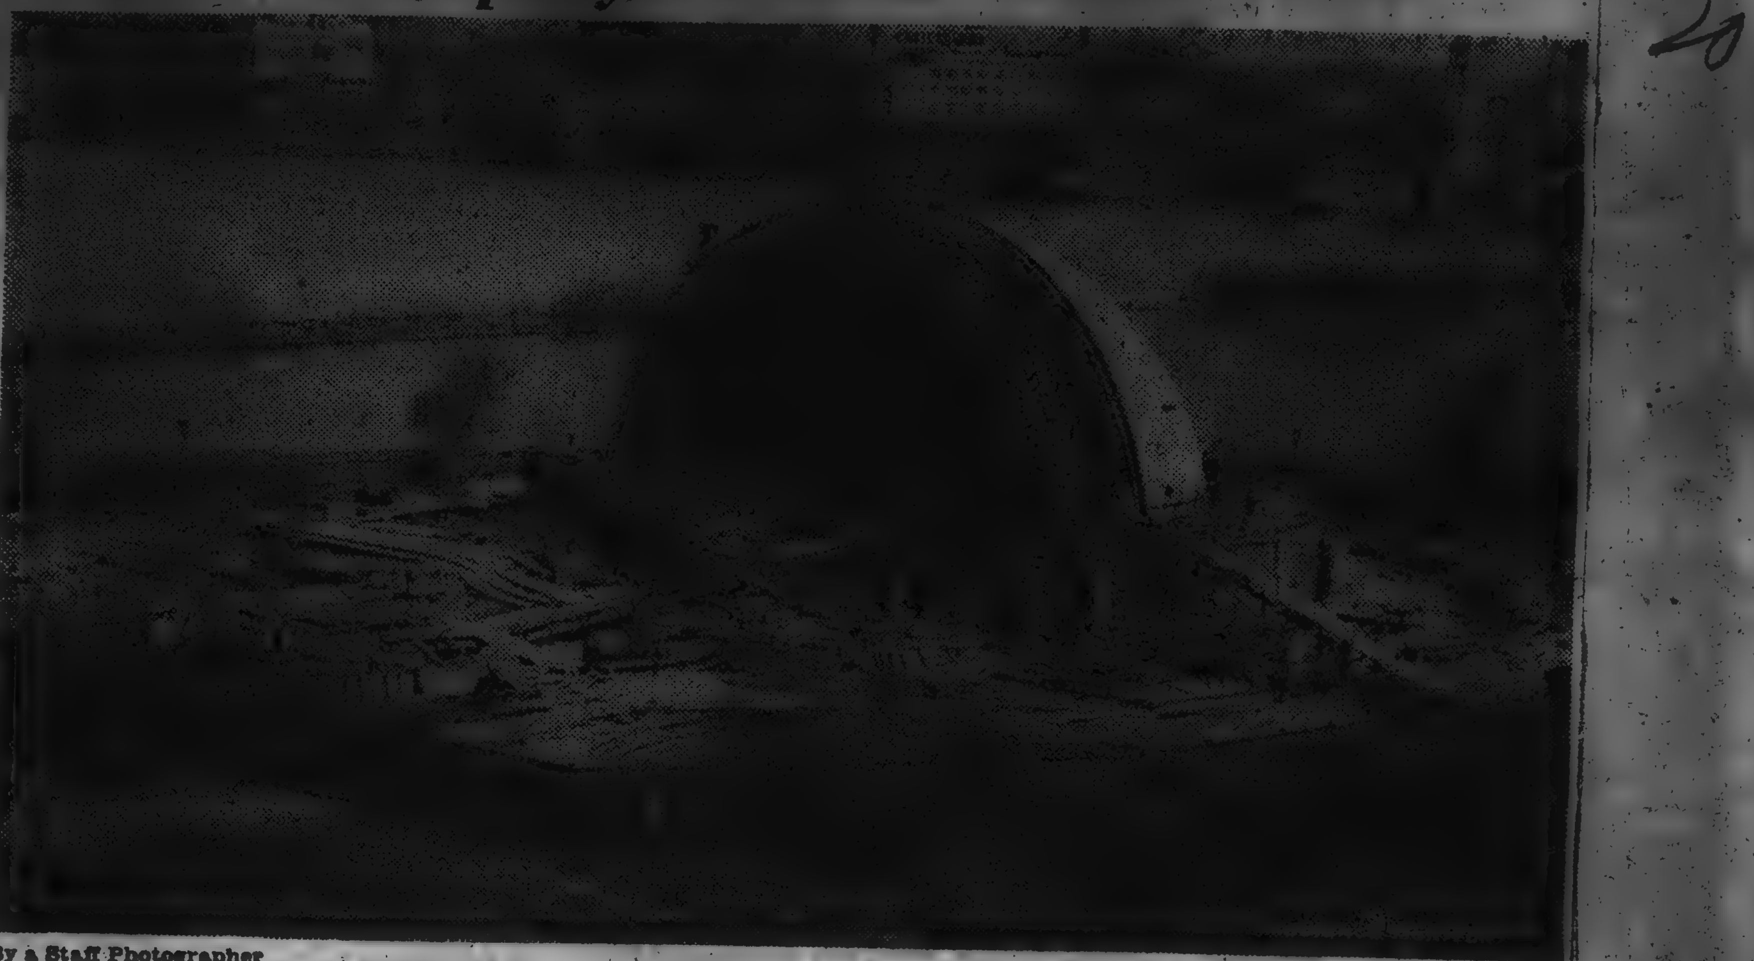
YORK VILLAGE, ME
OLD YORK
TRANSCRIPT
4/15/40

Among those who were in attendance when Mrs. Carl Dreyfus gave, at the Chilton Club in Boston recently, a lecture on "Serge Koussevitsky—A Personal Portrait," were Mrs. Robert Farley Clark and Mrs. Eben Stanwood. The lecture was given under the auspices of the [illegible] Civic Federation of Mass-

---

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, FRIDAY, APRIL 12, 1940

Will Amplify Summer Music Tones



By a Staff Photographer

How Edward Hatch Memorial Shell Looks Now

Workmen are making satisfying progress toward completing this $270,000 acoustical structure on the Charles River Esplanade at Boston, which will add to the enjoyment of many thousands of listeners at the popular outdoor Pop Concerts. The shell diffuses and multiplies the sound of the orchestra by sounding board methods. New shell is three times size of one formerly used by Arthur Fiedler.

Concert Shell Work Gains

Rapid progress is being made toward completion of the new $270,000 Edward Hatch Memorial Shell, which will house the Charles River Esplanade Concerts this coming summer. This shell will be three times the size of the former acoustical shell used by Conductor Arthur Fiedler, and will have a seating capacity for 150 musicians.

Green granite from Conway, N. H., in an 18-inch base, will mark the shrubbery line on the horizontal of the shell. Pink granite, according to the architects' specifications, will trim the front. A retreating "cone" of teakwood, brushed and filled with aluminum paint will make up the interior of the shell.

The exterior—now well along—will have an unusual composition. It may be of garnet, or, if not, of a quartz terrazzo of undetermined color, but with the effect of thousands of reflecting mirrors.

The new shell will have seven concentric rings or sounding boards. The old 60-foot apron has increased to 150 feet. The stage will be 101 feet deep and will have a 51-foot span from apex to stage. The floor space thus will be slightly larger than the stage in Symphony Hall.

Another feature of the shell will be the use of reflectors providing indirect light and producing the illusion of lifting the musicians out against a background. Showers and locker rooms for the musicians will be built beneath the stage.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
EXAMINER

APR 13 1940

Koussevitzky Style Wins N.Y. Plaudits

By Florence Lawrence

NEW YORK, April 12.—This symphony-mad city is still unwilling to see the end of the orchestral season, and recently packed Carnegie Hall to its utmost in standing room to hear Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. Final in a concert series which has brought the Massachusetts group regularly to delight New York sponsors, the reception to conductor and instrumentalists was thrilling, and the program itself of dramatically contrasting effect.

* * *

Koussevitzky has great dignity and a masterful but extremely simple directorial method. He admits of no physical gyrations, uses a baton and, on rare occasions where he must turn from his full face to his men, makes an almost military about face without disturbing the elegance of his upright posture or bending of the body from the waist. The orchestra and the music is apparently the sole object of his presence on the podium, and he seems to essay a formality which aims to be inconspicuous. Not that he is. The audience watches him closely and, like the instrumentalists before him, responds to every change of rhythm or tempo.

Two symphonies, the Beethoven No. 4 in B flat major, opus 60, and Tschaikowsky's No. 5, in E minor, constituted the program. Most notable feature of the Beethoven was the amazing tone color of the strings. In this work, with its limited use of woodwinds and brasses, violas and cellos have frequent opportunity to lend unusual poignancy to the score. The gracious and concise beauty of this symphony was magnificently expressed and the performance was greeted with storms of plaudits.

* * *

A studied interpretation of the Tschaikowsky gave little leeway to Russian temperament, but the magnificent crescendo which completed the second movement was brilliantly handled. Despite several fortissimo passages, the strings were always singing and melodious, and the Andante Maestoso and Allegro Vivace of the last movement were powerful and moving, enriched by brilliant elucidation of secondary themes.

Cheers and plaudits which lasted for nearly 10 minutes at the conclusion of the concert marked the audience's approval of this event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER

APR 14 1940

Three girls from the suburbs are members of the Choral Society at Radcliffe College and will take part in the annual Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Sunday. They are: Miss Joyce Peloubet, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Wardell Peloubet, of Sagamore rd., Maplewood, and Miss Doris Ann Hoagland, daughter of Mrs. W. C. Hoagland, of Summit st., and Miss Jane Hyde, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Reed Warren Hyde, of Mountain ave., both of Summit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

APR 13 1940

seems to me that this music is more welcome as a revival than as something to be heard frequently. Certain awkward or repetitious passages grow too obvious when one listens more or less constantly to the symphony. If one takes it sparingly, one isn't so aware of these infelicities. The emotional power then reasserts itself, and, unless one has developed an allergy to the score, the symphony becomes a stimulating experience.

MR. TOSCANINI's Tchaikovsky session included, along with the symphony, the "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasy and the "Nutcracker" suite. Mr. Toscanini's last previous performance of the suite took place, it is said, more than forty years ago, and he made up for his abstinence from this charming collection of ballet bits with a fascinating projection of their merits.

The normally well-behaved studio audience broke with convention at two points during the symphony. After the second movement, somebody tried to start applause, and after the third, everybody tried—and succeeded. Nobody, however, emulated the example of a Western concert audience which, if the story isn't an invention, accompanied the "Our Love" melody in "Romeo and Juliet" with a whistling obbligato.

haps you'll recall Vladimir Horowitz's brilliant performance of the B-flat minor piano concerto with the Philharmonic-Symphony, especially if you heard it—in Carnegie Hall or on the radio.

Fifteen years ago, Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony, the "Pathetic," was the nation's No. 1 on the orchestral hit parade. Almost every conductor shook a stick at it, and the mere announcement that it would be played was money in the box office. Since then the symphony's career hasn't been so spectacular. The music hasn't been neglected, but, except for Mr. Toscanini's performances of it last season (the first times he had directed it here), most of the hearings haven't started any especial ruckus.

Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Toscanini presented this symphony only three days apart, so now is probably as good a time as any to check on one's reactions to it. Mr. Koussevitzky's handling was dramatic and sometimes florid, with emphasis on details; Mr. Toscanini's was pointed and unified. The former's interpretation may have appeared more high-tension than it really was because it had been preceded by a singularly gracious and delicately modelled performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

Tossing out any literary or personal associations the "Pathetic" may have, it

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL
APR 14 1940

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Splendid Achievement Is Believed Due in Part to Cooperation of Members

By Pierre Key

Pierre Key

NEW YORK, April 13.—If anyone questions the place our youth is playing in our music life the answer forthcoming must be impressive. Because youth is distinctly being heard from in the ranks of professionals.

It is true that some of the young people who play and sing before the public seem to be hurrying matters, but they are gaining recognition of a sort that promises encouraging things for their future.

There is the National Orchestral association, which gave a Gabrilowitsch memorial concert the other evening in Carnegie hall . . . with Leon Barzin doing a superior piece of conducting. Here is an orchestra which is all youth, which begins each season with a large percentage of newcomers, yet manages under Mr. Barzin's outstanding directing to become a plastic and serviceable unit before a season is half finished.

In concert, as in opera, the list of young men and women who are making their achievement felt is steadily growing. When our musical youth justifies its right to be heard I am enthusiastically for each one. Only when these young people insist on appearing publicly before they are adequately prepared do I raise an objection.

Boston Symphony

The Boston symphony orchestra continues a superlative group. There is a spirit which I am confident has much to do with the beauty of tone, the technical precision, and the responsiveness of the personnel to the demands of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

Members of the Philharmonic-Symphony and the NBC symphony orchestras have told me that Toscanini makes them play better than they know how to play . . . by which they mean that the magnetism and the sincerity of the Italian leader exerts a highly stimulating influence upon their efficiency.

A Huge Task

I am of the opinion that the Boston symphony men—who have just completed their final New York program of this season—take so keen a pride in the prestige of their orchestra that they strive to outdo themselves on each successive appearance.

Few persons realize how huge is the task of conducting a major symphony orchestra. Especially in centers such as New York, Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, Cincinnati and Philadelphia. For there are cliques among most major symphony boards of directors and influential subscribers: men and women whose wishes regarding certain matters are too often made known in ways embarassing to a conductor.

So the baton-wielder needs—besides his ability as a program builder, orchestra trainer, and conductor—a deal of tact, and sense of humor.

Right now I know of two major symphony bands which appear likely to change conductors before another two years elapse. In one instance the leader isn't—or does not seem to be—quite ready for the important post he holds. The second case is one wherein a powerful clique wants somebody else. Whenever there are too many cooks the broth is very likely to be . . . well, at least, burned.

(All Rights Reserved)

THIS CLIPPING FROM MISSOULA, MONT.
MISSOULIAN

APR 14 1940

Storms blow over in music as in other spheres. Alexander Nicolaievich Scriabin died 25 years ago today. During his life and for some time after, his critics were mostly divided into ecstatic admirers and violent detractors. Now, although a New York group is celebrating "Scriabin commemoration week" with special activity, most people don't get particularly exercised about his music one way or the other. In fact, we don't hear it much more except for a few piano pieces. This may indicate that the adverse critics were right, or it may not. The original fuss suggested that the music had some kind of merit, else it could not have aroused so much passion. Also, Scriabin's detractors lumped him, in their dispraise, with what many people now regard as excellent company. Taneiev, under whom he studied composition at the Moscow Conservatory, said of him, "Murky waves are running in music," and applied the same phrase to Ravel, Debussy and Richard Strauss. Cecil Gray's diatribe against Scriabin immediately follows a vicious attack on Stravinsky in his book, "A Survey of Contemporary Music," published in 1924.

Apparently, it boils down to the old tug-o'-war between conservatives and revolutionaries. Taneiev was a devotee of Glinka and Tchaikovsky. Rimsky-Korsakov, member of "The Five" who in their day set the musical world by the ears with their departures from tradition, knew Scriabin at the same time and in the same way as Taneiev, and although describing him as personally "somewhat warped, posing, and self-opinionated," considered him a true genius.

In the light of all this, one can not agree with Gray in disapproving the sort of treatment N. Montagu-Nathan gave the question in "A History of Russian Music" in 1912-14. This was an attempt at dispassionate analysis, and a reservation of judgment until Scriabin's idiom should lose so much of its strangeness as comes purely from unfamiliarity. The music itself falls into three categories, overlapping and distinct. First, the young composer turned out music unanimously dubbed "Chopinesque," although there was disagreement as to whether it was mere imitation or had some elements of originality. Later, there were works that showed Wagnerian influence. The final stage may perhaps best be understood from the following condensation of Nathan-Montagu's statement:

"In Prometheus Scriabin has arrived at a full development of the harmonic scale system of harmonization. This he now definitely allies with the musical enunciation of theosophical principles, together with an avowed belief in an affinity existing between sound and color. The majority of musicians, it is true, are as chary of committing themselves to any downright statement touching upon the scheme followed by their expression of sound in terms of color as at one time they would have been of publishing an experimental departure from the approved diatonic scale. Scriabin has had the temerity to associate himself with a belief in both and into the bargain has come forward as a twentieth century apostle of Wagner and Strauss by investing his music with an ethical message.

"Nor is it to end here, for Prometheus is to be succeeded by a more daring experiment. The dance and perfume are to be called upon to reinforce tone and color, with the object of producing the fullest possible effect upon the senses and mind of the audience, which, like an ideal congregation, will, it is anticipated, be stirred to a pitch of ecstasy by a combined sensuous impulsion."

The 'more daring experiment,' Mysterium, remained incomplete when its composer died at the age of 43, but this idea, which moved Cecil Gray to scathing remarks about prostituting music to uses already too well achieved by liquor and narcotics, has interested other composers, and there has been talk off and on of further experiments of the sort. As for the color business, haven't we "color organs" today, and who protests the synchronization of floodlighted fountains with music at our two world' fairs last year?

The Scriabin Circle and the Boston Symphony have the greatest prominence in the anniversary celebrations, which will include a performance by Koussevitzky and his men of Sriabin's Poem of Ecstasy.

Bach Mass Next Sunday

April 14

BACH'S Mass in B minor will have a notable performance when presented by Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chorus and soloists, at Symphony Hall next Sunday. The performance will be divided into two parts, beginning at 4:30 and 8. The orchestra will be assisted by a full double chorus of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists will be Elisabeth Schumann, soprano; Viola Silva, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Alexander Kipnis, bass.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAVENPORT, IA.
Democrat-Leader

APR 14 1940

MUSIC PLAYS AN . . . important part in the plans of the major orchestras and this year there have been many deficits in spite of the fact that music is becoming more popular. The Chicago Symphony needs about $127,000 to wipe out the deficit; friends of the Boston Symphony are soliciting money for almost half of the orchestra's deficit is yet to be met. The St. Louis Symphony is asking contributions to its maintenance fund, estimated at $135,000 for 1940-41 and the Detroit Symphony's budget estimated at $275,000, requires about $160,000 to overcome its deficit.

THE ROCKEFELLER . . . Foundation has made a grant of $60,000 to the Berkshire Music center for use during the next two years in helping to promote its summer activities. Ten thousand of the sum is for physical improvements and the remaining money is for "the finest instruction at relatively low cost to the student body" of the summer music school. This money will help to improve the buildings at the site. There are three buildings at Tanglewood that can be remodeled for assembly rehearsals and classes. It is hoped that funds will be forthcoming for a small theater for chamber concerts and stage presentations.

Next Symphony Program

THE new violin concerto of Paul Hindemith, a score of which has recently arrived from Europe, will have its first public performances at the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 19 and 20. Richard Burgin will be the soloist.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open the program with another new piece—a concertino for string orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill—and close it with the Symphony No. 3, "The Divine Poem," of Alexander Scriabin.

Symphony Soloist

Globe April 16

RICHARD BURGIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concertmaster who will be soloist in the new Hindemith Violin Concerto at Symphony Hall Friday and Saturday.

Concerts Coming Soon

SYMPHONY HALL—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series, April 26 and 27, May 3 and 4 (last concerts of the season); Monday evening series, April 29 (last concert of series); Tuesday afternoon series, April 30 (last concert of series). The Metropolitan Singers, Roy Harlow conductor, Wednesday evening, April 24, in a concert to benefit the Metropolitan Singers' Foundation for Crippled Children; Oscar Levant, pianist and star of "Information Please"; Vladimir Zorin, bass, and Mariam Burroughs, violinist, will be soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 17 1940

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Closes Season With Superbly Done Program.

By G. Y. Loveridge

A program with a distinctly fin-de-saison flavor was offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre last night as it took leave of its Providence audience until next fall.

A Berlioz overture opened the session and a Tchaikovsky symphony ended it—matters that permit this magnificent musical team to get up and expand its chest and display its muscles with awesome effect. There was also a light workout on Schubert's "Unfinished."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, with prodigious skill and energy, evoked from the mighty instrument such moods as only the elect can command, at times furious, at times lyric, all artfully balanced and contrasted. He and the orchestra were ardently applauded, particularly at parting.

The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," whatever its merits or faults otherwise, unquestionably makes a startling prelude to the B-minor symphony of Schubert. One sets out with the thunder of kettle-drums and proceeds through a satisfying sample of Berlioz's famed brilliance in orchestration. Upon the memory of this high excitement descends the exquisite poetry of Schubert, like moonlight on a heaving sea. It was a significant example, in more than one way, of program-making by a master.

Neither of these works received a performance technically without flaw, but the overture was uttered with such vigor and the symphony with such attention to its dramatic, as well as lyric, possibilities, that one cannot easily complain, unless one is in practice, as we are. Dr. Koussevitzky played the second movement of the symphony somewhat faster than he did the last time he brought it to Providence; his second judgment seemed the better.

The Tchaikovsky symphony in E minor was something that one can easily remember until the orchestra comes to town again. Here, indeed, was all the surge and tension, the flame and color, that a great composer and a superb orchestra can summon from the mysterious world of tone. Everything was made luminous and clear by Dr. Koussevitzky in his reading; the musicians responded to his wishes splendidly. Every moment there was something marvellous to hear, such as the brooding melody of the horn beginning the andante, the bassoon in the last measures of the waltz, and a hundred other details that burst finally into one of those stupendous perorations by which we have come to recognize in delighted sorrow the combination of Tchaikovsky, Koussevitzky and the end of the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN
APR 14 1940

Manhattan Musical Events

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

STRAVINSKY conducting the Philharmonic-Symphony in programs of his own works was perhaps the most interesting thing that happened in the music world during the past week. The recitals field was not unduly brilliant. The Boston Symphony paid its last visit of the season.

Mr. Stravinsky's personal success and the obvious improvement of the orchestra under his baton were reflected in its storms of applause which were bestowed upon him. Personally, I have always thought "Petroushka" was a dull work both as music and as a ballet, but people seem to like it. "Le Sacre du Printemps" is just as noisy as it always was, but it doesn't startle as it did fifteen years ago when it first smote the shrinking tympani of New York concertgoers' ears. But the lovely "Firebird," whose charm never seems to wane, and the suite from "Le Chant du Rossignol," one of the best things the Metropolitan ever put on, even though the public did not realize the fact, were still lovely. Mr. Stravinsky may naturally be supposed to have given all of his own works to their best advantage.

Koussevitzky Selections

Koussevitzky played the Beethoven "Pastorale" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathétic" symphonies at one concert, and Beethoven's Fourth and Fifth at his last appearance here this year.

The Boston conductor's playing of Russian music has always been considered the best thing he does, also the most authentic, hence the morbid, overemotionalized "Pathétic" was the most interesting of the four works given. The quality of the orchestra itself was fine, as usual.

Percy Grainger

Percy Grainger, who has not played here for several years, drew what is usually referred to as "a large and enthusiastic audience" to the Town Hall and treated it to some excellent playing. The Liszt transcription of the Bach G Minor Fantasy and Fugue was well given, and the Chopin B Minor Sonata which Mr. Grainer finds "surely the grandest sonata in the whole piano literature" (in spite of the fact that it is not a sonata at all, in the strictest sense of the word) had much that was admirable. Mr. Grainger's transcription of Fauré's song, "Après un Rêve," was one of the high lights of the program.

Erno Valasek, of Czech extraction though hailing from Cleveland, gave an interesting evening of violin playing in spite of some technical insufficiency. The Grieg G Major Sonata was especially well given and the D Minor Concerto of Bach had an interpretation that was both individual and agreeable. This was given with a harpsichord and string accompaniment as the composer intended, to its greater advantage.

Choral Clubs

The Harvard-Radcliffe choral clubs glee in the first instance, that is, and choral in the second, gave a joint concert which was worth while. The first half of the program was given over to some highly interesting ecclesiastical music by Gabrieli, who was organist at St. Mark's, Venice, during the seventeenth century, and also a teacher who had a powerful and lasting effect upon composers of his time. These four pieces had "Intonations" for the organ, as preludes in each case, and a conzona per suonare played by the brass choir of the Boston Symphony following. The second half of the program was of modern works which brought a version of "Casey Jones" into strange juxtaposition with a portion of the "Credo" from Bach's B Minor Mass!

Antonio Brosa, who won favor by his excellent playing of the Britten violin concerto at a recent concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony, gave a recital on his own, the most interesting item of which was the lovely César Franck Sonata. A Sonata for Violin Alone by Bernard van Dieren had its first hearing in America. The composer, who is Dutch, has lived most of his life in London. His work is well conceived and constructed but does not seem to add a great deal to the sum of musical composition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 15 1940

Music

Verdandi Male Chorus Celebrates 45th Anniversary with Concert in Plantations Auditorium.—Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Tomorrow Night at Metropolitan.

The Verdandi Male Chorus celebrated its 45th year with a concert in Plantations auditorium yesterday afternoon. Oscar Ekeberg, who was the first director and has been elected director for life, conducted two groups of songs, and Hugo Olson conducted a third.

The soloist was Einar Hansen, violinist, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was accompanied by Edith Gyllenberg Waxberg. Stanley Price was pianist for the chorus in two songs; the others were sung without accompaniment.

The Verdandi, like any other ensemble, performs better on some occasions than others, but never does it fall below a certain solid standard. One can always look forward to a substantial and strong-textured choral tone intelligently moulded, to good diction, to sincere effort.

So it was yesterday. The program began with "Stridsbon," a prayer before battle, which has dramatic and unhappy significance to Swedes in these days. It was sung with dignity and fervor. The mood changed with "The Lad in a Deep Forest," which Mr. Ekeberg phrased exquisitely. The chorus yielded a beautifully balanced, smooth and transparent tone, especially in the lower volumes. The quality was not duplicated elsewhere except in "Aftenroster."

"Varens Dag" (Spring Song), while filled with exultation (possibly premature in view of prevailing temperatures), did not find the parts fitting together as well as was necessary, and there was some strain noticeable in the tenor voices.

Mr. Olson capably conducted three songs in English. "Open Our Eyes" delivered a cappella, was solemnly effective. In humorous mood, the chorus made bright work of "Sea Song," and then proclaimed the dawn in the vigorous manner made popular by Oley Speaks. Good accompaniments to the latter two were provided by Mr. Price.

The last group included the favorite "Norrland." Mr. Ekeberg added "Dear Land of Home," which the chorus made exceptionally impressive by richness of tone and sober depth of feeling.

The whole program was sung without notes, in the thoroughly workmanlike tradition of the chorus.

Mr. Hansen was in his best form, producing a refined and eloquent tone, and demonstrating at every point his virtuoso control of bow and strings. His playing of the Bruch concerto in G minor earned cordial applause. The adagio was performed with commendable restraint, and in the finale there was much brilliant work in scale and arpeggio passages. The Sibelius item had a dark, poetic charm. In the other pieces, as well as "The Little White Donkey," which he played as an extra number, Mr. Hansen had occasion to show rare precision in harmonics, double-stops and other tricks of the trade. Mrs. Waxberg gave sure and sympathetic support.

The program:

Stridsbon	Lindblad
Gossen I Skogen	Soderman
Varens Dag	Sven Korling
Chorus
Violin Konzert in G Minor	Max Bruch
Prelude Adagio Finale
Einar Hansen
Open Our Eyes	Macfarlane
Sea Song	Bernard Hemblin
Morning	Oley Speaks
Chorus
Adagio	Sibelius
Puck	Grieg
Valse Lento	Mericanto
Valse Caprice	Wieniawski
Bavardage	Barzini
Einar Hansen
Bjorneborgarnes Marsch	arr. Pacius
Aftenroster	Borg
Norrland	Stenhammar
Chorus

G. Y. L.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, takes leave of this city for the season tomorrow night in Metropolitan Theatre. The program will comprise the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz; the "Unfinished Symphony," by Schubert, and the Fifth symphony, in E minor, by Tchaikovsky.

The E minor symphony was written in two months, in 1888. Neither before nor after he had written it did Tchaikovsky have complete confidence in its fate with the public. He wrote to his benefactress, Nadeja von Meck: "I shall work very hard now for a while. I want terribly to prove not only to others but to myself that I am not yet played out. Very often, doubt seizes me and I ask myself, Isn't it time to stop writing music, haven't I overstrained my imagination, hasn't the wellspring itself dried up?"

And later: "Having played my symphony twice in Petersburg and once in Prague, I have come to the conclusion that it is a failure. There is something repellant in it, some over-exaggerated color, some insincerity or fabrication which the public instinctively recognizes. It was clear to me that the applause and ovations referred not to this but to other works of mine, and that the symphony itself will never please the public."

However, as Catherine Drinker Bowen and Barbara von Meck observe in "Beloved Friend," there are few today who would admit that even Tchaikovsky's Fourth is "superior to his Fifth Symponhy," popular as the Fourth remains.

Among the interesting features of the Fifth is its third movement, a waltz instead of the customary scherzo.

Few orchestral works are as well known as Schubert's symphony in B minor, the "Unfinished." The creator of it did not live to hear it played (he died in 1828 and it was first performed in 1865) but to millions its enchanting melodies are now familiar.

The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" is one of two famous overtures in the opera. The other one, which precedes Act II, is called "Le Carnaval Romain" and is better known to concert-goers than the one that opens the opera.

C.S.M. 22

R, BOSTON, TUESDAY, APRIL 16, 1940 —New England News—

Preparing for the Symphony Concert

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Radcliffe Choral Society Members Practice

Around the piano, left to right, are Miss Laura D. Van Huysen, Weston, Mass.; Miss June Threewit, Chestnut Hill, Mass.; and Miss F. Ygerne Gaetz, Laurel Heights, Shelton, Conn. Leading at the piano is Miss Marjorie L. Greiner, White Plains, N. Y., the Society's Treasurer.

Harvard and Radcliffe Join Voices

It's fun and relaxation to sing in a mixed chorus, undergraduate members of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society agreed in an informal interview last night before their final practice at Harvard, prior to starting rehearsal at Symphony Hall. It was their last time this season with their own conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth, affectionately known to the 300 young people as "Woodie."

Rehearsal was called for 7:30. After about 20 minutes of going through sections of the B-Minor Mass of Sebastian Bach, which they are to give Sunday afternoon (April 21) at Symphony Hall under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Dr. Koussevitzky himself, resplendent in lightweight white jacket, appeared on the scene, arousing a tremendous rising applause.

Hearing the chorus as molded and shaped by Dr. Koussevitzky is a moving experience. The singers responded enthusiastically to Dr. Koussevitzky's leading, which was never more inspired or sincere.

A number of young people with whom the reporter spoke commented on the marvel that singers with little knowledge of music can so quickly learn to read and to interpret such difficult music. And several pointed out that the best choral works are written for mixed choruses. They also think it is exhilarating to hear both the male and female voices. One brother and sister have found choral singing has given them a broader view "not only of music but of life."

All are thrilled over the Sunday concert, the high point of the year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

APR 18 1940

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was at the Village Inn, Lenox, yesterday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

APR 18 1940

OUTDOOR THEATER FOR TANGLEWOOD

Architect Named for Structure at Stockbridge

The Boston Symphony orchestra has commissioned Gordon Allen, Boston architect, to draw plans for an outdoor ttheater for the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Stockbridge.

The theater will have a seating capacity for 800 persons. Mr. Allen is being assisted by Dr. Gray, technician of the Metropolitan Opera company, New York, and by Prof. Fay, acoustics expert of Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

APR 17 1940

Swinging Through the Hub

By D. O. T.

Koussevitzky
The Women's Symphony

IF there has been one thing in this world that the writer has craved fo more than another—one thing, that is, which only the Gods coul bestow—it is a voice! We don't claim to have been born dumb (Webste meaning!) we yelled as lustily as any, but being brought up in a hom where one member was blessed with a lovely singing voice and used it we have ever felt that being able to carry your musical instrument withi yourself and being able to charm with it at will, anytime or any place must be the greatest gift bestowed. Hence, when the proper age arrived having been adequately trained at the piano, we started a weekly trip t town to take our vocal lessons. All this led eventually to a part in th college choir and choral society, but hardly endowed us with a gloriou voice. Nevertheless, no reminiscences carry with them the thrill of the would-be singer when the Choral Society sang for the first time with th Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky! A thrill which was repeated every one of the four times this happened to us during an unusually eventful college career. Such artists as Maria Jeritza, Richard Crooks and Roland Hayes were the soloists at these concerts, and the privileges of shaking hands with them held an additional heart throb which we always felt might be heard above the bass drums.

But, of course, the greatest privilege of all was to be able to sing under the direction of such a great master as Mr. Koussevitzky even though you were only one of fifty! We remember him, always as the artist, as slight, of medium height, and as good looking as any matinee idol had a right to be, definitely and distinctly immaculate, self-possessed and pale. When he stepped upon the director's stand before an important concert, and turned his back on an impressive Boston audience, we wondered at his complete control over that great orchestra, chorus, and the entire audience, as a pin-drop silence greeted the rise of those slender, artistic hands. The concert has begun and as the master throws himself into the creation of beautiful music, his immaculate self is forgotten—every thought of his brain, every fiber of his body is engrossed in this creation. As the first movement ends and he walks off the stage for intermission he is a man entirely spent. His erstwhile immaculate dress suit is completely drenched so he hurries away to make an entire change.

It is now nearly 10 years since we watched and marvelled at this spectacle—nearly 10 years since we shook the hand of the sincerely democratic Mr. Koussevitzky, 10 years, that is, until a few days ago. Then by great good fortune we again chanced to have that opportunity. But it might have been a stranger whom we gazed upon, so different was he in appearance from him to whom we had accorded a sort of hero worship. There was the evidence on that face and in that figure of a man who had put his entire heart and soul in his art without thought of self. Instead of the slight man of medium height whom we had known, this man had become stout and stooped. His hair had grown sparse and grey, his face showed a ruddy hue such as we only used to see at the end of a concert in the past. Such an outward change! Yet when he spoke the spirit and the idealism of his thoughts and aspirations remained the same, the same which he had kept so steadfastly through the years and now after a past of agony, (his escape from Russia during the revolution there was nothing short of miraculous) sweat, hard work and triumph, he was able to stand before a vast audience and announce in his broken English his aims and aspirations and their fulfillment in a free country. It was the third and last of these ambitions that he was telling us about. The desire to establish a musical centre which would emanate rays of musical culture. He said that he found that here in this country it was not only possible but absolutely necessary, going on to say "No good cause could ever come to life without a good fight." He proudly announced that the summer of 1940 would mark the opening of the Berkshire Music Centre, Tanglewood.

ANOTHER Symphony Orchestra is of late making itself felt in and around Boston. This is the Women's Symphony Society of Boston. Not having followed all the concerts of this season too closely we found ourselves not only hearing, but listening to it, for the first time the other day. Our first impression was of the tall, fine looking young conductor who after a curt bow turned his back, faced his orchestra of young women and patiently waited for quiet. During the first number we found ourself in a state of rapt attention. The applause that greeted this was genuine and spontaneous. Thereafter the young conductor, Alexander Thiede, did not have to wait for silence. We now turned to the lady on our left.

"How wonderful. Perfect symphony. Admirable coordination and unity!"

"Oh, my dear," came the answer, "this is nothing to what they're going to do. You just watch them."

We discovered the far from hidden for Mrs. Elizabeth Grant's interest. It was she who had organized this group as short a time ago as last December. Between numbers then, being intensely interested we gathered considerable information about this new and quite amazing feminine orchestra. These people had trained under such experts as Lajinska and Fadet. They came from numerous sections of New England, from Portland, from Rumford and so on. They have had their little tragedies, obstacles and accidents. As only the other day they put on a concert in the Christian Science church and a trombone player, on leaving, fell and broke her hip. Since they had another concert soon there was a scramble for a substitute, but as these things are nothing when such an auspicious group seeks to grow in the Motherly Hub a sub was found and all went well. Indeed when their music was over we were inspired to remember the words of Huw Morgan after he had listened to his brother's choir, "O, to smell a smell as good to the nose as that sound to the ear!"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 15 1940

Music

Verdandi Male Chorus Celebrates 45th Anniversary with Concert in Plantations Auditorium.—Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Tomorrow Night at Metropolitan.

The Verdandi Male Chorus celebrated its 45th year with a concert in Plantations auditorium yesterday afternoon. Oscar Ekeberg, who was the first director and has been elected director for life, conducted two groups of songs, and Hugo Olson conducted a third.

The soloist was Einar Hansen, violinist, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was accompanied by Edith Gyllenberg Waxberg. Stanley Price was pianist for the chorus in two songs; the others were sung without accompaniment.

The Verdandi, like any other ensemble, performs better on some occasions than others, but never does it fall below a certain solid standard. One can always look forward to a substantial and strong-textured choral tone intelligently moulded, to good diction, to sincere effort.

So it was yesterday. The program began with "Stridsbon," a prayer before battle, which has dramatic and unhappy significance to Swedes in these days. It was sung with dignity and fervor. The mood changed with "The Lad in a Deep Forest," which Mr. Ekeberg phrased exquisitely. The chorus yielded a beautifully balanced, smooth and transparent tone, especially in the lower volumes. The quality was not duplicated elsewhere except in "Aftenroster."

"Varens Dag" (Spring Song), while filled with exultation (possibly premature in view of prevailing temperatures), did not find the parts fitting together as well as was necessary, and there was some strain noticeable in the tenor voices.

Mr. Olson capably conducted three songs in English. "Open Our Eyes" delivered a cappella, was solemnly effective. In humorous mood, the chorus made bright work of "Sea Song," and then proclaimed the dawn in the vigorous manner made popular by Oley Speaks. Good accompaniments to the latter two were provided by Mr. Price.

The last group included the favorite "Norrland." Mr. Ekeberg added "Dear Land of Home," which the chorus made exceptionally impressive by richness of tone and sober depth of feeling.

The whole program was sung without notes, in the thoroughly workmanlike tradition of the chorus.

Mr. Hansen was in his best form, producing a refined and eloquent tone, and demonstrating at every point his virtuoso control of bow and strings. His playing of the Bruch concerto in G minor earned cordial applause. The adagio was performed with commendable restraint, and in the finale there was much brilliant work in scale and arpeggio passages. The Sibelius item had a dark, poetic charm. In the other pieces, as well as "The Little White Donkey," which he played as an extra number, Mr. Hansen had occasion to show rare precision in harmonics, double-stops and other tricks of the trade. Mrs. Waxberg gave sure and sympathetic support.

The program:

Stridsbon	Lindblad
Gossen I Skogen	Soderman
Varens Dag	Sven Korling
Chorus
Violin Konzert in G Minor	Max Bruch
Prelude
Adagio
Finale
Einar Hansen
Open Our Eyes	Macfarlane
Sea Song	Bernard Hemblin
Morning	Oley Speaks
Chorus
Adagio	Sibelius
Puck	Grieg
Valse Lento	Mericanto
Valse Caprice	Wieniawski
Bavardage	Barzini
Einar Hansen
Bjorneborgarnes Marsch	arr. Pacius
Aftenroster	Borg
Norrland	Stenhammar
Chorus

G. Y. L.

* * *

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, takes leave of this city for the season tomorrow night in Metropolitan Theatre. The program will comprise the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz; the "Unfinished Symphony," by Schubert, and the Fifth symphony, in E minor, by Tchaikovsky.

The E minor symphony was written in two months, in 1888. Neither before nor after he had written it did Tchaikovsky have complete confidence in its fate with the public. He wrote to his benefactress, Nadeja von Meck: "I shall work very hard now for a while. I want terribly to prove not only to others but to myself that I am not yet played out. Very often, doubt seizes me and I ask myself, Isn't it time to stop writing music, haven't I overstrained my imagination, hasn't the wellspring itself dried up?"

And later: "Having played my symphony twice in Petersburg and once in Prague, I have come to the conclusion that it is a failure. There is something repellant in it, some over-exaggerated color, some insincerity or fabrication which the public instinctively recognizes. It was clear to me that the applause and ovations referred not to this but to other works of mine, and that the symphony itself will never please the public."

However, as Catherine Drinker Bowen and Barbara von Meck observe in "Beloved Friend," there are few today who would admit that even Tchaikovsky's Fourth is "superior to his Fifth Symponhy," popular as the Fourth remains.

Among the interesting features of the Fifth is its third movement, a waltz instead of the customary scherzo.

Few orchestral works are as well known as Schubert's symphony in B minor, the "Unfinished." The creator of it did not live to hear it played (he died in 1828 and it was first performed in 1865) but to millions its enchanting melodies are now familiar.

The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" is one of two famous overtures in the opera. The other one, which precedes Act II, is called "Le Carnaval Romain" and is better known to concert-goers than the one that opens the opera.

C. S. M.　　22

Preparing for the Symphony Concert

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Radcliffe Choral Society Members Practice

Around the piano, left to right, are Miss Laura D. Van Huysen, Weston, Mass.; Miss June Threewit, Chestnut Hill, Mass.; and Miss F. Ygerne Gaetz, Laurel Heights, Shelton, Conn. Leading at the piano is Miss Marjorie L. Greiner, White Plains, N. Y., the Society's Treasurer.

Harvard and Radcliffe Join Voices

It's fun and relaxation to sing in a mixed chorus, undergraduate members of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society agreed in an informal interview last night before their final practice at Harvard, prior to starting rehearsal at Symphony Hall. It was their last time this season with their own conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth, affectionately known to the 300 young people as "Woodie."

Rehearsal was called for 7:30. After about 20 minutes of going through sections of the B-Minor Mass of Sebastian Bach, which they are to give Sunday afternoon (April 21) at Symphony Hall under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Dr. Koussevitzky himself, resplendent in lightweight white jacket, appeared on the scene, arousing a tremendous rising applause.

Hearing the chorus as molded and shaped by Dr. Koussevitzky is a moving experience. The singers responded enthusiastically to Dr. Koussevitzky's leading, which was never more inspired or sincere.

A number of young people with whom the reporter spoke commented on the marvel that singers with little knowledge of music can so quickly learn to read and to interpret such difficult music. And several pointed out that the best choral works are written for mixed choruses. They also think it is exhilarating to hear both the male and female voices. One brother and sister have found choral singing has given them a broader view "not only of music but of life."

All are thrilled over the Sunday concert, the high point of the year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

APR 18 1940

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was at the Village Inn, Lenox, yesterday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

APR 18 1940

OUTDOOR THEATER FOR TANGLEWOOD

Architect Named for Structure at Stockbridge

The Boston Symphony orchestra has commissioned Gordon Allen, Boston architect, to draw plans for an outdoor ttheater for the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Stockbridge.

The theater will have a seating capacity for 800 persons. Mr. Allen is being assisted by Dr. Gray, technician of the Metropolitan Opera company, New York, and by Prof. Fay, acoustics expert of Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

APR 17 1940

Swinging Through the Hub

By D. O. T.

~~Koussevitsky~~ The Women's Symphony

IF there has been one thing in this world that the writer has craved fo more than another—one thing, that is, which only the Gods coul bestow—it is a voice! We don't claim to have been born dumb (Webste meaning!) we yelled as lustily as any, but being brought up in a hom where one member was blessed with a lovely singing voice and used it we have ever felt that being able to carry your musical instrument withi yourself and being able to charm with it at will, anytime or any place must be the greatest gift bestowed. Hence, when the proper age arrived having been adequately trained at the piano, we started a weekly trip t town to take our vocal lessons. All this led eventually to a part in th college choir and choral society, but hardly endowed us with a glorious voice. Nevertheless, no reminiscences carry with them the thrill of the would-be singer when the Choral Society sang for the first time with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky! A thrill which was repeated every one of the four times this happened to us during a unusually eventful college career. Such artists as Maria Jeritza, Richard Crooks and Roland Hayes were the soloists at these concerts and the privileges of shaking hands with them held an additional heart throb which we always felt might be heard above the bass drums.

But, of course, the greatest privilege of all was to be able to sing under the direction of such a great master as Mr. Koussevitsky even though you were only one of fifty! We remember him, always as the artist, as slight, of medium height, and as good looking as any matinee idol had a right to be, definitely and distinctly immaculate, self-possessed and pale. When he stepped upon the director's stand before an important concert, and turned his back on an impressive Boston audience, we wondered at his complete control over that great orchestra, chorus, and the entire audience, as a pin-drop silence greeted the rise of those slender, artistic hands. The concert has begun and as the master throws himself into the creation of beautiful music, his immaculate self is forgotten—every thought of his brain, every fiber of his body is engrossed in this creation. As the first movement ends and he walks off the stage for intermission he is a man entirely spent. His erstwhile immaculate dress suit is completely drenched so he hurries away to make an entire change.

It is now nearly 10 years since we watched and marvelled at this spectacle—nearly 10 years since we shook the hand of the sincerely democratic Mr. Koussevitsky, 10 years, that is, until a few days ago. Then by great good fortune we again chanced to have that opportunity. But it might have been a stranger whom we gazed upon, so different was he in appearance from him to whom we had accorded a sort of hero worship. There was the evidence on that face and in that figure of a man who had put his entire heart and soul in his art without thought of self. Instead of the slight man of medium height whom we had known, this man had become stout and stooped. His hair had grown sparse and grey, his face showed a ruddy hue such as we only used to see at the end of a concert in the past. Such an outward change! Yet when he spoke the spirit and the idealism of his thoughts and aspirations remained the same, the same which he had kept so steadfastly through the years and now after a past of agony, (his escape from Russia during the revolution there was nothing short of miraculous) sweat, hard work and triumph, he was able to stand before a vast audience and announce in his broken English his aims and aspirations and their fulfillment in a free country. It was the third and last of these ambitions that he was telling us about. The desire to establish a musical centre which would emanate rays of musical culture. He said that he found that here in this country it was not only possible but absolutely necessary, going on to say "No good cause could ever come to life without a good fight." He proudly announced that the summer of 1940 would mark the opening of the Berkshire Music Centre, Tanglewood.

ANOTHER Symphony Orchestra is of late making itself felt in and around Boston. This is the Women's Symphony Society of Boston. Not having followed all the concerts of this season too closely we found ourselves not only hearing, but listening to it, for the first time the other day. Our first impression was of the tall, fine looking young conductor who after a curt bow turned his back, faced his orchestra of young women and patiently waited for quiet. During the first number we found ourself in a state of rapt attention. The applause that greeted this was genuine and spontaneous. Thereafter the young conductor, Alexander Thiede, did not have to wait for silence. We now turned to the lady on our left.

"How wonderful. Perfect symphony. Admirable coordination and unity!"

"Oh, my dear," came the answer, "this is nothing to what they're going to do. You just watch them."

We discovered the far from hidden for Mrs. Elizabeth Grant's interest. It was she who had organized this group as short a time ago as last December. Between numbers then, being intensely interested we gathered considerable information about this new and quite amazing feminine orchestra. These people had trained under such experts as Lajinska and Fadet. They came from numerous sections of New England, from Portland, from Rumford and so on. They have had their little tragedies, obstacles and accidents. As only the other day they put on a concert in the Christian Science church and a trombone player, on leaving, fell and broke her hip. Since they had another concert soon there was a scramble for a substitute, but as these things are nothing when such an auspicious group seeks to grow in the Motherly Hub a sub was found and all went well. Indeed when their music was over we were inspired to remember the words of Huw Morgan after he had listened to his brother's choir, "O, to smell a smell as good to the nose as that sound to the ear!"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
APR 17 1940

23

Seminary Singers.

For a choral program of music for male voices the Boston University Seminary Singers directed by Dr. James R. Houghton are coming to the First Congregational church on the evening of May 13. This is the only chorus in the country composed of college graduates who are training for the ministry. The chorus of 50 voices specializes in modern hymns, Russian liturgical music, the Latin canticles, German chorales and excerpts from the great oratorios. A varied program may be expected, the details of which will be announced later.

Fenton Compositions Heard.

A meeting of the Women Organists Club of Boston was held recently at the East Baptist church in Lynn, where the president of the club, Mrs. Edith Mehaffey, is organist. During the program which also featured singing by the women of Marblehead Staff and Cleff Club directed by Mrs. Gladys Thorndike, Miss Clara H. Fenton of this city played two of her own organ compositions, Offertoire in F and the Short Festival Postlude. In a short program following the noon luncheon the duet arrangement of Miss Fenton's Waltz in B flat for piano was played by Mrs. Mehaffey and Mrs. Thorndike.

A Requiem Mass.

The Massachusetts WPA Symphony Orchestra and the Commonwealth Chorus combined under the baton of Peter Bodge will offer a first performance of a Requiem Mass by Mario Balsamo of Lawrence at Phillips Academy, Andover, on Sunday evening, April 21, at 8 o'clock.

Mr. Balsamo, the composer, is a young Lawrence musician whose work shows excellent craftsmanship. The orchestra has previously played several of his works. This one is regarded as a composition of much merit. His "Two Island Sketches" were recently recorded by this same orchestra for broadcasting purposes. The Requiem Mass is written for four solo voices with chorus and full symphony orchestra.

Boston Programs.

For the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Dr. Koussevitzky has prepared an interesting program in the course of which the concert master, Richard Burgin, will be a soloist, playing the Hindemith Concerto for Violin. The orchestral numbers will include the Concertino for String Orhcestra, Hill; and the Scriabin Symphony No. 3, "The Divine Poem."

Next Sunday afternoon and evening for the benefit of the pension fund of the orchestra there will be a performance of Bach's impressive Mass in B minor under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky. The orchestra and the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will assist and the soloists will be Elizabeth Schumann, soprano; Viola Silva, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Alexander Kipnis, bass. The first part of the mass will be given at 4.30 in the afternoon, after which there will be an intermission until 8 p. m. when the remainder of the work will be sung.

There is musical interest in the performance by the Ballet Russe in the Boston Opera House this week. The matinee performances are on Thursday and Saturday. On Saturday evening the engagement comes to a close. There are several interesting new ballets in the company's repertory. Among the dancers are many young Americans.

His Home Bombed.

Tauno Hannikainen, the Finnish conductor, who directed one of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and was introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky to audiences in New York, is to conduct a special Pops concert on May 12 in Symphony hall, Boston, the proceeds of which will go to the Finnish relief fund. At last accounts he and his wife had been waiting for six weeks for news of their son Yiemi who had been fighting with the Finnish forces before the surrender to Russia. They have had no news from their parents either and recently learned that their beautiful home in Turko had been bombed and burned by Russian planes. Mrs. Hannikainen is an opera singer and last appeared a year ago in Helsinki in "La Tosca" with the Finnish Opera company. Just now, she says, she cannot find it in her heart to sing.

The Berkshire Festival.

Dr. James Phinney Baxter 3rd, president of Williams college, and Mrs. Myron C. Taylor of New York have been elected to the board of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, it is announced by the trustees. Mrs. Taylor fills the vacancy caused by the death of Miss Mary Parsons of New York and Lenox.

It was also announced by the trustees that there has been "a most encouraging" response to announcements concerning subscriptions and boxes for the seventh annual festival concerts to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The nine concerts will be given the first three weeks in August at Tanglewood, the festival's home, located between Lenox and Stockbridge. Already 168 of the 240 boxes available for the three weeks have been sold. The returns on subscription and box sales are substantially ahead of the same date last year.

Harold V. Ruback, executive secretary of the festival for two years, has resigned to accept an executive position in Shreveport, La., and his place is being filled by Dale Phalen, secretary to Olin Downes, music editor of the New York Times. Peter Malevsky of New York has been added to the staff as assistant manager.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
APR 19 1940

May Be Purchased By Koussevitzkys

Lenox Estate Is Viewed by Conductor and Wife

PITTSFIELD, April 18 — Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Koussevitzky are reported considering the purchase of the estate of the late Miss Kate S. Buckingham in Lenox. Mrs. Koussevitzky has returned to Boston after looking at several Berkshire estates.

The Buckingham property is on the south slope of Bald Head Mountain which overlooks Shadowbrook, the Jesuit novitiate, formerly the home of Andrew Carnegie, and Lake Mahkeenac. The estate was willed by Miss Buckingham to the Art Institute of Chicago with the provision it might be disposed of as the Institute wished.

The property consists of 162 acres of land. There is a large white house, which clings to the side of the mountain. This is assessed for $30,000. There are also barns and sheds and a superintendent's house.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
APR 19 1940

Two New Trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Elected.

Dr. James Phinney Baxter, 3rd, president of Williams college and Mrs. Myron C. Taylor of New York, have been elected to the board of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, it has been announced by the trustees. Mrs. Taylor fills the vacancy caused by the death of Miss Mary Parsons of New York and Lenox.

It was also announced by the trustees that there has been "a most encouraging" response to announcements concerning subscriptions and boxes for the seventh annual festival concerts to be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The nine concerts will be given the first three weeks in August at Tanglewood, the festival's home, located between Lenox and Stockbridge. Already 168 of the 240 boxes available for the three weeks have been sold.

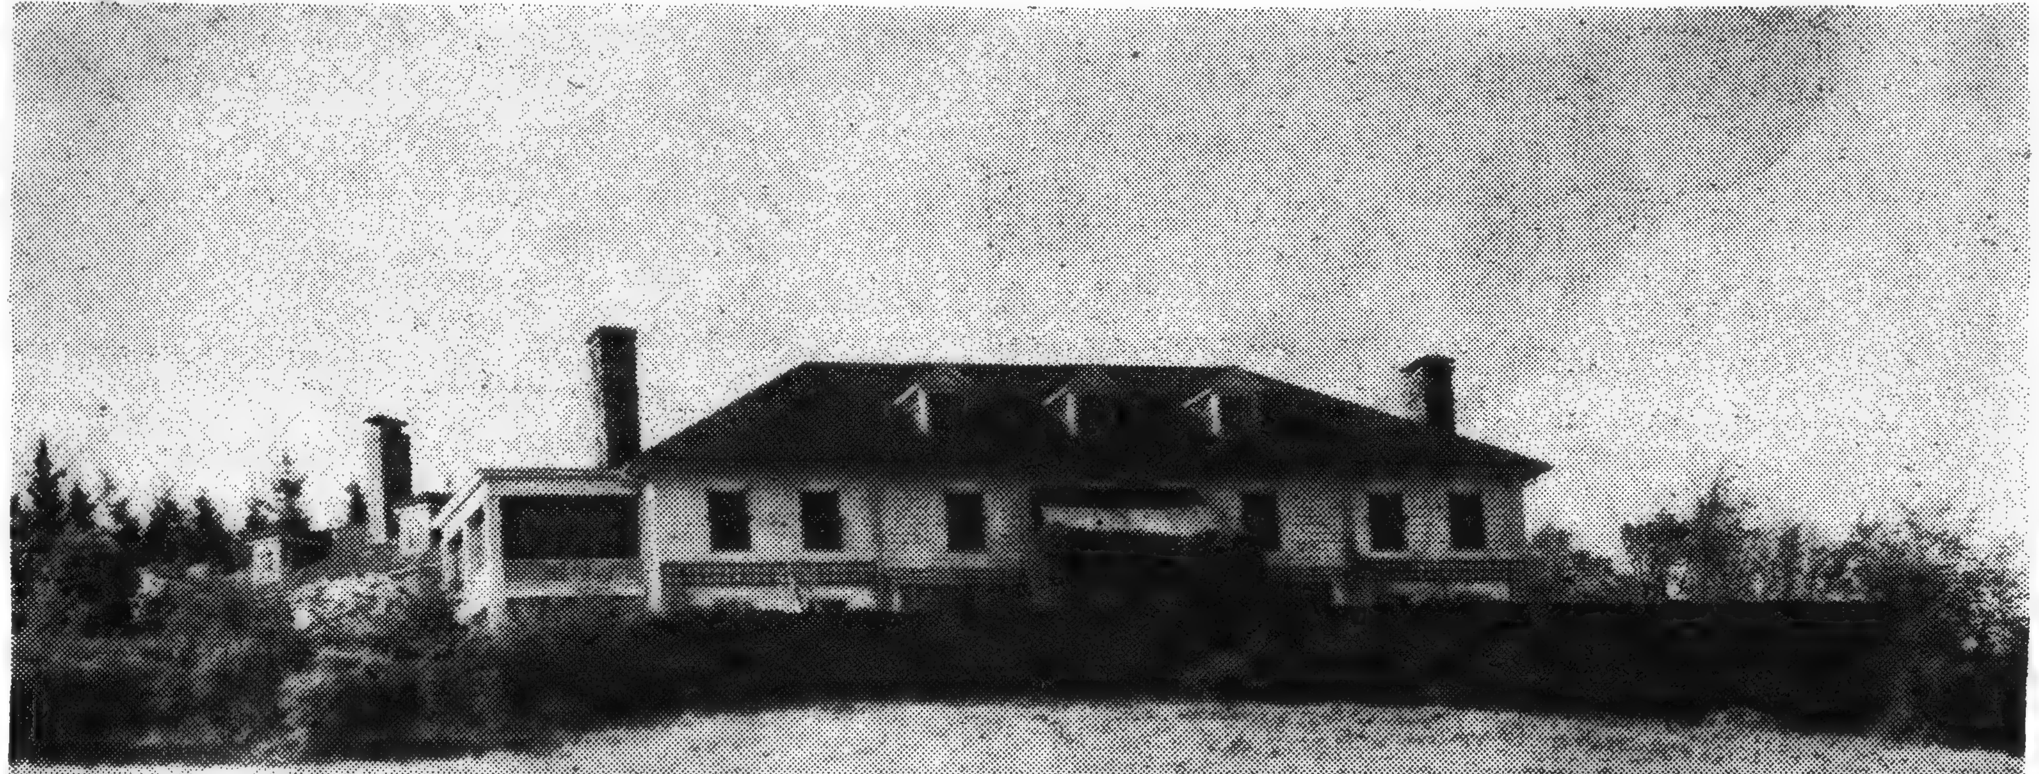
The returns on subscription and box sales are substantially ahead of the same date last year, indicating an increased interest from far flung areas in the Berkshire venture. Even Latin America is showing increased interest in the festival and in response to requests and acting through the Pan-American Union, the festival is forwarding literature in Spanish to the 26 Latin American nations.

Harold V. Ruback, executive secretary for the festival for two years, has resigned to accept an executive position in Shreveport, La., and his place is being filled by Dale Phalen, secretary to Olin Downes, music editor of the New York Times. Peter Malevsky of New York has been added to the staff as assistant manager.

Complete information about the festival concerts may be obtained by writing to the office at Stockbridge or to the New York office at Steinway hall, 113 West 57th street.

APR 18 1940

Koussevitzkys Consider Purchase of Buckingham Place



Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Koussevitzky may be the next owners of this attractive Lenox estate overlooking Lake Mahkeenac and Tanglewood, the scene of the Festival.

Koussevitzkys Looking at Lenox Estate

Famous Conductor Interested in Buckingham House

LENOX — Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has returned to her home in Boston after spending a few days in Southern Berkshire looking over estates with the intention of purchasing a home near Tanglewood, the site of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Among the estates Mrs. Koussevitzky visited was the late Miss Kate S. Buckingham's beautiful residence on the south slope of Bald Head Mountain, which overlooks Shadowbrook and Lake Mahkeenac.

The property was willed to the Art Institute of Chicago, Ill., by Miss Buckingham following her death in Chicago in 1937. Before her death Miss Buckingham often expressed the desire that the house should be razed after her death so that no one else should live in it. But her will stated that the Art Institute could dispose of the property as it saw fit.

The house was started by her brother, Clarence, who died in 1913. His sisters, Miss Kate and Miss L. Maude Buckingham were the sole beneficiaries.

The property consists of 162 acres of land eight of which are assessed for $8000 and 154 acres for $12,000. The assessment on the main house totals $30,000 while the superintendent's cottage is valued at $1500, a garage at $500 and a barn and shed at $1000.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 18 1940

OUTDOOR THEATER BEING PLANNED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Gordon Allen Designing Structure for Tanglewood, Aided by 'Met' Technician and M. I. T. Acoustics Expert

Special Dispatch to The Republican

Berkshire Hills, April 17 — Gordon Allen, architect, of 137 Newbury street, Boston, has been commissioned by the Boston Symphony orchestra to draw plans for an outdoor theater for the Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood, Stockbridge. It is to seat 800 persons. Mr Allen is being assisted by Dr Gray, technician of the Metropolitan opera, New York, and by Prof Fay, acoustics expert of Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Mrs Serge Koussevitzky, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is at Village inn, Lenox. Also there are Mr and Mrs W. Roscoe Bonsal, Jr., of Camden, S. C.; Mr and Mrs Carl Weyerheauser of Greenwich, Ct., and Mrs Charles Weyerheauser of St Paul, Minn. The Weyerheausers have been attracted to Berkshire by the music festival. They formerly had a summer home at Salisbury, Ct.

At Clipston Grange, Lenox

Rev and Mrs Walden Pell, 2d, of Middletown, Del., are with Rev Dr and Mrs George Gardner Monks at Clipston Grange, Lenox. Mr Pell formerly was on the faculty of Lenox School for Boys.

Mrs James Lawrence Kellogg has opened her home on Moorland street, Williamstown, following a winter sojourn at Claremont, Cal.

Mr and Mrs Robert Dort of Summit, N. J., are passing a few days at their summer cottage at Tyringham.

Col and Mrs Reginald Mountfort Ames have rented their house on Crofut street, Pittsfield, for another season to Mrs William E. Cushing of Hotel Vendome, Boston, who is expected May 1. Mrs Cushing is the former Miss Carolyn Kellogg, daughter of Mr and Mrs Ensign H. Kellogg of Pittsfield. The Kellogg homestead stood on the present high school site, East street. Col and Mrs Ames have taken a house in the suburbs of Baltimore, Md., for the summer.

Planning Sunday Concerts

The Gordon string quartet has sent its prospectus for the 11th season of chamber music concerts at Music Mountain, Falls Village, Ct. There will be 16 regular Sunday afternoon concerts starting June 16 and running until September 29. A feature of the season will be a cycle of the chamber music works of Johannes Brahms. The advance notice states that the income received by the Gordon Musical association has been insufficient for three years. Pledges of $6000 are sought before the 1940 season starts. Mrs George P. Milmine of Lakeville, Ct., is president of the association; Mrs Frederick H. Wiggin of Litchfield, vice-president; Mrs James R. Cutting of Lakeville, secretary, and Mrs Milmine, treasurer.

Mrs Louis Lombard, who died at New York city Sunday night, was a charter member of Peace Party chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Pittsfield. She also was a life member of the national organization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 18 1940

WORDS About Music And Musicians

Richard Burgin will be soloist in one of two first performances to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week in Symphony Hall.

The program will include first performances of Hill's Concertino for String Orchestra, Op. 46, and Hindemith's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra. Also listed is the Scriabin "Le Divin Poeme" Symphony No. 3 in C minor, Op. 43.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony's pension fund concert Sunday in two parts, at 4:30 and 8 p. m., when Bach's Mass in B minor will be performed with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Soloists will be Elisabeth Schumann, soprano; Viola Silva, contralto; William Hain, tenor; and Alexander Kipnis, bass.

C. S. M. April 18

Noveltties for Symphony

New Hindemith and Hill Works Listed

By Alfred H. Meyer

The program for the symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday contains the last group of novelties to be presented this year. And indeed, a novel group it is. Twice a "first time anywhere" appears—in Paul Hindemith's new Violin Concerto (completed in 1939) and Prof. Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for string orchestra, Opus 46, written in August and September of last year. But the third item in this week's list is surely also a novelty to the latest generation, since it has not figured on programs at Symphony Hall since 1926—Scriabin's "Divine Poem."

* * *

In Hindemith's concerto the soloist will be the orchestra's concertmaster, Richard Burgin. Recent months have given him prominence chiefly as conductor: it is all but a further novelty to be able to welcome his return as a distinguished master of the violin.

Hindemith's concerto is scored for a relatively small orchestra. Woodwinds appear in twos, there are two trumpets, four horns, the trombone-tuba quartet, the usual strings, and a rather liberal assortment of percussion instruments.

The concerto is of course entirely non-programmatic. A first hasty view of the score gives the impression that it is gratefully written for the solo instrument. It is rich in thematic content, the themes sing themselves well on the violin.

The first movement, labeled "Mässig bewegte Halbe" ("In moderately lively half-note motion"), is an expansively worked out sonata form. In two introductory measures a kettledrum announces a virile rhythm. The solo violin at once presents the first theme. This is a melody with bold upward sweeps followed by gentle downward motion. It is heard against an intriguingly rhythmed accompaniment in strings. Woodwinds continue an extension of the violin line and presently emerge with a new thematic unit of lovely lyric quality. This is developed somewhat, with the violin beginning a florid counterpoint—all still against the initial fundamental rhythmic accompaniment. A more highly rhythmed theme with ascending fourths, in which violin and orchestra answer each other antiphonally, concludes the first-theme section. .

The second-theme group begins with a broad melody for the violin over a quietly sustained chord. Woodwinds and the solo violin give this theme contrapuntal treatment. There follows an active theme in eighth notes. In a development section the violin itself presents new versions of thematic material with interesting new counterpoints. Recapitulation and coda bring forth no new material, but present, in due order, the themes already exposed, somewhat more expansively and with new instrumentation.

* * *

The slow movement, simply "Langsam," begins with woodwinds alone in stately rhythm. A horn intones a short rhythmic motive which plays an important part later. The solo violin then sings the expressive principal melody of the movement. The horn motive develops, leads to an impressive, well-rhythmed, climactic theme for horn. There is a return to the principal theme, for a clarinet, with figuration by the solo violin.

The third movement, "Lebhaft" ("Lively"), begins with an incisively rhythmed theme for full orchestra. There follows a group of three themes, all bright and lightly rhythmical, often with the most delicate accompaniment. There is a return to the opening matter. For the middle group the violin sings a broad theme on the G string. After a lyrical development this leads into the cadenza. A return to the principal theme group leads to the coda, strongly rhythmical and at rushing speed.

The idiom is that of linear counterpoint, dissonant counterpoint, which does not go the lengths of a frightening cacophony. The orchestration is remarkably sensitive and varied.

* * *

Professor Hill's Concertino, too, is in contrapuntal style. It is scored for the usual quintet of strings, with a solo string quartet in the last movement. The three movements are Allegro giocoso, Andante mesto, and Allegro vivace.

In the first movement the jocose theme appears at once in an ascending line of eighth notes. A descending line, for the most part chromatic, and of somewhat more breadth, follows shortly. There is a return to the beginning, a moment of relaxation, a climax, a recapitulation of the two principal ideas, and the movement comes to its conclusion.

In the slow movement the second violins begin with a melody of considerable warmth of feeling. With repetitions it soars to its climax. A middle section, more tranquil in character, sings its song in the high notes of the first violins. There is a return to the first part with slightly more active rhythm. A coda brings conclusion.

In the third movement a string quartet is set off against the full string orchestra. The orchestral tutti presents a lively theme in active rhythm. The quartet answers shortly with material that suggests the type of figuration commonly found in much of the instrumental music of Bach. A broadly rhythmed section forms the principal contrasting group. A return to earlier material brings conclusion. The idiom, except for its contrapuntal aspects, is that which Bostonians have long since become accustomed pleasurably to expect from Professor Hill.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

APR 19 1940

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his father, Tunis Judd, were at the Village Inn, Lenox, Wednesday and yesterday.

Two American Firsts

24

Koussevitzky and His Men Play Hill's Concertino and Concerto by Hindemith

By EDWARD MALTZMAN

Two new works, by an American and a German composer, will receive their first performances by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this week-end's concerts. These works are a Concertino for String Orchestra by Harvard's Edward B. Hill, and a Violin Concerto by Paul Hindemith. Richard Burgin will be the soloist. Scriabin's Symphony No. 3, "The Divine Poem" will complete the program.

Apr 19 Trans

The Concerto

The Hindemith Concerto, which bears the date 1939 on the score, is an attractive work. Written so that it falls naturally within the scope of the violin, the solo part is predominantly lyrical. Hindemith, who began his musical career as violinist, does not demand the impossible from his solo instrument, hence the concerto is not a violin "show piece." Furthermore, the composition is interesting in that it is conceived largely on a linear basis, and worked in a most effective manner with emphasis on clarity and simplicity of style and detail. The thematic material in the concerto is well integrated. Many of the motives seem to be natural outgrowths from a common pattern, but there are of course contrasting figures.

Because we have said that the concerto is primarily lyrical and presented with clarity, it is not to be assumed that the work is lacking in depth. The concerto traverses many moods; there are vigorous and tender passages, as well as development points of impressive climaxes. With emphasis on the single line, and on the combination of lines, interspersed with contrasting rhythmic and harmonic figures, the material is ingeniously treated and logically developed. The melodic lines as well as the rhythmic and harmonic patterns move with remarkable assurance.

It would seem from the above discussion that the work tends toward classicism. And so it does. Though the concerto is written without a key signature, the harmony is not atonal. One writer has recently indicated that Hindemith's present tendency is to reconcile linear counterpoint with tonal harmony. In the matter of construction, the first movement—"Maessig bewegte Halbe"—is in free sonata form; the second—"langsam"—is a free treatment of ternary form, while the finale—"lebhaft"— is a large three part form.

With the exception of the percussion section which includes side and brass drums, cymbals, gong, triangle and tamburin, the concerto is scored for the late classical full orchestra.

First Movement

The work opens with a rhythmic figure in the tympani, which is almost immediately picked up in the strings where it takes on an expanding and contracting melodic and harmonic chromatic pattern. The solo violin begins in the third measure with a soaring melodic line. Meanwhile, the string figure becomes assertive and tapers off in a descending legato passage. After the violin completes its florid line, the winds begin a melodic motive, which is developed climactically, becoming higher and louder, over a string accompaniment. The strings soon take up this motive and there is a bit of interesting melodic interweaving between the woodwinds and strings playing the theme, and the brass, a counter line.

After a sudden "piano," the strings announce their opening figure once, this time sustained and in augmentation, while the violin begins a florid passage. This leads to a transitional section—"ein wenig vorangehen"—in which there is some motive development. A short trill passage in the violin is followed by a running triplet figure which becomes "embroiderie" for a lyrical motive in the woodwinds. A new—"ruhig"—section begins. The violin plays a second major lyrical line over a quiet sustained string chord. With the addition of woodwinds and strings, this section is soon treated contrapuntally.

The development begins with a chord passage in the violin. The solo part continues with "passage work" during which the various motives are interwoven in the orchestra. This section closes with a "double forte" passage, the winds playing the first part of the opening violin solo over vigorous figures in the strings. The solo violin introduces the recapitulation, and the strings again play their opening rhythmic figure. After the appearance of the second theme the movement closes with a long coda. Hindemith utilizes the codas of the first and last motives for further thematic development.

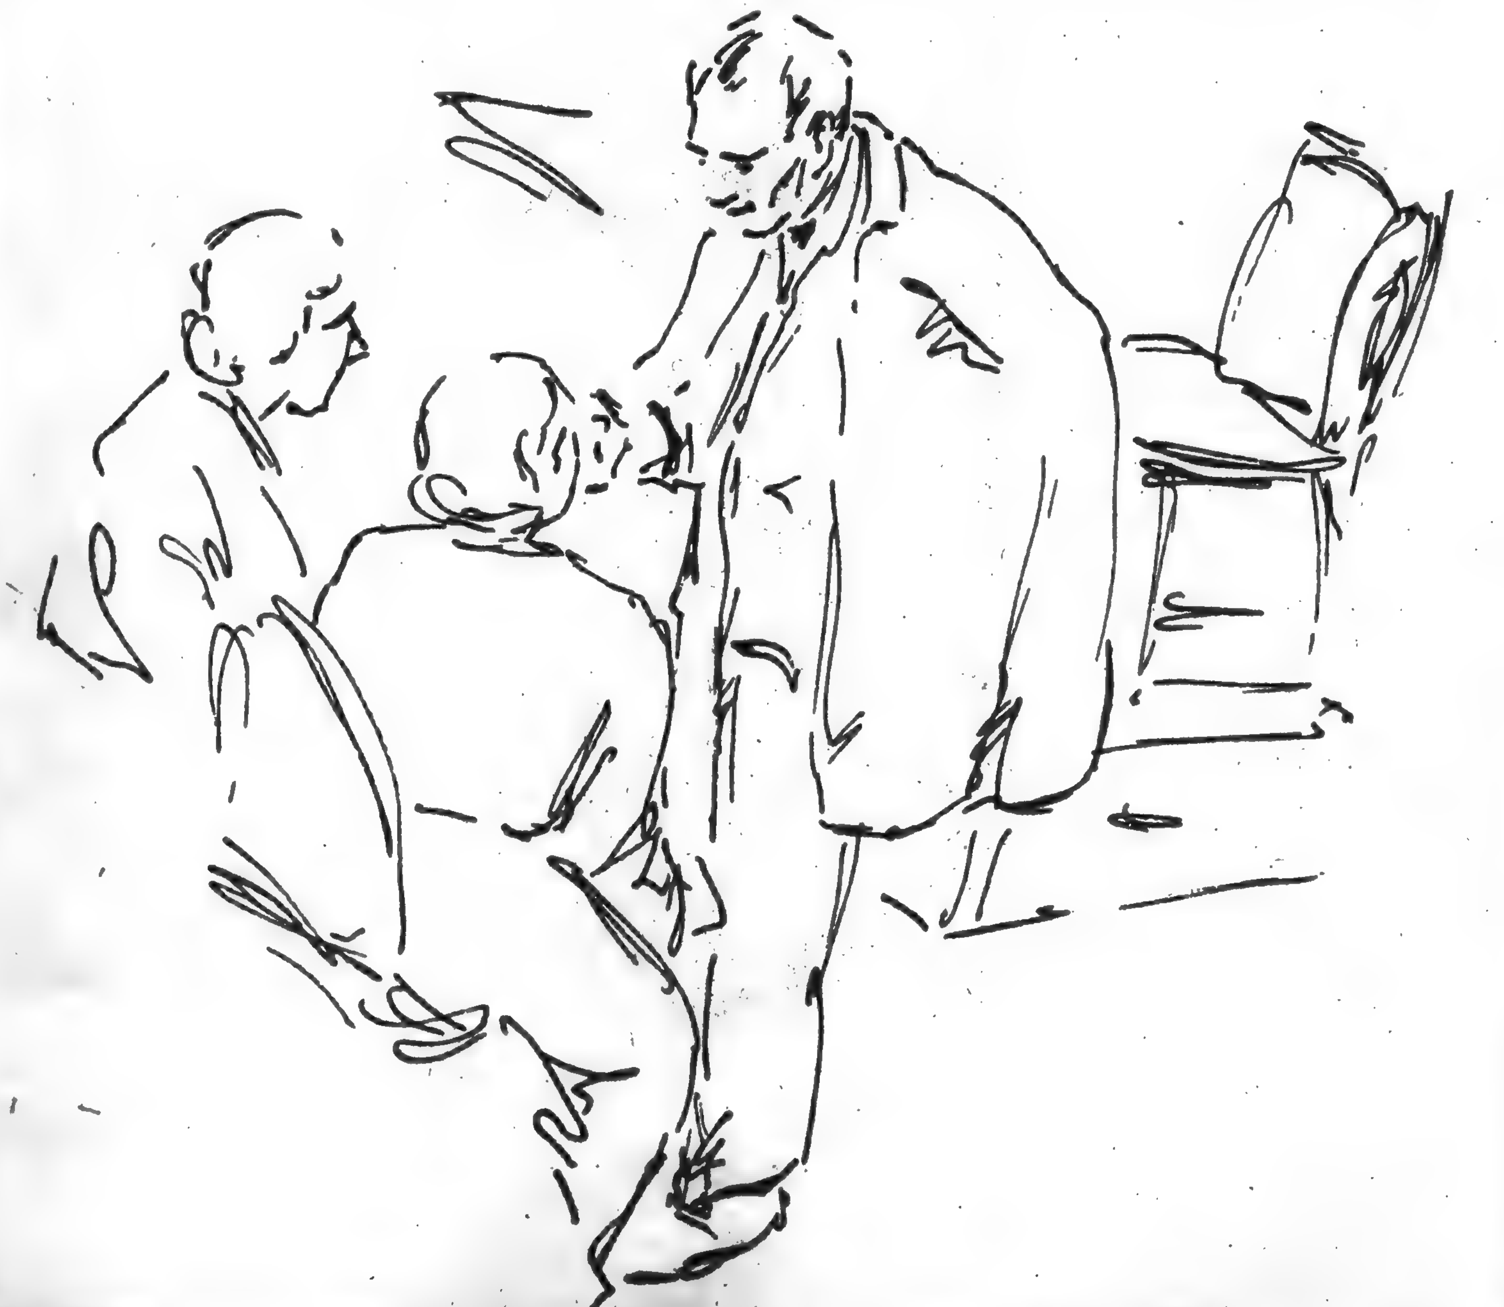
Second and Third Movements

The winds begin the second movement, playing short melodic bits of various contours. The violin enters with a lyrical statement of these figures over a string accompaniment. While the violin plays decorative passages, the orchestra develops the opening motives. The brass begin a contrasting section with a motive seemingly derived from the material of the first movement, and the strings and woodwinds answer each other with rapid scale passages. A long almost rhapsodic line in the solo part over a quiet orchestral background brings this movement to a close.

A decisive, accented motive in the full orchestra opens the final movement. The violin solo answers with a contrasting jaunty theme, followed by a lyrical line which becomes more varied in movement and direction as it progresses, while thematic motives appear in the orchestra as intervening passages or accompaniments. A development section begins loudly with the brass announcing the opening decisive motive, the strings play rapid, rising figures. The brass motive is picked up in the winds and there follows an interesting bit of polyphonic writing.

The strings introduce a new section with a quiet tremolo. The solo violin begins a broad line that also takes on more varied motion and direction as it unfolds, while the brass and strings interweave different motives over rustling woodwinds. After some development, the solo violin begins a cadenza. The clarinet begins the final section playing the opening violin motive, while the violin trills. The violin takes up the motive over a rhythmic background. A coda brings the movement to a close. The opening orchestral motive and the second theme are worked in a decisive manner, the violin doing some rapid passage work. This final section is loud, with dynamic rhythms and impassioned melodic twistings and turnings.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, FRIDAY, APRIL 19, 1940



Martha Burnham

Rehearsal Sketch at Symphony Hall

As Dr. Koussevitzky confers with Viola Silva, contralto (left), and Elisabeth Schumann, soprano (center), during preparations for the performance of the Bach B-minor Mass, to be given Sunday for the benefit of the Pension Fund of the orchestra.

Echoes of the Symphony Concert

By LEO GAFFNEY

THE Fourth Symphony of Sibelius, which the venerable master himself described as "breaking forth in sunshine and strength," is still a mass of dark clouds to most of us.

Played for the first time since 1932 by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the week-end concerts, the raw-boned Fourth was sandwiched around with plenty of the "circus stuff" which the solitary Finn despised, but which endlessly warms the listener, this one in particular.

Nevertheless — and especially since the Finns and their culture have been made better known to us—it is possible for the open-minded listener to begin to share the view of this rugged individualist of the North—to walk along with him in spirit as he roves the sombre woods, strangely sensitive to the sights and sounds along the way.

It is tough going, but the rewards are rich.

Dr. Koussevitzky began the program with Berlioz' eventful overture to his ill-fated opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," continued with the mellow melodies of Schubert's "Unfinished," and closed with the flash and dash of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"—all most gratefully received after the bout with Sibelius.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

APR 19 1940

Berkshire County is agog with the report that Serge Koussevitsky conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is interested in buying the estate of the late Miss Kate S. Buckingham in Lenox. It is located on the south slope of Bald Head Mountain, which overlooks Shadowbrook and Lake Mahkeenac. Lake Mahkeenac is more commonly known as the Stockbridge Bowl and is where Congressman Treadway has a summer cottage.

The property was willed to the Art Institute of Chicago, Ill., by Miss Buckingham following her death in Chicago in 1937. Before her death Miss Buckingham often expressed the desire that the house should be razed after her death so that no one else should live in it But her will stated that the Art Institute could dispose of the property as it saw fit.

The property consists of 162 acres of land eight of which are assessed for $8000 and 154 acres for $12,000. The assessment on the main house totals $30,000 while the superintendent's cottage is valued at $1500, a garage at $500 and a barn and shed at $1000.

The old Montague Inn barn, scene of brisk activity when horses were the mode of transportation a half-century ago, will give way to the automobile soon when workmen start razing the structure. Long idle, except for storage purposes, the old barn once was the convention hall for swapping of yarns and horses by traders from a great radius. In its place will rise a six-stall garage for hotel guests. Built with the hotel more than 100 years ago, the barn formerly served as the half-way point where horses were shifted for coaches running between Springfield and Brattleboro, Vt. It has stalls to accommodate 40 to 50 animals. Various owners of the hotel have carried on a successful horse-trading business at the barn. Among them was Edward O. Williams who dealt in high class coach horses. Some of these are reported to have sold for as much as $2500 a pair. One of the greatest trotters, Prince Lavalard, owned by Will Swan of Athol, was at the barn for one season. Among other noted horses there at various times were Jack and Jill, a famous driving pair owned by a Mr. Cook. The last to carry on a horse business at the barn were Willard W. Ward, who operated the hotel many years before his death a few years ago, and James Manning, an autcioneer, who also has an antique business nearby. Mr. Ward had many friends in Holyoke. One of his local cronies was Jesse Sheldon. The barn, a frame structure, was constructed with wooden pegs.

THE ORACLE

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

APR 20 1940

For its annual pension fund concert in Boston, Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony will give a performance of Bach's mass tomorrow afternoon, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting.

MUSICAL TREAT OF THE SEASON

Yesterday's Symphony Concert Very Notable

Post Apr 20

The most interesting Symphony Concert of the season, yesterday afternoon, was also the most notable by reason of the first American performance of Paul Hindemith's new Concerto for Violin, with Richard Burgin as soloist and the composer in attendance.

It was a triple triumph for Mr. Hindemith, Mr. Burgin and Dr. Koussevitzky, not to mention the orchestra.

There were cheers and many of them when these three notables took the symphonic equivalent of curtain calls.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Burgin and the composer each came forward individually, as well as collectively and with the conductor, and while the audience shouted, clapped and stamped its approval there were felicitations all around. On the whole, it was an occasion of a sort not often duplicated in Symphony Hall. For, in addition, to the presence of the man who seems at the moment the most vital force in contemporary music, and above and beyond the remarkable performance on the part of all concerned, there was the high merit of the Concerto itself.

Mr. Hindemith writes here not only with power and vigor but with great gusto and with a skill that few have commanded. Nor is the word beauty inappropriately employed in speaking of the slow division. Save for a performance in Amsterdam, that of yesterday would have been a world premiere, but in any case, it was an event of unusual significance.

If in retrospect the new Concerto dominated the concert, it was far from being all that the afternoon had to offer in the way of musical stimulation and enjoyment. There was an actual first performance, as prelude to the Hindemith work, that of a new Concertino for String Orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill.

Here again there was a composer to grace the occasion with his presence and also to be enthusiastically acclaimed for a generally successful and frequently highly diverting composition.

What for some listeners may have been the most satisfying experience of all, an extraordinarily eloquent presentation of Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," brought the end. Early and relatively uncharacteristic Scriabin, as compared with "Prometheus," or even "The Poem of Ecstasy," "The Divine Poem" is Scriabinesque in its insistence upon harmony beyond any other single musical factor, even though the orchestration is sumptuous and resplendent to a degree. One feels with Scriabin, as with Franck and sometimes with Wagner, that the melody serves the interests of the harmony, an obvious reversal of the intended relationship between them. And speaking of "Prometheus," is it not high time that we heard that particular tone poem again?

Globe April 20

REVIEWS OF MUSIC AND FILMS IN BOS

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

It has been a characteristic of Serge Koussevitzky's regime as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that his programs toward the end of a season boast as much novelty as those at the beginning. This week there are two new pieces, Prof. E. B. Hill's Concertino for strings, Op. 46, and Hindemith's Violin Concerto and for closing piece, "The Divine Poem" of Scriabin, heard here but twice in 15 years. Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster, is soloist in the Concerto.

While the Hindemith music is far too complex and too substantial to get a rounded idea of it on short acquaintance, one is tempted to call it a masterpiece. Hindemith always has something to say, and he says it in a musical language all his own, solid, varied, technically first-rate. As good music should be, the Concerto is neither all head nor all heart, but something of each.

The tendency in writing violin concertos nowadays is to treat the solo instrument as a glorified part of the orchestra rather than to exploit its virtuoso resources or to make it a soliloquy with a thin orchestral background Hindemith has followed the practice, although the solo part appears very difficult. Orchestration is of symphonic proportions, equal in importance to the solo violin, which, however, is never smothered by the weight of the other instruments.

You would not expect Hindemith to write lush tunes or harmony. His idiom is distinguished by muscularity. Teutonic ruggedness, freedom from excess of any kind, by melody that approaches dryness, yet somehow is deeply expressive, and by a disciplined sort of harmony favoring logic over purely experimental dissonance.

When, at the end of the performance, conductor, soloist and composer stood before the orchestra, the audience burst into one of the warmest demonstrations this reviewer has ever seen at a Friday concert. Mr. Burgin gave a superb account of exacting music. That, too, was just what Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra had done.

Due to an inadvertence, the program said the Concerto was being performed for the first time. Information arrived too late for the program book that this was the first American performance, Willem Mengelberg having conducted it in Amsterdam last March 14.

Mr. Hill's Concertino, brief and slight, is more sparkling than original. The first movement recalls the "Classical Symphony" of Prokofieff, and the main theme of the second might have come from Tchaikovsky. The sharp tang of modernity pervades Mr. Hill's style in general; he gives a great deal of color to the massed strings. As an enjoyable light symphonic piece the Concertino deserves place in the orchestral repertory. It was presented for the first time yesterday. Mr. Hill bowed from the stage.

"The Divine Poem" came as a memorial to Scriabin, who died 25 years ago next Saturday. For sheer emotion and beauty of sound this interpretation was one of the most magnificent examples of great conducting and playing these ears have ever heard. Mr. Koussevitzky has achieved nothing finer during his years in Boston. And that is a considered statement, remembering the great things he has done here.

Purely as music, "The Divine Poem" wears much better than "The Poem of Ecstasy"; there is less over-ripe sentiment, even if five trumpets are required, fewer suggestions of banality despite long-windedness, repetition, one towering climax after another. Scriabin was a visionary who permitted no check upon his feelings; his work was accordingly not all of the same quality. Though Wagnerian, "The Divine Poem" may yet prove his masterpiece.—C. W. D.

Hindemith's Violin Concerto

The Arts in Boston

C.S.M.

The big news about the Symphony concert of yesterday is that it brought the first performance in America of Paul Hindemith's Violin Concerto. Richard Burgin, concertmaster, was soloist, and at the close of the work he, the composer, the conductor, and the orchestra shared an ovation. The twenty-second program of the season, which will be repeated tonight, listed also Edward Burlingame Hill's new Concertino for string orchestra and Scriabin's "Le Divin Poème."

There was good reason for the enthusiasm of the audience over the Hindemith. After a single hearing it seems probable that in this concerto Hindemith has equalled his own best work and has made an important contribution to the literature of violin and orchestra.

The concerto is big in conception, expertly constructed, beautifully written for the solo instrument and for the orchestra, and imbued with that indefinable quality which marks off the significant from the merely competent work. The idiom is the familiar Hindemith dissonant counterpoint, but the form, that of the conventional concerto, is so clearly defined as to be easily followed at a first hearing.

The first movement, although less ingratiating than the others, is built on viable thematic material and has much more than a merely intellectual appeal. The slow movement is of an exquisite beauty, expressed with a minimum of effort and with great economy of means. The Finale is bursting with rhythmic vitality.

The concerto recalls the score for the ballet, "St. Francis," heard here last year. That was program music; this is absolute music. But both are pure Hindemith, and Hindemith at his high best. The "St. Francis" music seemed the most important element in the ballet, even when played by an inferior orchestra. It would be useful if a suite from it could be heard from Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

The performance of the concerto yesterday was superb in all respects. Mr. Burgin, playing as this commentator had never heard him play before, covered himself with glory. The work is obviously difficult, but the soloist played with an easy mastery. His tone was of good size, his intonation secure, and his technique brilliant. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra matched him with their subtle and sympathetic accompaniment.

The other novelty of the program, Mr. Hill's Concertino, was unavoidably overshadowed, but it is by no means negligible. An unpretentious piece, it is distinguished by those Apollonian qualities which we have come to expect of its composer, reinforced, in the slow movement, by the new emotional depth which became apparent in his Third Symphony. A very charming work, which brought warm applause for the composer.

L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

APR 20 1940

BERKSHIRE ESTATE FOR KOUSSEVITSKY

Boston Symphony Director Seeks Summer Home Near Tanglewood — Inspect Buckingham Place.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Mrs. Koussevitsky are planning to buy a home near Tanglewood, the site of the Berkshire Symphonic festival in Lenox. Mrs. Koussevitsky spent a few days in southern Berkshire this week looking over the estates.

Among the places Mrs. Koussevitsky visited was the late Miss Kate S. Buckingham's beautiful residence on the south slopes of Bald Head mountain, which overlooks Shadowbrook and Lake Mahkeenac. The property, which consists of 162 acres of land assessed at $20,000 and buildings assessed at $35,000, was willed to the Art Institute of Chicago, Ill., by Miss Buckingham following her death in 1937. Before her death Miss Buckingham often expressed the desire that the house should be razed after her death so that no one else should live in it but her will stated that the Art Institute could dispose of the property as it saw fit.

MUSIC: B MINOR MASS TOMORROW

American Festivals

They Have a Profile of Their Own, Distinct from That of Europe's Past

By EDWARD DOWNES

In the last days of the glorious Salzburg Festival, before invading Nazi hordes had reduced that center of art to provincial status, there were frequent complaints that Salzburg had become too famous—that it was flooded with great undiscerning masses of cosmopolitan snobs attracted by the name of Toscanini, not because they understood or cared anything about the music he made. Hollywood stars, English cyclists and Cooks tours overwhelmed the gracious little Austrian city with glamour seeking tourists, who had little conception of what Salzburg had to offer. The finest public was not that which frequented the last seasons, and there were sighs for the good old days before the festival had become Europe's chief celebrity parade.

One heard of the modest festival of modern music back in the twenties, and of Mozart performances earlier than that, in which Lilli Lehmann took part. Those had been the days of interested, discriminating audiences long before Salzburg was "discovered" by the broad stream of tourist traffic.

This summer the music loving American tourist will be barred from his familiar haunts in Bavaria, Austria, Vichy, Monte Carlo, Florence or Glyndebourne, and it is a fair guess that existing American festivals will receive a tremendous impetus from his patronage. Of course our festivals are not as famous as above-named European centers. But those very Americans who complained about the character of the Salzburg attendance of the last years are the ones who should now turn their attention to the growing musical enterprise on their native soil. All about us are the possibilities of a new Salzburg, a new Glyndebourne or Wuerzburg.

Or rather let us not use the European names. For though some of the most distinguished American festivals are still in their infancy, it is already evident that they are to be no slavish imitation of European models. They carry a distinctly American imprint and betray fundamental differences between American and European musical taste.

The backbone of most popular European music festivals has been an operatic repertory. This corresponds to European taste where opera has always had a more popular rating than other music.

American Taste

In America on the other hand opera has remained to this day an exotic imported product which, in spite of the popularity of the radio broadcasts, has not yet taken artistic root in this country. In our greatest centers, styles of operatic production lag one to twenty-five or thirty years behind European models. It is in the performance of symphonic music that America sets world standards and is much farther ahead of Europe than most Europeans and even many Americans themselves realize.

There and in chamber music is where the real love of the American musical public seems to lie, and consequently it is in orchestral and in chamber music that our festivals have so far distinguished themselves. A musical snob might say that that proved the superior cultivation of American musical taste. Perhaps.

Washington

The music festival at the Library of Congress sponsored by Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge and recently reported in these columns, is a case in point. This festival is of the greatest significance, for it presents to an audience of musicians and music lovers, who are invited from all over the country, the latest developments in chamber music. One may like or dislike these developments or the composers represented, but the fact remains that these concerts are of the utmost value to the music lover who wishes to keep his finger on the pulse of creation in this field.

The Coolidge Festival illustrates yet another way in which American festivals differ from European. Abroad the financial backing for such undertakings generally enjoys a certain degree of government backing—often a great deal. Private enterprise has so far been the watchword not only for American industry but for our artistic projects as well.

Williamsburg

If the Coolidge Festival is chiefly concerned with the most modern chamber music, the Williamsburg Festival, also recently discussed in these columns, revives the most ancient chamber music practices of our colonial ancestors. Again in this case the backer is, at least indirectly, a private individual, since the whole restoration of Colonial Williamsburg is sponsored by Mr. Rockefeller.

Though the idea of performing baroque and rococo chamber music in its original setting appears to have started in Europe—it goes back at least 40 years to Hermann Levi's Mozart performances in the Residenz-Theater in Munich—the intimate concerts in the Candle-lit Georgian ballroom of the governor's palace in Williamsburg have an atmosphere all their own which, in its own way, rivals any of the famed European settings.

The Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony illustrates the American predilection for orchestral music and the high standards which it has achieved here. This festival, too, is supported by private means from various sources, the "Tanglewood" estate itself being the gift of Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline. If Washington represents the most modern and Williamsburg the most ancient music, the repertory of the Berkshire Festival in general represents the well established orchestra repertory of the period that lies between those two extremes.

There are further festivals which might be mentioned: Worcester, Rochester, Bethlehem Bach Festival and many others, but enough has been said to call to mind the difference between America's adventures in this field and European tradition.

That is not to say that opera may not become very popular in this country. When the recent visit of the Metropolitan Opera came to an end, one felt again a lack in the musical life of this city, and it seems incredible that a town of the size and the traditions of Boston should not be able to support an opera of its own. In many other cities the local conservatory or orchestra has made successful beginnings in the production of opera.

Why should not the New England Conservatory for the benefit of both its students and of Boston music lovers give one or two modest performances of opera a year? And what would one not give to hear "Boris Godunov" or "Pelleas et Mellisande" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky at the conductor's, either in this city or at "Tanglewood"? There is a great need for the revolutionizing and Americanization of operatic production in this country. One model performance at the Berkshire Festival or here in Boston would supply a tremendous impetus in that direction. With so many of Europe's greatest conductors and regisseurs now living in this country infinite possibilities are opened to us. May we have the imagination and initiative to make use of them.

Alexander Kipnis, basso of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who sings with the Boston Symphony tomorrow afternoon in a Pension Fund performance of Bach's High Mass in B minor.

20th-Century Music

Koussevitzky, Burgin Applauded in Premiere Of Hindemith Violin Concerto—New Hill Work

Startling proof of the organic quality and the fundamental conservatism of the art of music was furnished by the program of 20th century music in which Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The first performance in America of a new Violin Concerto by Paul Hindemith and the first performance anywhere of a Concertino for String Orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill were followed by the Third Symphony of Alexander Scriabine, entitled "The Divine Poem." Although a gap of more than a third of a century separated the writing of the Scriabine from the Hill and Hindemith, the amazing thing about these three compositions is the profusion of qualities they have in common and the clear line of evolution which leads from the Russian master to the modern American and German.

Our concertmaster, Richard Burgin, was soloist in the Hindemith and a magnificently integrated, finished interpretation he achieved. If it is written violinistically, the solo part is by no means an easy one. It is effectively put together, with little or no waste motion, but neither, on the other hand, is there any tarrying for mere virtuoso effect. Mr. Burgin sensed the quality of this music admirably and put at its service the solid musicianship and the fluent technique which he commands.

Between this concerto which was completed last fall and the Scriabine, written at the beginning of the century, lie untold revolutions, political and artistic, and a long excursion into the barren field of "atonality" and the "twelve-tone" scale. Perhaps this excursion, like cubism in painting, was necessary for young composers to throw off the crushing weight of neo-Wagnerian and impressionist traditions. Perhaps it was a mere reflection of the confusions and conflicts that culminated in the first World War. But that is a problem question for later-day historians. What is now clear is that that cycle of radical change is nearly complete. Schoenberg himself, the arch proponent of the "twelve-tone" system, is reported to have returned, in his latest work, to a style more nearly approaching his early romantic works.

Hindemith's Consistency

Even in his days of most radical experimentation, Hindemith never lost sight of the need in music of a unifying tonal center or key and in the last few years he has found his way to a style of more immediate emotional appeal, less dissonance and more apparent logic. The selections from his opera "Mathis der Maler," which Dr. Koussevitzky performed earlier this season, were the most stirring music from Mr. Hindemith's pen we had yet heard. Yesterday's concerto convinced us afresh that here is one of the most eloquent voices in modern music.

None of the "isms" of the last 25 years has been able to imprison or emasculate his talent. There is a freshness to his inspiration and a fertility of invention that have few if any rivals today. He is one of the few modern composers who can meet the supreme test of writing a slow movement.

The orchestral tutti at the climax of the slow movement and the quiet beauty and simplicity of the following dialogue between the clarinet and solo violin were particularly affecting. The first and last movements were thematically compact, the themes pregnant and well adapted to symphonic treatment. Often their greatest strength lay in their rhythmic profile, but this is true of many a classical allegro. And though this music has a romantic tinge, it is never lush, there are no ecstatic redundancies, nor is there such a thing as padding. It is laconic without being enigmatic and its climaxes have savage thrust and impact.

Hill and Scriabine

Professor Hill's Concertino is conceived in his happiest vein and executed with the skill of a master technician. There is true gaiety and urbanity in his opening allegro giocoso. If the whole does not attempt to scale Olympian heights nor to explore the deepest emotions, it is always inventive and consistently entertaining. The composer was on hand to acknowledge the cordial applause of the audience.

Scriabine's "Divine Poem," in spite of its great sensuous appeal, seemed lengthy and discursive after the taut, economical speech of Hindemith. The orgy of subjectivism which Scriabine so often represents is something to which the modern listener must consciously adjust himself, else he is in danger of missing the real beauties and the high flights of inspiration which are there for the sympathetic listener. Scriabine's highly colorful scoring served ideally to display the skill of the various orchestral choirs and Dr. Koussevitzky was an inspired protagonist of this and of the remaining two modern works.

It was a notable concert.

E. D.

BACH'S MASS BY SYMPHONY

Harvard and Radcliffe Singers Aid

Post Apr 28

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In aid of its Pension Fund and, possibly, as dress rehearsal for next summer's performance in the Berkshires, the Symphony Orchestra offered yesterday, in the usual afternoon and evening sessions, a performance of Bach's B minor Mass. As in the other presentations of this monumental work, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, the chorus consisted of the combined forces of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor.

To continue with the facts before venturing into the less stable ground of opinions, the solo singers were Elizabeth Schumann, soprano; Viola Silva, mezzo-soprano; William Hain, tenor, and Alexander Kipnis, bass. The obbligati to the vocal solos, of which Bach was so fond, were furnished by Richard Burgin, violin; Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboi d'amore; William Valkenier, horn, and Georges Laurent, flute. E. Power Biggs was the organist and Erwin Bodky officiated at the harpsichord. The audience filled nearly every seat in an auditorium, slightly diminished by an enlarged stage, and there was great enthusiasm at the moments when applause was in order.

Before the coming of Dr. Koussevitzky, the B minor Mass had gone unheard here for some 30 years; but, for those who have followed the performances under his baton, it has become a familiar experience. Perhaps it is well with pieces of this sort to have them surrounded with the aura of inaccessibility. Enable us to hear them often enough and we begin not only to take them for granted but to discern the weak links in their armor.

To deny the grandeur and sublimity of certain parts of the B minor Mass would be to declare one's self soulless and tone-deaf. But, viewed realistically, the Mass is seen to be a combination of the immortal and the archaic, or, if you will, the deathless and the lifeless. Only the purblind devotee of Bach will fail to admit that, in this work, beside glorious pages and pages of celestial beauty are others which represent no more than mechanical, if highly ingenious, counterpoint and the application of now-outmoded devices.

There is no more cruel test of the solo singer than the arias of Bach. Somewhat disappointingly, Mr. Kipnis, the most renowned member of yesterday's quartet, failed to meet that test satisfactorily. Perhaps it was because we expected so much of him. The others did well, particularly Miss Silva. But the strength of the work lies in the choruses and here there was everything save the vocal maturity necessarily lacking in the case of collegiate singers.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, APRIL 20, 1940

Richard Burgin, Violinist, Soloist with Symphony Orchestra

MUSIC

21

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 22d regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Richard Burgin, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Concertino for string orchestra, Op. 46 ... Hill Concerto for violin and orchestra . Hindemith
"The Divine Poem," Symphony No. 3 in C minor, Op. 43 .... Scriabin

Mr. Hill's new Concertino for string orchestra, which was played yesterday for the first time, is an exceptionally attractive and ingratiating work. The finale, a sprightly dance-like movement, is especially delightful. The 18th century custom of contrasting a small body of instruments (here the quartet) with the full string band is here used to happy effect.

The slow movement has spaciousness and dignity. We do not know whether Mr. Hill consciously wrote the first movement in Prokofieff's "classical" style. It does not much matter, but at any rate the Prokofieff bag of tricks is here cleverly set forth. The music is full of bounce and a kind of slick precision, spiced with abrupt modulations, that is so pleasant to listen to. The Friday afternoon audience gave Mr. Hill a very cordial reception when he came out on the platform at Mr. Koussevitzky's request.

Immediately there followed what is certainly one of the finest modern scores that we have heard this season. For the sake of the record Mr. Burk has asked the press to explain that he received notice too late to put in the book that this was not the first performance of the Concerto. That took place in Amsterdam last month; this, then, was the first American peformance.

Those of us who are familiar with Hindemith's later style in chamber and orchestral music will not have to have this concert explained. He follows a pretty definite plan in all his music which has come to be his mature and highly individual style. Cadences, the use of canon, forms in each distinct movement, for example, are all very much alike whether in such a work as the Sonata for flute and piano or this new Concerto.

As we have suggested, it needs only a little study or practice to become accustomed to this idiom; and, once mastered, it will prove fascinating. Looking at the new work as a Concerto we shall prophesy that it will be considered one of the important concertos for violin in modern times.

The solo instrument is generously treated, and to this extent the Concerto is in the line of virtuoso pieces. It is interesting to note that Hindemith has not dispensed with an elaborate cadenza in the finale, where it does not seriously interrupt the train of thought. At a first hearing we found the slow movement a little long drawn out, but doubtless further hearings would set this impression right.

The performance was admirable. Mr. Burgin played with great ease and a fine tone. The orchestral accompaniment was managed with all Mr. Koussevitzky's great skill in this art. Mr. Hindemith, when he came on to the platform, was given an ovation.

From the world of dissonant counterpoint we next turned sharply to the world of lush, exotic harmony. Mr. Koussevitzky probably chose "The Divine Poem" because it is now 25 years since Scriabin died from a boil on his lip, rather an undignified exit for so grandiose a composer. Of course, this music is too long-winded and too pompous; but as compensation there are many beautiful passages and much eloquence. Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave a stirring interpretation.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program lists two symphonies: Beethoven's No. 8 and Tchaikovsky's No. 6.

Her

MUSIC

Apr 21

Bach's B minor Mass

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Bach's Mass in B minor was presented yesterday afternoon and evening in Symphony Hall as the 88th Pension Fund concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra, the choruses of Radcliffe and Harvard (trained by G. Wallace Woodworth), and the following soloists assisted: Elisabeth Schumann, soprano; Viola Silva, mezzo-soprano; William Hain, tenor; Alexander Kipnis, bass; Richard Burgin, violin; Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboi d'amore; William Valkenier, horn; Georges Laurent, flute; E. Power Biggs, organ; Erwin Bodky, harpsichord. There was a large and enthusiastic audience.

The B minor Mass was last performed here on the occasion of the 250th anniversary of the births of Bach and Handel, just five years ago. It had been done a good deal in the years preceding 1935, so that we could then note in these columns that many people took advantage of their familiarity with the score to come only for the last half and the more brilliant and massive choruses. Fortunately five years is a longer time than we like to imagine, and so yesterday the full audience was on hand for the Kyrie and the Gloria as well as for the Credo, Sanctus and Agnus Dei.

So magnificent and so intensely moving is Bach's music that the adjectival flights of its many commentators are not out of place and are at least not as absurb as most verbal descriptions of music. It is extraordinary how the succession of choruses and arias with subtle instrumental accompaniment can be so vitally impressive to a contemporary public. By that we mean, rather, how interesting it is to observe that Bach's choral music is closer to us and more deeply cherished than Mendelssohn, Beethoven or even Handel. It is a curious and encouraging phenomenon and one that we hope future sociologists of this period will set down to our credit.

Scholars earnestly debate performances of Bach's masterpieces, the B minor Mass and the St. Matthew Passion, and have laid down rules which are not always observed in practice. They would not care for all of Mr. Koussevitzky's cadential ritards, for example, and they might object that the size of the chorus indubitably swamps now and again the equally important instrumental voices. The whole business of the continuo has also been subjected to interminable discussion.

All this scholarly activity is a good thing, because it implies the living continuity of Bach as a composer and guides our taste in the revival of his music.

Moreover the performance was really superb. All four of the vocal soloists were admirable. We should have normally expected Elisabeth Schumann and Alexander Kipnis to be good, and it was therefore pleasant to recognize and applaud the excellent work of Viola Silva and William Hain who are less familiar to the general public. Mr. Woodworth had put in the groundwork of training a splendid chorus, and the orchestral soloists were thoroughly expert. The continuo was in the able hands of Messrs. Biggs and Bodky and some of the bass strings. Finally, all our thanks are due Mr. Koussevitzky for his share in leading this successful revival of the Mass.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Bach's B Minor Mass

Boston's choral event of the season will be presentation of the B minor Mass by Johann Sebastian Bach at Symphony Hall today for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra and the choruses of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. The choruses have been prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists will be Elisabeth Schumann, soprano; Viola Silva, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Alexander Kipnis, bass.

The performance will fall in two parts, beginning at 4:30 this afternoon, and at 8 this evening.

Until Mr. Koussevitzky revived it for the Bach Festival during the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary season, nine years ago, there had been but one complete performance of the B minor Mass in Boston, by the Cecilia Society in 1901. The work was repeated as the final concert of the 1931 Bach Festival, and again given in 1932, 1933 and 1935. It had become, thanks to repeated opportunities for hearing it, a box office attraction by 1935; if one remembers correctly, the last performance of it at Symphony Hall was sold out well in advance.

The B minor Mass is one of the greatest masterpieces in all music, and no doubt the biggest of Bach's choral works. It was composed at Leipzig between 1733 and 1738, the prime of Bach's creative life. Though it followed the general order of the Roman liturgy, the B minor Mass was not conceived for the Roman service.

Bach was, of course, a Lutheran; in the churches of that faith, at the time, the Kyrie Eleison and Gloria in Excelsis were sung in Latin as part of the office of communion, held to be the most important part of the Lutheran main Sunday service. These two sections constituted what was called the "Missa" or Mass.

The Kyrie and the Gloria Bach finished by the early Summer of 1733, according to the biographer Terry. Bach desired appointment as "court composer" and sent the Kyrie and Gloria to the King of Saxony as evidence of his worthiness to receive the title. The appointment was not granted, however. until 1736.

The Credo, Sanctus and Agnus Dei were added between 1734 and 1738. Some of the Sanctus and all of the Agnus Dei was taken from earlier music of Bach and rearranged for the Mass to varying extent. The practice of borrowing from one's own music was common at the time, and Bach found it convenient on several occasions.

In B Minor Mass

ALEXANDER KIPNIS

The Russian bass, will be one of the soloists in the performance of Bach's B minor Mass at Symphony Hall this afternoon and evening.

fit the organization's Foundation for Crippled Children. There will be three soloists—Oscar Levant, widely known as the musical oracle of the radio program, "Information Please"; Vladimir Zorin, Russian bass, and Mariam Burroughs, violinist. Mr. Levant will play piano music by the late George Gershwin—the "Rhapsody in Blue," the third movement of the Piano Concerto, and three preludes. Mr. Zorin's share of the program will consist of Russian songs and Miss Burroughs will be heard in violin pieces by Sarasate, Kreisler and Novacek. There will be choral numbers by Bach, Rachmaninoff, Pache, Victor Herbert and others.

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, Friday afternoon at 2:30 and Saturday evening at 8:15. Twenty-third program. The orchestra's commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of the Russian composer Tchaikovsky will begin at these concerts with performance of his Sixth—better known as the "Pathetic"—Symphony. The program will be completed with the Eighth Symphony, in F major of Beethoven.

A BIG WEEK FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Post April 21

Tchaikovsky Festival and Pension Fund Concert on List

" BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THIS week the Symphony Concerts begin to take official cognizance of the fact that Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky was born on May 7, 1840. However, the Tchaikovsky Festival, so much talked about last Autumn, seems to be emerging as a rather half-hearted affair. Because of difficulties in the matter of casting, the projected concert performance of the opera "Pique Dame" has, unfortunately, been abandoned, and in the two orchestra programmes now submitted, Dr. Koussevitky has found it expedient to use Beethoven for ballast. Poor Tchaikovsky. Are there not enough works, including the suites, concertos, overtures, tone poems and operatic excerpts from which to draw a couple of honest-to-goodness Tchaikovsky programmes? Beethoven, Schubert and Brahms, when it was their turn, fared better.

To be more specific, at the concerts of this Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Dr. Koussevitky will couple Beethoven's Eighth and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphonies.

* * * *

And at the concerts of the following week, Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, as he did recently in New York, the conductor will present the Fourth Symphonies of the respective composers.

Tchaikovsky's hundredth birthday, now close enough to be assumed as already reached, finds his music in an anomalous position. Undoubtedly, the popularity of his orchestral works, as such, has waned, and there seems to be little prospect, more's the pity, of a renewal of the attempt to establish him in this country as an operatic composer. The Metropolitan has to its credit four performances of "Pique Dame" in the season of 1909-10 and 1920-21. On the other hand, more people are conscious, if perhaps unconsciously so, of Tchaikovsky's music than ever before, owing to the appropriating of his melodies by the songsmiths of Tin Pan Alley. First it was the love theme from "Romeo and Juliet," masquerading as "Our Love." Then, under the title of "Moon Love," the chief theme from the Andante Cantabile from the Fifth Symphony began to be heard from everybody's radio. And now it is the middle theme from the Andante Cantabile of the First String Quartet that is being sung and whistled, as "On the Isle of May."

* * * *

Nor does Tchaikovsky's centenary find the world in complete agreement as to the value of his music. Still adored by some, the three chief symphonies are little cherished, and even violently disliked, by others. Not yet, in other words, has the inevitable sifting process been completed. That takes time. There are composers older than the Russian master whose final place has not been determined. Both sides of the Tchaikovsky controversy are amusingly epitomized in the following excerpt from a review in the Musical Courier of Dr. Koussevitzky's recent performance of the "Pathetique" in New York.

"Glowing and forthrightly passionate was his presentation of Tchaikovsky's flaming measures, and again he won an impressive ovation. There are musical cynics, or ignoramuses who like to belittle the popular work and call it theatrical and somewhat vulgar. One such individual writing for a New York daily, said in his review of the concert: 'The oftener one hears Tchaikovsky's Pathetique Symphony the greater grows the conviction that his genius was that of an adolescent who never matured.'

"And all that one can say in reply is, that the reviewer in question is a smart aleck who himself never has matured as a critic."

* * * *

Not flowers but choruses bloom in the spring, in this corner of the world. This afternoon and evening at Symphony Hall there will be a performance of Bach's B-minor Mass for the benefit of the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund. The chorus will be the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and the solo singers, Eliabeth Schumann, soprano, Viola Silva, contralto, William Hain, tenor, and Alexander Kipnis, bass. Dr. Koussevitky will conduct. The afternoon portion begins at 4:30, the evening at 8:00.

On Tuesday evening at Jordan Hall the People's Choral Union will give its annual concert, under the direction of Stanley Hassell. The Pro Arte Symphony Orchestra, Paul L. Bauguss, conductor, will assist, as will Harry Newcombe, baritone, and Sheldon Rotenberg, violinist, and Harold Schuab, organist. Choral numbers from Bach, Mendelssohn, Gericke and Chadwick, Claussen's Poem and Guilmant's First Organ Symphony make the programme.

On Wednesday evening at Symphony Hall the Metropolitan Singers of Boston, Roy Harlow, conductor, will give their yearly concert, assisted by Mariam Burroughs, violinist, Vladimir Zorin, bass, and Oscar Levant, who will appear as pianist in compositions by George Gershwin.

With Charles Wakefield Cadman as pianist in his own music the Boston Civic Symphony Orchestra, Joseph Wagner, conductor, will offer at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening a programme of composition by Auber, Haydn, Bach, Cadman and Sibelius.

Gounod's "Faust" will be sung at Jordan Hall on Friday evening by the Byars-Harris Operatic Group, otherwise known as the "Sepia Bostonians."

Next Sunday evening the Boston College Alumni Glee Club, Theodore N. Marier, conductor, will be heard at Jordan Hall.

Globe

MUSIC

April 21

SYMPHONY HALL

Bach's B Minor Mass

The Mass in B minor by Johann Sebastian Bach was performed at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The choruses were the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by their regular conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth.

The soloists were Elisabeth Schumann, soprano; Viola Silva, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Alexander Kipnis, bass. Parts for harpsichord and organ were taken, respectively, by Erwin Bodky and E. Power Biggs. The various obbligati were played by Richard Burgin, violin; Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboi d'amore; Willem Valkenier, horn, and Georges Laurent, flute.

As one had expected, the concert was Boston's extraordinary choral event of the season. Symphony Hall was filled but for a scattering of empty seats, a fact flattering to artists, purpose and music, considering the Mass had not been done here in five years and before that had only gradually become a box office success. The Mass is not only "big" but long; the performing time of about three hours was accordingly divided into sections beginning at 4 in the afternoon and 6 in the evening, with a two-hour intermission between.

Did Bach himself ever grasp the magnitude of the B minor Mass? Was he conscious of its fundamental confidence of faith that thunders through such choruses as the Kyrie, the Gloria, Cum Sancto Spiritu, part of the Credo and the whole of the Sanctus and Osanna?

One can speculate pleasantly that the prosaic, near-sighted family man, who was cantor of St. Thomas' School at Leipzig, was merely absorbed in the work of the moment, penning his Mass in sections, not infrequently writing, against the pressure of time and other duties, borrowing in part from his own earlier music.

Whether Bach realized it or not, what he had created was, in its finest pages, a masterpiece whose lustre has not been dimmed by the tarnishing effect of two centuries. Musicians never tire of pointing out Bach's amazing ingenuity; the keenest of Bach scholars, like Schweitzer and Tovey, are careful to emphasize his imagination, his disposition to what was an 18th-century sort of tone painting.

To solo and choral singers, the B Minor Mass presents technical problems not easy to solve: an austere style demanding absolute clarity and mastery of long phrases, involved counterpoint. Perhaps a flawless performance is not attainable.

Yesterday's presentation was admirably balanced, not less in the collective abilities of the four soloists than coordination between chorus and orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with that magnetism responsible for the warmth and the intensity of all that he does. It was most enjoyable to hear first rank artists like Mme. Schumann and Mr. Kipnis, neither of whom could probably be excelled for tonal beauty, authoritative style or plain enunciation. Mme. Silva and Mr. Hain, the latter appearing here for the first time, were thoroughly competent, though the contralto might have dealt more accurately with the trills of Laudamus Te and some of the intervals of the Agnus Dei.

All concerned in the performance, Mr. Woodworth conspicuously included, were given a rousing ovation.

C. W. D.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, MONDAY, APRIL 22, 1940

28 —Bach's Mass in B Minor for Pension Fund

Bu. Apr 21

Ever Disputed Genius; The Tchaikovsky Centennial

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

May 7, 1940, marks the 100th anniversary of Tchaikovsky's birth; and Mr. Koussevitzky is seeing fit to recognize the occasion by devoting the remaining programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra largely to his music. No out-of-the-way score is to be revived, and the originally planned concert performance of the opera "Pique Dame," has had to be shelved. As a result any remarks here may be of a casual nature without attempt to be informative.

No public which is served by a large symphony orchestra needs to be illuminated on the subject of Tchaikovsky's music. The three last symphonies, the "Romeo and Juliet" Overture, the B flat minor Piano Concerto, the Violin Concerto, these are all familiar part and parcel of the repertoire. Moreover, the story of Tchaikovsky's life and the analysis of his tortured personality are now well-known public property, thanks to the literature on the subject.

Operatically Tchaikovsky is not known to the American public. Consulting the lexicons we can learn that he wrote in all about eleven operas, but we are given no opportunity to see them. (And yet people are so bold as to be content with the condition of opera in this country and are willing to make periodic appeals to save the status quo!)

It is symphonically, then, rather than by his operas, chamber music, songs and piano pieces, that Tchaikovsky lives today. And this symphonic life, as we have seen, is very much circumscribed within the limits of the music he has given us. Doubtless that is one of the chief reasons why many musical people profess to be weary of Tchaikovsky, for they have heard these favored scores over and over again. And they would be right in claiming that substitution of, say, the first three symphonies would not answer their objections, because of the inferior quality of those earlier works.

If we look through the list of Tchaikovsky performances in the 50th year book of the Boston Symphony, we can note other works than the popular ones that we have mentioned; and there are, of course, more that have never been given under these auspices at all. Here, for example, are a few facts about the concertos: Through 1931 the Boston Symphony had given the B flat minor Piano Concerto 15 times and that for Violin 11. The G major Piano Concerto and the Variations on a Rococo Theme for 'cello and orchestra had two performances each, the Piano Fantaisie in G minor one only and that in New York.

Outside of these Tchaikovsky also wrote a Seranede Melancholique and a valse scherzo for violin and orchestra, a Pezzo Capriccioso for 'cello, the Third Piano Concerto, and Taneiev's adaptation from a discarded symphony of an Andante and Finale for piano and orchestra. Thus we can see how the process of time has whittled down the acceptable music of Tchaikovsky in one department.

Forty years ago the patrons of the Chicago Symphony were asked to vote from the season's repertoire for a request program, and it may surprise people today to learn that the overwhelming favorite was Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony. Today we seldom hear this work, nor, when we do, can we understand its former popularity. What will another forty, or even twenty-five, years do to the "existing" music?

If anyone expects a prophecy at this point, he is not going to get it. Any symphonies that enjoy the enormous popular favor of Tchaikovsky's 4th, 5th and 6th—even though their merits are sometimes intellectually disputed—must be allowed a certain prestige. The Franck Symphony, for instance, is beloved by the public, whereas it has been shrewdly criticized. For one thing, you would have to change the habits of the musical world to kill off these works.

The processes of decay differ with each art, though they occur in all. And there is always to be counted in the wave of revolution in taste which sweeps neglected art back into greater esteem. The music of Tchaikovsky's teacher, Anton Rubenstein, is pretty completely dead; and it may be hazarded that no wave will ever plunge so deep as to cast it up into prominence again. Tchaikovsky's vital spark still glows, regardless of the fact that time has confined his genius to a narrower range of his own output than with other great composers.

The Bach Mass

Impressive Performance of B Minor Mass Given at Pension Fund Concert

By EDWARD DOWNES

An uncut performance of one of the mightiest masterpieces in all music, the High Mass in B minor by Johann Sebastian Bach, was given in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and evening as the 88th Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra as well as the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, which had been prepared by their conductor G. Wallace Woodworth. The vocal soloists were Elisabeth Schmann, soprano; Viola Silva, mezzo-soprano; William Hain, tenor; Alexander Kipnis, bass, and a very distinguished quartet they made.

Unfortunately there is no aria for soprano in the B minor Mass, but Elisabeth's Schumann's sensitive artistry, her purity of style, beautifully controlled tone and phrasing were evident in the three duets Bach allotted to her part. Of these the "Christe Eleison," sung with Viola Silva, was most affecting. But that may have been because of its position between the first and second gigantic choral fugues, "Kyrie Eleison." Against these, the intimate, personal supplication to Christ himself of the two solo voices never fails of its effect.

Other Soloists

Miss Silva sang with a cultivated voice of pleasantly clear timbre. The deep emotion with which she sang the "Agnus Dei" communicated itself to the audience. Mr. Hain's brilliant light tenor is excellently adapted to oratorio and if we were a country given to Mozart opera, would make an almost ideal Tamino or Belmonte. He sang the difficult "Benedictus" with masterly ease. Though Mr. Kipnis was more than satisfactory in his two arias, the "Quoniam" and "Et In Spiritum," we have heard this great artist to better advantage. Once or twice one had the impression that he was not entirely at home in Dr. Koussevitzky's tempi. Or perhaps he was as disappointed as we were with the horn obbligato in the "Quoniam."

It would probably have been wiser, had the instrument been available, to use a horn without valves for the obbligato. For last night there was neither clarity nor brilliance to the tone, nor was the melodic line at all salient. On the other hand, Mr. Laurant's flute obbligato was a triumph of finesse and added immeasurably to the atmosphere of the soprano-tenor duet, "Domine Deus." The remaining solo parts, Richard Burgin, violin; Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboi d'amore; E. Power Biggs at the organ, and Erwin Bodky at the harpsichord were skilfully taken.

The Chorus

One envied the boys and girls of Harvard and Radcliffe the privilege of preparing this music under such leadership as that of Wallace Woodworth and Serge Koussevitzky. They sang as if they appreciated and enjoyed that privilege. Bach's sometimes extremely florid and instrumental counterpoint fared well: they made it flow with extraordinary clarity. Muddy rhythms or tones were rare and they showed a real grasp of each number's significance.

Of course, Dr. Koussevitzky had much to do with that. Unforgettable was the barely audible beginning of his "Qui tollis" and the profound mysticism and faith of the music which clothes the words: "Which taketh away the sins of the world." The world of Bach's day was probably as confusing a mesh of iniquities as it appears today, and only a true miracle of faith could possibly conceive a washing away of such sins. But this is music to encompass just that miracle.

This same mysticism glows softly through the opening measures of the "Et Incarnatus Est" growing to the overwhelming certainty of "Et Homo Factus Est." The grief-stricken "Crucifixus" transformed that trite 18th century symbol of a sigh into an expression of the sorrowing of creation itself. The utter resignation and quietude of the final lines: "Et Sepultus Est" have hardly been surpassed in music. All the more blinding therefore, is the clarion jubilation of the following "Resurrexit." Truely, it is one of the greatest dramas ever conceived and Bach here took full advantage of all the theatre inherent in Catholicism. That he could encompass this as well as the deep subjectivism of the preceding passage is one of these miracles which one can only admire in speechless wonder.

Dr. Koussevitzky of course knew how to extract every ounce of drama from these contrasts. A purist might have quarreled with him for certain rather ragged tempi and exaggerated retards or claimed that the orchestra did not always have its wonted clarity. In spite of its small flaws, the performance was a deeply satisfying one.

Cambridge Choirs Join Symphony

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Holding a vesper meeting for preparation and an evening session for big sort of song, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society (G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor) presented Bach's B minor Mass at Symphony Hall yesterday, by way of helping the Boston Symphony Orchestra put on a Pension Fund concert. Solo parts were taken by Elisabeth Schumann, soprano; Viola Silva, mezzo-soprano; William Hain, tenor, and Alexander Kipnis, bass. The direction of the music was in the hands of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

If the academic year were longer, or the Bach Mass were shorter, a complete and thorough job might doubtless be expected of the Cambridge men and women; but suffice it that they did handsomely in the Credo, Sanctus, Osanna, and Dona Nobis. In another view, the Kyrie and the Gloria in Excelsis that occupied the afternoon hour may be a grade or two beyond college singing societies' powers.

* * *

Explanations and excuses, however, aside, the performance of the combined organizations at the 8 o'clock reassembling was truly brilliant. Nor was there, as far as Harvard and Radcliffe figured in the night's doings, any letdown. Dr. Koussevitzky had a competent and well-drilled field under his generalship. If anyone were inclined to carp at interpretation here or there, Dr. Koussevitzky would have to stand the complaint. How well may he be supposed to like the choral works of Bach? What does he think of college choirs, anyway, in these days when they are going in so strongly for the classic masters?

Possibly he would like to have a chorus that matched in ability the players in his orchestra—an ideal, most likely, of a far distant future. In any case, this pertains to a Pension Fund concert; nothing more. To take things, then, as they come, it is without mistake to call the pronouncement of the Credo down at least to the Resurrexit distinguished and in large measure thrilling; first-class for vocal quality and choral style. Add to that a quite surpassing solo moment in the Agnus Dei, achieved by Mme. Silva; and let the occasion stand.

* * *

Hardly need mention be made of the obbligato playing by Mr. Laurent, flute; Mr. Speyer, oboe d'amore, and Mr. Burgin, violin. A considerable number of the members of the orchestra, perforce, took part, though much of the time those actually sounding their instruments were few. The B minor Mass, all too exactingly, is a piece for voices; and if they can be heard in all detail, and the accompanying tone can be economized and restrained, all the better for the effect.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

APR 21 1940

Greater Demand Noted For Berkshire Series

Two-thirds of the Boxes Are Already Sold

The trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival have announced a "most encouraging" response to the announcements which have been made about the seventh annual event of this series, to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Of the 240 boxes available for the three August week ends of three concerts each 168 have already been sold, and the sale of subscriptions and boxes is ahead of the 1939 figure at the corresponding time. Literature in Spanish concerning this series has been forwarded through the Pan American Union to twenty-six Latin-American countries.

Dr. James Phinney Baxter 3d, president of Williams College, and Mrs. Myron C. Taylor, have been elected to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival's board. Mrs. Taylor's appointment fills the vacancy caused by the death of Miss Mary Persons. Dale Phalen has succeeded Harold V. Ruback as executive secretary and Peter Malevsky has been appointed assistant manager. Information about the concerts is obtainable by writing to the festival office in Stockbridge or to the New York office at 113 West Fifty-seventh Street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION & REPUBLICAN

APR 21 1940

Boston Symphony Performs at Providence

Providence, R. I. — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave a concert in the Metropolitan theater with Josef Hofmann, pianist as soloist in the Schumann Concerto in A minor reports Musical Courier. His tone, and attention to details betrayed the master hand. He was recalled many times.

Dorothy Horan, contralto, presented a recital in Churchill House assisted by Einar Hansen, violinist. The accompanists were Beatrice Warden Roberts and Alan Hovanes. Miss Horan's voice is pure and sensitive and was effective in both German and French songs. Mary Stuart's Farewell to France (Saminsky) was impeccably done with beauty of line and color and she was liberally applauded. Mr Hansen's playing was distinguished by fine tone and technical finish.

The R. I. Symphony, Edouard Caffier conducting, has given weekly concerts in the Hope High School auditorium. Besides symphonies they have given R. I. premieres of Remembrance for strings by Lewis and A Night Piece for flute and strings by Foote, in which Herman Storti had the solo flute part.

Susie Michael Friedman, pianist-narrator, and Maurice Friedman, baritone, presented a cavalcade of Jewish music in the Temple Emanuel under the auspices of the Jewish Community Center.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

APR 21 1940

Q. Whose estate in the Berkshires was given to the Boston symphony Orchestra? D. H.

A. The Boston Symphony Orchestra received from the heirs of Richard C. Dixey the gift of his Tanglewood estate in the Berkshire Mountains as a permanent Summer home. The two-hundred-acre estate was the home of Nathaniel Hawthorne at the time he was writing "Tanglewood Tales" and making sketches for "The House of Seven Gables."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 22 1940

MUSIC

Bach's Mass in B Minor Presented by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, April 21.—Bach's mass in B minor, considered by many to be the greatest music ever written, was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, in Symphony Hall this afternoon and tonight. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

It was a pension fund concert. The hall was filled with an audience that applauded with feet and lungs as well as with hands. Part of the mass was performed in the afternoon and the rest at night.

The soloists were: Elisabeth Schumann, soprano; Viola Silva, mezzo-soprano; William Hain, tenor, and Alexander Kipnis, bass. Instrumental solos and accompaniments for soloists were by Richard Burgin, violin; Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboi d'amore; Willem Valkenier, horn; George Laurent, flute; E. Power Biggs, organ, and Erwin Bodky, harpsichord.

This performance had magnificent moments, but it cannot be said to have been wrought with such ecstasy as to overwhelm. Dr. Koussevitzky directed the vocal and instrumental forces with his accustomed grasp and vigor. The young choristers sang earnestly, producing some splendid effects in the Kyrie, the Resurrexit, and the final chorus, Dona nobis pacem, as well as in the Et incarnatus est, when the tone was beautifully expressive and polyphonic lines were firm and distinct.

The orchestra, of course, gave superb color and substance. At times it found the vocal competition too powerful.

The most exquisite features of the performance were the vocal solos supported by only a few instruments. The soloists were all adequate, which is not an inconsiderable compliment when the difficulty of the music is remembered, but none of them seemed able to convey emotion or conviction. Mere utterance of the long, florid phrases occupied them rather fully.

G. Y. L.

Page Eight

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, [illegible] APRIL 22, 1940 C

Symphonic Concert May 12 to Aid Finland

Miss Mason, Mrs. Prince Head Benefit Committee

Finnish Minister, Mr. Procope, Honor Guest; Distinguished Bostonians Assisting with Plans

His Excellency Hjalmar J. Prokope, Minister of Finland, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guests of honor at the special syinphonic concert to aid Finland which will be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday evening, May 12, at 8.30 o'clock.

One of the most important musical events of the season, the concert will be conducted by Tauno Hannikainen, who will lead the full Boston Pops Orchestra of 93 members. Already familiar to American music lovers, Mr Hannikainen, distinguished Finnish conductor, has received tremendous ovations both here and in New York since his arrival in January. Proceeds of the concert will be devoted to Finnish Relief and Reconstruction.

Miss Fanny P. Mason is chairman of the committee in charge of the concert, assisted by Mrs. Morton P. Prince as vice chairman, and Maurice M. Osborne as secretary and chairman of arrangements. Other members of the committee are Mrs. Gorham Brooks, Mrs. Frederick G. Hall, Mrs. George Hawley, Mrs. William James, Mrs. Ronald T. Lyman, Mrs. John Gorham Palfrey, Mrs. Henry Seton, Mrs. Edward A. Taft and Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb. Invitations for the concert are being mailed this week.

Co-operating with the concert committee are a number of prominent Finnish people who are deeply interested both in the concert and the cause. Among these are Mrs. John B. Mattson, wife of the Finnish vice consul, Mrs. Karl Karjalainen, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew [illegible], Mr. and Mrs. C. Harry Kunholm, Mrs. Jaako Mikkola, Miss Siir Autio, Mrs. Aimo Ahola Mrs. Norman Gellatty, Mr. and Mrs. U. R. Paakonen and Miss Florence Korpela.

Conducted Helsinki Orchestra

Mr. Hannikainen has been the regular conductor of the Helsinki and Turku Symphony Orchestras and the Finnish National Opera. Coming to this country in the early winter at the invitation of Dr. Koussevitzky, he has conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra on two occasions in Boston, and twice in New York.

Members of the sub-committee for the concert include Mrs. Roger F. Hooper, Mrs. C. Sedgwick Marquand, Mrs. Francis MacVeagh, Mrs. Alfred McIntyre, Mrs. Maurice M. Osborne, Mrs. Hamilton Osgood, Mrs. William Roelker, Mrs. Roger S. Warner, Mrs. Anita Clark Woodard, and Mrs. John Yerxa.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 24 1940

WORDS About
Music
And Musicians

The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have contributed $95,000 of the $100,000 goal sought by the organization, Reginald C. Foster, chairman, reports.

Many Hartford music lovers have enrolled as members of the Friends. Application for membership may be made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Inc., 6 Beacon St., Boston, Mass.

* * *

The program for the Boston Symphony's Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall will comprise the Beethoven Symphony No. 8 in F major, Op. 93, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 6 in B minor (Pathetique), Op. 74.

* * *

The closing concerts in the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series of the Boston Symphony will take place next week under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky. The program will consist of the Beethoven Symphony No. 4 in B flat major, Op. 60, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.

* * *

Warner Lawson, who is head of the music department at A&T College at Greensboro, N. C., brought his choir of 35 voices to Mount Vernon, N. Y., last week during the course of a northern tour. The concert was given in the Jewish Synagogue and included classical and modern works.

Gl, Apr 27

MUSIC
SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon their commemoration of the 100th anniversary of Peter Ilitsch Tchaikovsky, who was born May 7, 1840. What was originally announced as a Tchaikovsky Festival has shrunk to performance of the Russian composer's three best-known symphonies. The Sixth, more familiarly the "Pathetic," was heard yesterday and will be repeated tonight, sharing the program with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. To close the Monday-Tuesday concerts, next week, Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony is scheduled, and his Fifth, in E minor, will be played at the final concerts of the season May 3 and 4. These three programs actually honor Beethoven as much as Tchaikovsky, for each contains a Beethoven symphony.

Perhaps no two works are more unlike than the "Pathetic" and the Beethoven Eighth, one of large design, almost hysterically emotional, ending in utter despair, the other a "little" symphony, recalling the impersonal grace of the 18th century, brisk and consistently cheerful. In their differing ways each is a masterpiece testing not only the technical finesse of an orchestra but a conductor's imagination, his grasp of style.

Beethoven was nicely done, but the dramatic moments of the afternoon came with Tchaikovsky. Mr. Koussevitzky, as many have pointed out on many occasions, is probably without a peer at interpreting Tchaikovsky. He manages to wring all the emotion from the music without taking one's mind off the tonal splendor.

The "Pathetic" was a long crescendo through the embattled third movement, and from that point just as finely-proportioned a descent from Tchaikovsky's emotional peak. Only a great orchestra could so respond as the Boston Symphony did to Mr. Koussevitzky's demands. Ordinarily the Friday audience never applauds until a symphony is finished, but the heroic intensity of the third movement urged them to spontaneous handclapping. Conductors, at least some of them, are reportedly touchy on the matter, feeling that musical continuity is broken if applause breaks in before the conclusion. Whether Mr. Koussevitzky was displeased, one would not venture to say. Departing from all custom, he signalled the men to rise and share the ovation, which began all over again after the finale.

C. W. D.

Monitor

Y, APRIL 25, 1940 —New England News—

Symphony Harpist Mingles Muses of Music and Poetry

By a Staff Photographer

Elford Caughey

He plays the harp in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and writes poetry—and has made a career of both.

Elford Caughey is the second harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which should be a full time job for anybody — but Mr. Caughey is not that kind of an artist. In fact he manages to conduct two careers without too much difficulty—except in the matter of names. He admits that his name has given him some trouble.

"You can't pronounce it," he says with a faint air of resignation, "nobody can pronounce it." One gathers that the matter of pronunciation doesn't bother Mr. Caughey—he calls it Cawee—so much as a harpist. After all harpists are few and far between and if you just say, "you know, that other fellow that plays the harp in the symphony, most people know who you mean."

But, one gathers from Mr. Caughey, it is different with a poet—and Mr. Caughey has managed to write and publish quite a lot of poetry in the past ten or more years he has been with the Boston Symphony.

Drops His Pen Name

Only for a great many of these years only a few people who knew he was Elford Caughey the harpist knew that he was also Thistram Livingstone, a poet whose work was appearing in some of the better magazines. Now, after some years of this duality, he has decided to merge his careers and be Elford Caughey, harpist and poet, or poet and harpist. It seems that he is not sure which career will come first.

Of course, the most obvious thing to ask Mr. Caughey is if the harp or the poetry was his first means of expression. His answer is that he studied the harp since boyhood but that he has been writing poems for about ten years.

Does he find a relationship between poetry and music?

He doesn't. At least as far as his own experience is concerned. He sees poetry as a different means of expression—a more personal and individual one.

Now Merges Muses

He takes his poetry as seriously as his music, however, and the other year he spent his entire time studying and writing poetry. He returned to the harp because, he says, "I found that I wrote as much poetry when I was spending part of my time with harp as I did when I had all day to write."

He thinks of poetry not as a social instrument but as a revelation of the experiences of living. One gathers from talking with him that he is not in sympathy with much of the so-called "modern" poetry. It is possible that he is more influenced by the harp than he knows.

In his apartment, a little way from Symphony Hall, he keeps several harps. It is a bookish and musical atmosphere in which he makes music and poems. A great white Russian wolf hound adds to the picture of musician and poet.

"There is a great deal of beauty and comfort in the modern world," he says. "I think that poetry and music should express these qualities. It is as important that some artists express these things and make us aware of them. Otherwise we might grow to believe, if we heard and read only some of our modern musicians and poets, that the world possessed no admirable aspects at all."

He writes a great deal—between concerts, between lessons and other odd moments of the day and night. "I write all the time," he tells you as if he spent no time at all with harp. But music, it appears, is so much of his life that it doesn't occupy a great deal of his free thought. You feel that he very possibly is writing a sonnet in his head in the midst of a symphony concert.

That is the strongest impression that you gain from talking with this young man—he has music and poetry in his head.

John Ritchey.

TCHAIKOVSKY BY SYMPHONY

Outstanding Performance of Russian's Sixth Given

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A week ago Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra were commemorating the 25th anniversary of the death of Alexander Scriabin. Yesterday afternoon they offered the first of three programmes designed to mark the centenary of the birth of another and greater Russian, Peter Ilitch Tchaikovsky.

For seasons that seemed obscure on paper but clear in practice, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen to link Beethoven and Tchaikovsky in these final concerts of the season. Incidentally, those who wish to attend a thoroughgoing Tchaikovsky festival can betake themselves to the Berkshires next August, when three of the nine concerts at "Tanglewood" will be devoted entirely to his music.

Before the current season is done our orchestra will have played six of the nine Symphonies of Beethoven, and intrinsically there was no particular call for yesterday's performance of the eighth. Nor was it on the whole and especially happy one, being rather heavy-handed, though it had its bright spots, such as the trio of the Minuet and the second theme of the Finale. Yet had the first part of the concert been given over to other pieces by Tchaikovsky, the performance of the "Pathetic" Symphony could hardly have made the profound impression that it did when heard after the gay, impersonal, essentially rhythmic and tamely scored music of the German master.

So far as paying symphonic tribute to Tchaikovsky is concerned, the ultimate tribute has now been paid. Neither the Fourth Symphony, to be heard on Monday and Tuesday, nor the Fifth, which ends the season on Friday and Saturday, can be compared with the Sixth, either structurally or thematically, while they convey no such emotional message. Nevertheless, to end a season on the bleak and blank despair of the "Pathetic's" final measures, would hardly do.

It is an unwritten law that there shall be no applause between the movements of symphonies, but that ban has been lifted in the case of the third division of the "Pathetique." Yesterday there were the usual plaudits here, as there was the usual moment of awed, or respectful, silence when the last chord of the finale had vanished into nothingness.

Dr. Koussevitzky's approach to the "Pathetique" is not the only one. Mr. Toscanini, for example, prefers to play it "straight," with no underscoring of its tragedy, its melodrama, its frenetic excitement, its sentiment or its abysmal gloom. But who shall say after yesterday's performance that we who were so fortunate as to be there did not hear this remarkable tonal document exactly as it should be heard—and as we are not likely to hear it from any other hands?

Symphony's Final Week

April 28

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its 59th season to a close with the concerts of the ensuing week in Symphony Hall. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct two pairs of concerts—one on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, April 29 and 30, and one on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, May 3 and 4.

In each of these programs, Dr. Koussevitsky will commemorate the 100th anniversary of the birth of Tchaikovsky. The program for Friday and Saturday will consist of Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor. The program for Monday and Tuesday will consist of Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 28 1940

Mr. Judson, who seldom speaks for publication, also mentioned the conductorial situation. He suggested that the musical world was "starting a new epoch of building conductors" and that no one knew as yet who would be the "future Koussevitzky, Toscanini or Stokowski."

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, APRIL 27, 1940

Symphony Celebrates Tchaikovsky Centennial

30

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 23d regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows

Beethoven
Symphony No. 8 in F major Op. 93
Tchaikovsky
Symphony No. 6 in B minor Op. 74, "Pathetique"

It was a very intelligent idea of Mr. Koussevitzky's to celebrate the Tchaikovsky centennial with contrasted programs, balancing the light-hearted eighth, fourth and second symphonies of Beethoven with the brooding, introspective and majestic music of Tchaikovsky. A number of all-Tchaikovsky programs would be too much; his genius is best appreciated when set off against something quite different.

To be sure, it was a pity that we could not have had a concert performance of the opera "Pique Dame," as originally planned, but Mr. Koussevitzky was unable to assemble the singers who would suit him and who could sing it in Russian. (We can recall, for example, how oddly cosmopolitan "Boris Godunoff" sounded in Italian.) No matter how familiar the last three symphonies are, you cannot honor the composer's anniversary properly except by playing them once again. It is doubtful if we should have thanked Mr. Koussevitzky if he had elected to give us the "Manfred" symphony in place of the "Pathetique."

No wider emotional gulf can be imagined between two great symphonies than between those offered in Symphony Hall yesterday. For all its gaiety and high spirits Beethoven's eighth is a remarkable work intellectually, full of ingenious and dramatic surprises. The score must be read in performance with immense vitality and gusto. The humor must not be prettified. It seemed to us that Mr. Koussevitzky secured from the orchestra a really magnificent interpretation.

Beethoven's eighth does not stir the emotions of an audience as does the "Pathetique." But if the public did not stamp and cheer—and indeed such a display would be out of place after music with such capacity for laughter—the performance was just as much a triumph for the orchestra as that which it enjoyed in the second half of the program.

Tchaikovsky's finest symphony was played with blazing eloquence yesterd ay. We have always known that Mr. Koussevitzy has a miraculous affinity with this work, and it seemed as if the orchestra rose to new heights under the spell of and quickened by the conductor's imagination. The extraordinary range of tone and the wonderful sonority of the Boston Symphony were superbly demonstrated. Familiar music splendidly recreated was the story of yesterday's concert, and it is certain that two other versions of that story will come to pass before next week is out.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the following concerts will be given: On Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon Beethoven's 4th Symphony and Tchaikovsky's 4th Symphony will be heard; on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Beethoven's 2d Symphony and Tchaikovsky's 5th Symphony will be heard. The latter will conclude the 59th season of the Boston Symphony.

Pop Concerts Begin May 8

Trav Apr 27

On Wednesday evening, May 8, the Pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall their 55th season. Arthur Fiedler will preside over the orchestra of Symphony players which, under his leadership these many years past, have moved toward their present peak of popularity. The Pops will be given each night of the week, with Sunday night concerts through the month of May. The season will be dotted with special nights of interest, and will at all other times provide diversified fare, ranging from popular classics to such music of the moment as may have possibilities of symphonic presentation. Symphony Hall will be transformed into its summer guise, with tables covering the floor at which refreshments are served.

STUDY IN CONTRAST

Koussevitzky Applauded in Brilliant Program of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky

A crasser contrast than was offered by the two symphonies in which Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, would be difficult to imagine. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" have one thing in common: that their composers were well satisfied with them. Beethoven is reported to have explained the relative coolness with which his Eighth Symphony was received after the triumph of the Seventh with the impatient remark: "Because it is so much better." And Tchaikovsky, after the premiere of his Symphony "Pathetique," told his friend Glazounoff that for the first time in his career he had come away from hearing one of his compositions "with a feeling of complete content." But there the resemblances between the two works cease.

Presenting the Beethoven Symphony Koussevitzky has not hesitated to exploit the virtuosity of the great instrument upon which he plays, and if this leads him occasionally to exaggerate as allegro vivace almost into a presto, the sin is not so heinous as it might seem. For "allegro" denotes a state of mind, not a number of beats per minute, and in our time that state of mind seeks swifter expression than it did in Beethoven's day.

The Composer as Virtuoso

Then in a deeper sense Beethoven himself appears in this work as a virtuoso. With the mastery born of complete emancipation he toys about here in classical formulae from whose shackles he has long since freed himself. Was there ever such a combination of naive joy and complete urbanity? For a moment he assumes the Rococo elegance from which he graduated in his "Eroica" Symphony — he juggles with the form whose classical limits he has long since transcended. And never is the amazing sureness of his own formal instinct clearer than when, to the conservative eye, he is breaking sacrosanct structural canons.

In place of the traditional slow movement there is the deliciously debonair Allegretto scherzando, with the theme which Beethoven later used in his famous metronome round, "Ta, ta, ta, lieber Maelzel." And then, because a scherzo of the type which he had developed would have destroyed the essential symphonic element of contrast, Beethoven relaxes the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 30 1940

Boston Symphony Committee Welcomes Eight New Members; Mrs. Davenport Is Tea Hostess

The Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts yesterday welcomed eight new members at its spring meeting at the home of the executive chairman, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, No. 31 Grace court.

The new members, presented by Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of membership, included: Mrs. William G. James, Mrs. George M. Billings, Mrs. Arthur V. McDermott Mrs. William M. Park, Mrs. William B. Parker, Mrs. Irving L. Cabot, Mrs. Bruce Bromley and Mrs. Edwin Eberman, Jr.

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the board of trustees of the Berkshire Festival was guest of honor and addressed the meeting on the Boston Symphony annual music festival to be held at Tanglewood, Mass., during the month of August. Plans for the annual Brooklyn concerts to be given by the orchestra during the 1940-41 at the Brooklyn Academy of Music were discussed.

Mrs. Oliver Goldsmith Carter and Mrs. Lewis W. Francis presided at the tea table preceding the business meeting.

Among those present were Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Samuel T. Brown, Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Ellwood Colahan, Mrs. Gordon Weir Colton, Miss Theodora Goldsmith, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, Mrs. Charles Jaffa, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, James G. McDonald, Mrs. Roland Rasch, Miss Agnes Ritchie, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. William Slater, Mrs. Harold Irving Small, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. William H. Whitton and Mrs. Maude B. Wood.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

APR 25 1940

BERKSHIRE HOME FOR KOUSSEVITSKY

Orchestra Leader Buys Estate at Lenox

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and head of the Berkshire Music Center at Stockbridge, has purchased the summer home of the late Miss Kate Buckingham on the south slope of Bald Head mountain in Lenox.

The purchase of the estate was made from the Art Institute of Chicago which received the property as a bequest from Miss Buckingham. Dr. and Mrs. Koussevitsky plan to take immediate possession. They will probably arrive in Lenox early in the summer to have the house in readiness for the opening of the Music Center July 9.

Tchaikovsky Honored

The Arts in Boston

With yesterday's symphony concert—the last Friday reunion of the season but one—Dr. Koussevitzky opened his informal festival in honor of the one-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Peter Ilitsch Tchaikovsky (May 7, 1840) by playing the "Pathétique" Symphony. On Monday and Tuesday he will play the Fourth, and for the final concerts of the season, the following Friday and Saturday, the Fifth. On each of these three programs the Tchaikovsky work is preceded by a Beethoven symphony of contrasted character; yesterday the Eighth, Monday and Tuesday the Fourth, next Friday and Saturday the Second.

Of the performance of the "Pathétique" yesterday it is of course possible to speak only in terms of the highest praise. Dr. Koussevitzky is the supreme interpreter of Tchaikovsky and the Boston Symphony is probably the only orchestra which could meet his demands in this work. The audience was so stirred at the close of the third movement that it broke the rule against applause between movements, and the conductor, far from rebuking the listeners, invited the players to share the tribute. After the subtly graduated pianissimo of the close, there was not only prolonged handclapping but stamping and shouts of approval. The performance was a magnificent manifestation of collaboration between an imaginative conductor and a virtuosic orchestra.

Some of the emotional and dramatic drive which imbued the Tchaikovsky was also evident in the Beethoven, and here it was less in order, both in respect of the nature of the work and in respect of its function on the program. This symphony is essentially a light and pleasant piece. It is true that the first movement is marked "Con brio," but this is obviously intended to be a Con brio with a difference; not like that of the Fifth Symphony, but one more suitable to the essence of the music. Dr. Koussevitzky obtained a brilliant performance of the symphony, but by taking the two Allegros at a furious pace and by using too much black-and-white in both his dynamics and his tempi throughout, he did less than justice to a charming work.

L. A. S.

Apr. 28. Post

Speaking of Tchaikovsky's centennial observances, there will be a real Tchaikovsky Festival in connection with the Symphony Orchestra's concerts in the Berkshires next August, three entire concerts being devoted to that composer's work, with Artur Rodzinski as conductor of one of them. Here in Boston Dr. Koussevitzky will continue in his attempt to counter-balance Tchaikovsky with Beethoven. At the concerts of tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon the Fourth Symphonies of the two composers will be played and at those of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, which conclude the present season, the symphonies will be Beethoven's Second and Tchaikovsky's Fifth.

* * * *

A week from Thursday evening the Pops begin again and the music season of 1939-40 enters its second phase. Until that time the winter activities continue. There will be two concerts today, both in Jordan Hall. In the afternoon the Women's Symphony Orchestra gives its final concert and in the evening the Boston College Alumni Glee Club will be heard, under the direction of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

APR 28 1940

THE FINAL WEEK OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony orchestra will bring its 59th season to a close with the concerts of the coming week, in Symphony Hall. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct two pairs of concerts,—one on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, April 29 and 30, ad one on Friday afternoon ad Saturday evening, May 3 and 4.

In each of these programmes, Dr. Koussevitzky will commemorate the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Tchaikovsky. The programme for Friday and Saturday will consist of Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No 5 in E minor. The programme for Monday and Tuesday will consist of Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, APRIL 27, 1940

Symphony Celebrates Tchaikovsky Centennial

30

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 23d regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Beethoven
Symphony No. 8 in F major Op. 93
Tchaikovsky
Symphony No. 6 in B minor Op. 74, "Pathetique"

It was a very intelligent idea of Mr. Koussevitzky's to celebrate the Tchaikovsky centennial with contrasted programs, balancing the light-hearted eighth, fourth and second symphonies of Beethoven with the brooding, introspective and majestic music of Tchaikovsky. A number of all-Tchaikovsky programs would be too much; his genius is best appreciated when set off against something quite different.

To be sure, it was a pity that we could not have had a concert performance of the opera "Pique Dame," as originally planned, but Mr. Koussevitzky was unable to assemble the singers who would suit him and who could sing it in Russian. (We can recall, for example, how oddly cosmopolitan "Boris Godunoff" sounded in Italian.) No matter how familiar the last three symphonies are, you cannot honor the composer's anniversary properly except by playing them once again. It is doubtful if we should have thanked Mr. Koussevitzky if he had elected to give us the "Manfred" symphony in place of the "Pathetique."

No wider emotional gulf can be imagined between two great symphonies than between those offered in Symphony Hall yesterday. For all its gaiety and high spirits Beethoven's eighth is a remarkable work intellectually, full of ingenious and dramatic surprises. The score must be read in performance with immense vitality and gusto. The humor must not be prettified. It seemed to us that Mr. Koussevitzky secured from the orchestra a really magnificent interpretation.

Beethoven's eighth does not stir the emotions of an audience as does the "Pathetique." But if the public did not stamp and cheer—and indeed such a display would be out of place after music with such capacity for laughter—the performance was just as much a triumph for the orchestra as that which it enjoyed in the second half of the program.

Tchaikovsky's finest symphony was played with blazing eloquence yesterd ay. We have always known that Mr. Koussevitzy has a miraculous affinity with this work, and it seemed as if the orchestra rose to new heights under the spell of and quickened by the conductor's imagination. The extraordinary range of tone and the wonderful sonority of the Boston Symphony were superbly demonstrated. Familiar music splendidly recreated was the story of yesterday's concert, and it is certain that two other versions of that story will come to pass before next week is out.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the following concerts will be given: On Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon Beethoven's 4th Symphony and Tchaikovsky's 4th Symphony will be heard; on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Beethoven's 2d Symphony and Tchaikovsky's 5th Symphony will be heard. The latter will conclude the 59th season of the Boston Symphony.

Pop Concerts Begin May 8

Trans Apr 27

On Wednesday evening, May 8, the Pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall their 55th season. Arthur Fiedler will preside over the orchestra of Symphony players which, under his leadership these many years past, have moved toward their present peak of popularity. The Pops will be given each night of the week, with Sunday night concerts through the month of May. The season will be dotted with special nights of interest, and will at all other times provide diversified fare, ranging from popular classics to such music of the moment as may have possibilities of symphonic presentation. Symphony Hall will be transformed into its summer guise, with tables covering the floor at which refreshments are served.

STUDY IN CONTRAST

Koussevitzky Applauded in Brilliant Program of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky

A crasser contrast than was offered by the two symphonies in which Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, would be difficult to imagine. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" have one thing in common: that their composers were well satisfied with them. Beethoven is reported to have explained the relative coolness with which his Eighth Symphony was received after the triumph of the Seventh with the impatient remark: "Because it is so much better." And Tchaikovsky, after the premiere of his Symphony "Pathetique," told his friend Glazounoff that for the first time in his career he had come away from hearing one of his compositions "with a feeling of complete content." But there the resemblances between the two works cease.

Presenting the Beethoven Symphony Koussevitzky has not hesitated to exploit the virtuosity of the great instrument upon which he plays, and if this leads him occasionally to exaggerate as allegro vivace almost into a presto, the sin is not so heinous as it might seem. For "allegro" denotes a state of mind, not a number of beats per minute, and in our time that state of mind seeks swifter expression than it did in Beethoven's day.

The Composer as Virtuoso

Then in a deeper sense Beethoven himself appears in this work as a virtuoso. With the mastery born of complete emancipation he toys about here in classical formulae from whose shackles he has long since freed himself. Was there ever such a combination of naive joy and complete urbanity? For a moment he assumes the Rococo elegance from which he graduated in his "Eroica" Symphony — he juggles with the form whose classical limits he has long since transcended. And never is the amazing sureness of his own formal instinct clearer than when, to the conservative eye, he is breaking sacrosanct structural canons.

In place of the traditional slow movement there is the deliciously debonair Allegretto scherzando, with the theme which Beethoven later used in his famous metronome round, "Ta, ta, ta, lieber Maelzel." And then, because a scherzo of the type which he had developed would have destroyed the essential symphonic element of contrast, Beethoven relaxes the

---

Tchaikovsky Honored

The Arts in Boston

April 27

With yesterday's symphony concert—the last Friday reunion of the season but one—Dr. Koussevitzky opened his informal festival in honor of the one-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Peter Ilitsch Tchaikovsky (May 7, 1840) by playing the "Pathétique" Symphony. On Monday and Tuesday he will play the Fourth, and for the final concerts of the season, the following Friday and Saturday, the Fifth. On each of these three programs the Tchaikovsky work is preceded by a Beethoven symphony of contrasted character; yesterday the Eighth, Monday and Tuesday the Fourth, next Friday and Saturday the Second.

Of the performance of the "Pathétique" yesterday it is of course possible to speak only in terms of the highest praise. Dr. Koussevitzky is the supreme interpreter of Tchaikovsky and the Boston Symphony is probably the only orchestra which could meet his demands in this work. The audience was so stirred at the close of the third movement that it broke the rule against applause between movements, and the conductor, far from rebuking the listeners, invited the players to share the tribute. After the subtly graduated pianissimo of the close, there was not only prolonged handclapping but stamping and shouts of approval. The performance was a magnificent manifestation of collaboration between an imaginative conductor and a virtuosic orchestra.

Some of the emotional and dramatic drive which imbued the Tchaikovsky was also evident in the Beethoven, and here it was less in order, both in respect of the nature of the work and in respect of its function on the program. This symphony is essentially a light and pleasant piece. It is true that the first movement is marked "Con brio," but this is obviously intended to be a Con brio with a difference; not like that of the Fifth Symphony, but one more suitable to the essence of the music. Dr. Koussevitzky obtained a brilliant performance of the symphony, but by taking the two Allegros at a furious pace and by using too much black-and-white in both his dynamics and his tempi throughout, he did less than justice to a charming work.

L. A. S.

Apr. 28. Post

Speaking of Tchaikovsky's centennial observances, there will be a real Tchaikovsky Festival in connection with the Symphony Orchestra's concerts in the Berkshires next August, three entire concerts being devoted to that composer's work, with Artur Rodzinski as conductor of one of them. Here in Boston Dr. Koussevitzky will continue in his attempt to counter-balance Tchaikovsky with Beethoven. At the concerts of tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon the Fourth Symphonies of the two composers will be played and at those of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, which conclude the present season, the symphonies will be Beethoven's Second and Tchaikovsky's Fifth.

• • • •

A week from Thursday evening the Pops begin again and the music season of 1939-40 enters its second phase. Until that time the winter activities continue. There will be two concerts today, both in Jordan Hall. In the afternoon the Women's Symphony Orchestra gives its final concert and in the evening the Boston College Alumni Glee Club will be heard, under the direction of Theodore N. Marier.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 30 1940

Boston Symphony Committee Welcomes Eight New Members; Mrs. Davenport Is Tea Hostess

The Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts yesterday welcomed eight new members at its spring meeting at the home of the executive chairman, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, No. 31 Grace court.

The new members, presented by Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of membership, included: Mrs. William G. James, Mrs. George M. Billings, Mrs. Arthur V. McDermott Mrs. William M. Park, Mrs. William B. Parker, Mrs. Irving L. Cabot, Mrs. Bruce Bromley and Mrs. Edwin Eberman, Jr.

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the board of trustees of the Berkshire Festival was guest of honor and addressed the meeting on the Boston Symphony annual music festival to be held at Tanglewood, Mass., during the month of August. Plans for the annual Brooklyn concerts to be given by the orchestra during the 1940-41 at the Brooklyn Academy of Music were discussed.

Mrs. Oliver Goldsmith Carter and Mrs. Lewis W. Francis presided at the tea table preceding the business meeting.

Among those present were Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Samuel T. Brown, Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Ellwood Colahan, Mrs. Gordon Weir Colton, Miss Theodora Goldsmith, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, Mrs. Charles Jaffa, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, James G. McDonald, Mrs. Roland Rasch, Miss Agnes Ritchie, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. William Slater, Mrs. Harold Irving Small, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. William H. Whitton and Mrs. Maude B. Wood.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

APR 28 1940

THE FINAL WEEK OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony orchestra will bring its 59th season to a close with the concerts of the coming week, in Symphony Hall. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct two pairs of concerts,—one on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, April 29 and 30, ad one on Friday afternoon ad Saturday evening, May 3 and 4.

In each of these programmes, Dr. Koussevitzky will commemorate the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Tchaikovsky. The programme for Friday and Saturday will consist of Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No 5 in E minor. The programme for Monday and Tuesday will consist of Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

APR 25 1940

BERKSHIRE HOME FOR KOUSSEVITSKY

Orchestra Leader Buys Estate at Lenox

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and head of the Berkshire Music Center at Stockbridge, has purchased the summer home of the late Miss Kate Buckingham on the south slope of Bald Head mountain in Lenox.

The purchase of the estate was made from the Art Institute of Chicago which received the property as a bequest from Miss Buckingham. Dr. and Mrs. Koussevitsky plan to take immediate possession. They will probably arrive in Lenox early in the summer to have the house in readiness for the opening of the Music Center July 9.

31 MUSIC Transcript Apr 30

Tchaikovsky Honored

Koussevitzky Ends Monday Evening Series With Brilliant Tribute to Unhappy Genius

By EDWARD DOWNES

It is not only Tchaikovsky fans who regret that the projected Tchaikovsky Festival of the Boston Symphony has dwindled to the presentation of his three most popular symphonies. These performances, one of which was given last night in the concluding program of this season's Monday evening concerts, are admittedly of epochal splendor and dramatic power, but they alone cannot give even the sketchiest impression of the many facets of Tchaikovsky's genius, not to mention his evolution as an artist.

Considered merely from the point of view of canny program-building, however, the coupling, or rather the pitting against each other of the Fourth Symphonies of Tchaikovsky and Beethoven provided a clash of styles that made excellent entertainment. Happily Dr. Koussevitzky finds no strain in being a great artist and a great entertainer at the same time.

If his wide fame as an interpreter of Tchaikovsky needed any further confirmation at this late date, it is receiving it through the current performances. Not one of the subtlest symphonic works, the Fourth Symphony has spots, especially in the last movement, which border perilously on the banal. Yet for all its weaknesses and melodrama, who would not miss this volcanic masterpiece from our repertory, if the score were lost tomorrow?

Precisely because of its passages of naive grandiloquence, the Fourth Symphony cannot support an apologetic or half-hearted performance. The fire of conviction must course strongly through its veins. And when it does, as was the case last night, then even its most obvious passages are transformed and take on unsuspected nobility. Dr. Koussevitzky's Andantino and Scherzo were models of subtle line and phrasing, but it was the embattled first movement that made the unforgettable impression. The last movement was hurried.

This holds true too of the final movement of the Beethoven which has been performed before this season by the Boston Symphony and at this same breakneck speed. It is sometimes hard to take offense at their tempo, for the orchestra responds with such incredible sensitivity, fleetness and precision to the extremely personal interpretation of Dr. Koussevitzky, that the result is a thrilling tour de force—technically as well as artistically. On the other hand, this tempo is extremely difficult to reconcile with Beethoven's restriction: "Allegro, ma non troppo." You can like it or not, as you choose.

The tempi of the first three movements hovered in the neighborhood of perfection and the playing was of the utmost distinction. It was a brilliant close to this short series of concerts.

Globe MUSIC Apr 30

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra continued its observance of the 100th anniversary of Tchaikovsky's birth, at the final concert in the Monday series, last night. The Russian composer's Fourth Symphony, in F minor, occupied the second half of a program that began with another fourth symphony, Beethoven's, in B-flat major. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

As at the concerts of last Friday and Saturday, the exuberant music of Beethoven contrasted strongly with the feverish passion and the dark brooding of Tchaikovsky. The same comparison will be evident at the final concerts of the season, later in the week, when Tchaikovsky's Fifth will share the list with Beethoven's Second Symphony.

Of the three most popular Tchaikovsky symphonies, the Fourth probably has the most episodes of a dynamic vigor approaching violence. Unless the "Fate" Symphony is carefully proportioned, the tidal surge of the first and last movements can seem noisy rather than powerful. Mr. Koussevitzky does not tone down the Tchaikovsky climaxes, far from it, but he does give them a sense of continuity and ever-increasing intensity. Whenever he conducts this F minor Symphony one is struck by the thought that it appears to fire his imagination as he goes along; his interpretation gathers voltage until, when the finale is reached, the effect is of elemental force.

Beethoven's playful Fourth Symphony is actually more substantial music than Tchaikovsky's Fourth, and its light character draws from the conductor a corresponding difference of treatment. Last night's performance, so precise, so clear and "Beethovenish," testified to the extraordinary powers of the orchestra as well as those of Mr. Koussevitzky. Tchaikovsky, with all his emotion, did not put Beethoven in the shade.

The program will be repeated at 3 this afternoon. C. W. D.

Her. MUSIC Apr 30

Monday Symphony

The sixth and last of the Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Serge Koussevitsky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Beethoven. . Symphony in B-flat major No. 4
Tchaikovsky. . Symphony in F minor No. 4

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its regular Monday evening concerts to a close last night with performances of Beethoven's and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphonies. The pairing of the two composers' works affords an exceedinglly interesting contrast, the gaiety and lightness of the former being set side by side with the sombre emotional conflict and crashing conclusion of the latter. Those deeply immersed in musical knowledge may analyze minutely and set these two deeply stirring and beautiful works in their proper niches, but it is also possible to sit back and enjoy their extraordinary melodic richness without attempting to determine their exact positions in the musical hierarchy.

In listening to both symphonies, however, it is profitable to recall the circumstances under which they were written. Beethoven was supposedly at the peak of happiness—some say he was engaged to Theresa von Brunswick at the time—and if his personal feelings were reflected in his music, the serenely lovely adagio might well be considered the most lofty tribute any woman ever received. (On the other hand, it is perfectly possible that Theresa had nothing at all to do with it, which makes the work none the less remarkable.) Tchaikovsky, by way of contrast, had fled to his music as a refuge from the appalling fiasco of his marriage and was able to find it in perfect solace and unalloyed delight.

There is, of course, no way of understanding the workings of genius, but speculation, even of the inconclusive sort, is always entertining. To add anything new to the praises already bestowed upon Mr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra for their performances of these works would be superfluous and impossible at this late date, and last night's renderings had all the expected clarity, beauty and sonority. There was tremendous enthusiasm expressed by the audience at the intermission and even more so at the end of the program.

The two symphonies will be presented again this afternoon at the sixth and last of this year's Tuesday concerts. On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the orchestra conducted by Koussevitsky, will give the final concerts of the season, the program consisting of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and Beethoven's Second. E. L. H.

Three 'Silly Symphonists'

Jesus Maria Sanroma (standing), Boston's noted pianist, takes a lesson from Bernard Zighera, first harpist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in preparation for Wednesday night's mock floor show by a group of Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians at the Boston Art Club on Dartmouth street. The show, called "Gone with the Woodwinds," will include "jamming," musical sleight of hand, and even "hot" jazz by the Symphony Orchestra artists, who are calling themselves (for one night only) "the Silly Symphonists." The lady "Symphonist" is Cleora Wood, concert soprano. Proceeds of the show are for the South End Music School.

FINAL MONDAY BY SYMPHONY

Tchaikovsky's Fourth Has Memorable Performance

Post Apr 30

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The second of the three Symphony programmes designed to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the birth of Tchaikovsky was offered at Symphony Hall last evening and will be repeated there this afternoon. For reasons best known to himself Dr. Koussevitzky has decided to group in each of these programmes a symphony of Beethoven and one of the Russian master. That of last evening combined the two Fourth Symphonies.

Since Beethoven's Fourth had already been played this season there is no need to comment on last night's performance. Nor is Tchaikovsky's Fourth something with which we are unfamiliar. Time and again we have heard Dr. Koussevitzky's version of this, the least among Tschaikovsky's three best symphonies, and last evening's performance was essentially a replica of its predecessors, with perhaps an extra amount of care and a little added emphasis in view of the nature of the occasion.

As for the Symphony itself, the first movement is of the greater, if not the greatest Tschaikovsky. The second hardly exceeds the bounds of salon music. The third, a brilliant study in contrasted orchestral timbres, attains in its way to the level of the first, but the finale is little more than rowdy exuberance. That the performance in any way disguised or mitigated this rowdiness may not be said.

31

MUSIC

Transcript
April 30

Tchaikovsky Honored

Koussevitzky Ends Monday Evening Series With Brilliant Tribute to Unhappy Genius

By EDWARD DOWNES

It is not only Tchaikovsky fans who regret that the projected Tchaikovsky Festival of the Boston Symphony has dwindled to the presentation of his three most popular symphonies. These performances, one of which was given last night in the concluding program of this season's Monday evening concerts, are admittedly of epochal splendor and dramatic power, but they alone cannot give even the sketchiest impression of the many facets of Tchaikovsky's genius, not to mention his evolution as an artist.

Considered merely from the point of view of canny program-building, however, the coupling, or rather the pitting against each other of the Fourth Symphonies of Tchaikovsky and Beethoven provided a clash of styles that made excellent entertainment. Happily Dr. Koussevitzky finds no strain in being a great artist and a great entertainer at the same time.

If his wide fame as an interpreter of Tchaikovsky needed any further confirmation at this late date, it is receiving it through the current performances. Not one of the subtlest symphonic works, the Fourth Symphony has spots, especially in the last movement, which border perilously on the banal. Yet for all its weaknesses and melodrama, who would not miss this volcanic masterpiece from our repertory, if the score were lost tomorrow?

Precisely because of its passages of naive grandiloquence, the Fourth Symphony cannot support an apologetic or half-hearted performance. The fire of conviction must course strongly through its veins. And when it does, as was the case last night, then even its most obvious passages are transformed and take on unsuspected nobility. Dr. Koussevitzky's Andantino and Scherzo were models of subtle line and phrasing, but it was the embattled first movement that made the unforgettable impression. The last movement was hurried.

This holds true too of the final movement of the Beethoven which has been performed before this season by the Boston Symphony and at this same breakneck speed. It is sometimes hard to take offense at their tempo, for the orchestra responds with such incredible sensitivity, fleetness and precision to the extremely personal interpretation of Dr. Koussevitzky, that the result is a thrilling tour de force—technically as well as artistically. On the other hand, this tempo is extremely difficult to reconcile with Beethoven's restriction: "Allegro, ma non troppo." You can like it or not, as you choose.

The tempi of the first three movements hovered in the neighborhood of perfection and the playing was of the utmost distinction. It was a brilliant close to this short series of concerts.

Globe

MUSIC

apr 30

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra continued its observance of the 100th anniversary of Tchaikovsky's birth, at the final concert in the Monday series, last night. The Russian composer's Fourth Symphony, in F minor, occupied the second half of a program that began with another fourth symphony, Beethoven's, in B-flat major. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

As at the concerts of last Friday and Saturday, the exuberant music of Beethoven contrasted strongly with the feverish passion and the dark brooding of Tchaikovsky. The same comparison will be evident at the final concerts of the season, later in the week, when Tchaikovsky's Fifth will share the list with Beethoven's Second Symphony.

Of the three most popular Tchaikovsky symphonies, the Fourth probably has the most episodes of a dynamic vigor approaching violence. Unless the "Fate" Symphony is carefully proportioned, the tidal surge of the first and last movements can seem noisy rather than powerful. Mr. Koussevitzky does not tone down the Tchaikovsky climaxes, far from it, but he does give them a sense of continuity and ever-increasing intensity. Whenever he conducts this F minor Symphony one is struck by the thought that it appears to fire his imagination as he goes along; his interpretation gathers voltage until, when the finale is reached, the effect is of elemental force.

Beethoven's playful Fourth Symphony is actually more substantial music than Tchaikovsky's Fourth, and its light character draws from the conductor a corresponding difference of treatment. Last night's performance, so precise, so clear and "Beethovenish," testified to the extraordinary powers of the orchestra as well as those of Mr. Koussevitzky. Tchaikovsky, with all his emotion, did not put Beethoven in the shade.

The program will be repeated at 3 this afternoon. C. W. D.

Her.

MUSIC

apr 30

Monday Symphony

The sixth and last of the Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Serge Koussevitsky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Beethoven. . Symphony in B-flat major No. 4
Tchaikovsky. . Symphony in F minor No. 4

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its regular Monday evening concerts to a close last night with performances of Beethoven's and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphonies. The pairing of the two composers' works affords an exceedingly interesting contrast, the gaiety and lightness of the former being set side by side with the sombre emotional conflict and crashing conclusion of the latter. Those deeply immersed in musical knowledge may analyze minutely and set these two deeply stirring and beautiful works in their proper niches, but it is also possible to sit back and enjoy their extraordinary melodic richness without attempting to determine their exact positions in the musical hierarchy.

In listening to both symphonies, however, it is profitable to recall the circumstances under which they were written. Beethoven was supposedly at the peak of happiness—some say he was engaged to Theresa von Brunswick at the time—and if his personal feelings were reflected in his music, the serenely lovely adagio might well be considered the most lofty tribute any woman ever received. (On the other hand, it is perfectly possible that Theresa had nothing at all to do with it, which makes the work none the less remarkable.) Tchaikovsky, by way of contrast, had fled to his music as a refuge from the appalling fiasco of his marriage and was able to find it in perfect solace and unalloyed delight.

There is, of course, no way of understanding the workings of genius, but speculation, even of the inconclusive sort, is always entertining. To add anything new to the praises already bestowed upon Mr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra for their performances of these works would be superfluous and impossible at this late date, and last night's renderings had all the expected clarity, beauty and sonority. There was tremendous enthusiasm expressed by the audience at the intermission and even more so at the end of the program.

The two symphonies will be presented again this afternoon at the sixth and last of this year's Tuesday concerts. On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the orchestra conducted by Koussevitsky, will give the final concerts of the season, the program consisting of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and Beethoven's Second. E. L. H.

Trans apr 29

Three 'Silly Symphonists'

Jesus Maria Sanroma (standing), Boston's noted pianist, takes a lesson from Bernard Zighera, first harpist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in preparation for Wednesday night's mock floor show by a group of Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians at the Boston Art Club on Dartmouth street. The show, called "Gone with the Woodwinds," will include "jamming," musical sleight of hand, and even "hot" jazz by the Symphony Orchestra artists, who are calling themselves (for one night only) "the Silly Symphonists." The lady "Symphonist" is Cleora Wood, concert soprano. Proceeds of the show are for the South End Music School.

FINAL MONDAY BY SYMPHONY

Tchaikovsky's Fourth Has Memorable Performance

Post — apr 30

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The second of the three Symphony programmes designed to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the birth of Tchaikovsky was offered at Symphony Hall last evening and will be repeated there this afternoon. For reasons best known to himself Dr. Koussevitzky has decided to group in each of these programmes a symphony of Beethoven and one of the Russian master. That of last evening combined the two Fourth Symphonies.

Since Beethoven's Fourth had already been played this season there is no need to comment on last night's performance. Nor is Tchaikovsky's Fourth something with which we are unfamiliar. Time and again we have heard Dr. Koussevitzky's version of this, the least among Tschaikovsky's three best symphonies, and last evening's performance was essentially a replica of its predecessors, with perhaps an extra amount of care and a little added emphasis in view of the nature of the occasion.

As for the Symphony itself, the first movement is of the greater, if not the greatest Tschaikovsky. The second hardly exceeds the bounds of salon music. The third, a brilliant study in contrasted orchestral timbres, attains in its way to the level of the first, but the finale is little more than rowdy exuberance. That the performance in any way disguised or mitigated this rowdiness may not be said.

32

1940

Final Monday Symphony

Tchaikovsky Fourth Heard In Program With Beethoven

Last night in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of the Monday night series. The program, which will be repeated this afternoon, carried on Dr. Koussevitzky's Tchaikovsky festival by including the Symphony No. 4 in F minor. The other item on the program was the Beethoven Symphony No. 4.

The Beethoven symphony, evidently chosen as a foil, served not only to emphasize the intensity of feeling embodied in the Russian's opus, but it also brought forward with refreshing clarity the classicism of Beethoven, despite the fact that the Fourth Symphony has been termed "romantic" by more than one eminent writer. It is not the romanticism of Tchaikovsky, however, being far removed from the moody, tempestuous measures penned by the Russian.

* * *

Last night, barring the opening phrases, which were taken at too deliberate a tempo, Dr. Koussevitzky gave his audience a particularly songful reading of the Beethoven score. In the second movement, especially, the cantilena was beautifully given out, and seldom have the strings been more eloquent. Bostonians are likely to take their orchestra a bit for granted. A performance such as that of the Adagio serves as a cogent reminder of the virtues of the orchestra and the singing quality of its strings. The symphony was received with great enthusiasm.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky had done well by Beethoven but he lavished all the resources at his command upon Tchaikovsky. The opening measures were literally a clarion call, vigorous and arresting. Whereas the Beethoven had brought forward the string section, the Tchaikovsky emphasized the virtues of the brass and woodwinds, not forgetting the tympani and cymbals. The Scherzo again delighted the listener with the deftness of touch for which, in this particular movement, the Boston orchestra has become famous. Contrasted neatly was the middle portion of the movement in which the woodwinds hold center stage, as usual giving an excellent account of themselves. The final movement brought the customary exhibition of contrasts in the reading by Dr. Koussevitzky, with climax again piled upon climax with an exuberance which even this orchestra has not recently matched. The audience indulged in both stamping and clapping at the conclusion of the performance.

G. M. S.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

John B. Sanromá

The Pops in Preparation

Arthur Fiedler at a rehearsal of the orchestra. The annual series of concerts begins at Symphony Hall on Wednesday, May 8.

HARVARD ALUMNI BULLETIN

Beetles

THE beetle booms adown the glooms and bumps along the dusk," wrote James Whitcomb Riley. And that is how the average man (and woman) thinks of them: bumping along the dusk, getting into the picnic butter, and tickling when they fall down necks—symbols of petty annoyance. But to the busy zoölogist the beetle is something more: it is one of the grains of fodder that whets his insatiable appetite for Knowledge, one of the small links in the chain that he is patiently forging between First Causes and Ultimate Effects. The Fall Collection of North American Beetles, which has recently been left to the Museum of Comparative Zoölogy by the late Dr. Henry Clinton Fall, is patently of vast importance to zoölogists, as Dr. Darlington makes clear in his description of the collection in later pages of this issue. This coleopterous necropolis contains a quarter of a million corpses. A quarter of a million is a lot of anything, let alone beetles. Of beetles, it would almost seem to be enough; but this question need not arise, for the reason that the word "enough" is not included in any scientific dictionary. The specimens range in size, reports Dr. Darlington, from "giants several inches long to pygmies smaller than the head of a pin." (Doubtless we shall look in vain for the monster mentioned by Falstaff in the line: "If I do, fillip me with a three-man beetle!") Segregated by species, ticketed and filed in cases—that is the way the scientist as well as the layman prefers to take his beetles, large and small. Shakespeare (same author) said in Measure for Measure:

> The sense of death is most in apprehension:
> And the poor beetle, that we tread upon,
> In corporal sufferance finds a pang as great
> As when a giant dies.

Surely; but it is comforting to know that these particular 250,000 beetles—an average census for a summer's picnic—did not die in vain.

A Music Summer

THE recent announcement that the Rockefeller Foundation has made a grant of $60,000 in support of the Berkshire Music Center, an outgrowth of the continuing Berkshire Symphonic Festival, has great significance. It is defined as "a notable recognition of the ambitious project of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." The Foundation itself declares that it has "stepped outside its usual program in the humanities to make a contribution toward a project which it is hoped will have an important influence on the development of music in America." It does not concern us here to consider just how this subvention will be expended, as it surely will, for the public good. It is, however, a matter of deep interest and high encouragement to all lovers of the humanities that here in America, and especially at a time when the lights are so tragically out in Europe, an Institute for the advanced

32

1940

Final Monday Symphony

Tchaikovsky Fourth Heard In Program With Beethoven

Last night in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of the Monday night series. The program, which will be repeated this afternoon, carried on Dr. Koussevitzky's Tchaikovsky festival by including the Symphony No. 4 in F minor. The other item on the program was the Beethoven Symphony No. 4.

The Beethoven symphony, evidently chosen as a foil, served not only to emphasize the intensity of feeling embodied in the Russian's opus, but it also brought forward with refreshing clarity the classicism of Beethoven, despite the fact that the Fourth Symphony has been termed "romantic" by more than one eminent writer. It is not the romanticism of Tchaikovsky, however, being far removed from the moody, tempestuous measures penned by the Russian.

* * *

Last night, barring the opening phrases, which were taken at too deliberate a tempo, Dr. Koussevitzky gave his audience a particularly songful reading of the Beethoven score. In the second movement, especially, the cantilena was beautifully given out, and seldom have the strings been more eloquent. Bostonians are likely to take their orchestra a bit for granted. A performance such as that of the Adagio serves as a cogent reminder of the virtues of the orchestra and the singing quality of its strings. The symphony was received with great enthusiasm.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky had done well by Beethoven but he lavished all the resources at his command upon Tchaikovsky. The opening measures were literally a clarion call, vigorous and arresting. Whereas the Beethoven had brought forward the string section, the Tchaikovsky emphasized the virtues of the brass and woodwinds, not forgetting the tympani and cymbals. The Scherzo again delighted the listener with the deftness of touch for which, in this particular movement, the Boston orchestra has become famous. Contrasted neatly was the middle portion of the movement in which the woodwinds hold center stage, as usual giving an excellent account of themselves. The final movement brought the customary exhibition of contrasts in the reading by Dr. Koussevitzky, with climax again piled upon climax with an exuberance which even this orchestra has not recently matched. The audience indulged in both stamping and clapping at the conclusion of the performance.

G. M. S.

John B. Sanromá

The Pops in Preparation

Arthur Fiedler at a rehearsal of the orchestra. The annual series of concerts begins at Symphony Hall on Wednesday, May 8.

HARVARD ALUMNI BULLETIN

Beetles

"THE beetle booms adown the glooms and bumps along the dusk," wrote James Whitcomb Riley. And that is how the average man (and woman) thinks of them: bumping along the dusk, getting into the picnic butter, and tickling when they fall down necks—symbols of petty annoyance. But to the busy zoölogist the beetle is something more: it is one of the grains of fodder that whets his insatiable appetite for Knowledge, one of the small links in the chain that he is patiently forging between First Causes and Ultimate Effects. The Fall Collection of North American Beetles, which has recently been left to the Museum of Comparative Zoölogy by the late Dr. Henry Clinton Fall, is patently of vast importance to zoologists, as Dr. Darlington makes clear in his description of the collection in later pages of this issue. This coleopterous necropolis contains a quarter of a million corpses. A quarter of a million is a lot of anything, let alone beetles. Of beetles, it would almost seem to be enough; but this question need not arise, for the reason that the word "enough" is not included in any scientific dictionary. The specimens range in size, reports Dr. Darlington, from "giants several inches long to pygmies smaller than the head of a pin." (Doubtless we shall look in vain for the monster mentioned by Falstaff in the line: "If I do, fillip me with a three-man beetle!") Segregated by species, ticketed and filed in cases—that is the way the scientist as well as the layman prefers to take his beetles, large and small. Shakespeare (same author) said in Measure for Measure:

> The sense of death is most in apprehension;
> And the poor beetle, that we tread upon,
> In corporal sufferance finds a pang as great
> As when a giant dies.

Surely; but it is comforting to know that these particular 250,000 beetles—an average census for a summer's picnic—did not die in vain.

A Music Summer

(Editorial in the H-A-B-, Ap. [illegible])

THE recent announcement that the Rockefeller Foundation has made a grant of $60,000 in support of the Berkshire Music Center, an outgrowth of the continuing Berkshire Symphonic Festival, has great significance. It is defined as "a notable recognition of the ambitious project of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." The Foundation itself declares that it has "stepped outside its usual program in the humanities to make a contribution toward a project which it is hoped will have an important influence on the development of music in America." It does not concern us here to consider just how this subvention will be expended, as it surely will, for the public good. It is, however, a matter of deep interest and high encouragement to all lovers of the humanities that here in America, and especially at a time when the lights are so tragically out in Europe, an Institute for the advanced

INFORMATION OBSCURED

32

1940

Final Monday Symphony

Tchaikovsky Fourth Heard In Program With Beethoven

Last night in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of the Monday night series. The program, which will be repeated this afternoon, carried on Dr. Koussevitzky's Tchaikovsky festival by including the Symphony No. 4 in F minor. The other item on the program was the Beethoven Symphony No. 4.

The Beethoven symphony, evidently chosen as a foil, served not only to emphasize the intensity of feeling embodied in the Russian's opus, but it also brought forward with refreshing clarity the classicism of Beethoven, despite the fact that the Fourth Symphony has been termed "romantic" by more than one eminent writer. It is not the romanticism of Tchaikovsky, however, being far removed from the moody, tempestuous measures penned by the Russian.

* * *

Last night, barring the opening phrases, which were taken at too deliberate a tempo, Dr. Koussevitzky gave his audience a particularly songful reading of the Beethoven score. In the second movement, especially, the cantilena was beautifully given out, and seldom have the strings been more eloquent. Bostonians are likely to take their orchestra a bit for granted. A performance such as that of the Adagio serves as a cogent reminder of the virtues of the orchestra and the singing quality of its strings. The symphony was received with great enthusiasm.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky had done well by Beethoven but he lavished all the resources at his command upon Tchaikovsky. The opening measures were literally a clarion call, vigorous and arresting. Whereas the Beethoven had brought forward the string section, the Tchaikovsky emphasized the virtues of the brass and woodwinds, not forgetting the tympani and cymbals. The Scherzo again delighted the listener with the deftness of touch for which, in this particular movement, the Boston orchestra has become famous. Contrasted neatly was the middle portion of the movement in which the woodwinds hold center stage, as usual giving an excellent account of themselves. The final movement brought the customary exhibition of contrasts in the reading by Dr. Koussevitzky, with climax again piled upon climax with an exuberance which even this orchestra has not recently matched. The audience indulged in both stamping and clapping at the conclusion of the performance.

G. M. S.

John B. Sanromá

The Pops in Preparation

Arthur Fiedler at a rehearsal of the orchestra. The annual series of concerts begins at Symphony Hall on Wednesday, May 8.

---

study of music and an Academy for the more general cultivation of that art can open their doors in the summer, now so nearly upon us, under such propitious auspices of stability as the Rockefeller grant has added to those that have blessed the enterprise from its very inception.

Detailed plans for this new institution of learning—for such it is—are distributed from Symphony Hall in Boston. The response in the way of applications for enrollment has been remarkable. A partial analysis of the first 350 applications received reveals a wide range of representation—from colleges, music schools, States of the Union—and occupations of the applicants, among whom teachers and students of music naturally top the list. The Center is one from which civilizing influences are bound to radiate as from a university of widely diversified enrollment.

Harvard inevitably plays a considerable part in all this. The honorary doctorate of Serge Koussevitzky, Director of the Center, and the assistant directorship of Professor G. Wallace Woodworth, chairman of the Harvard Department of Music, suggest but two of several links with the University. In relation to these, in which the large student enrollment from Harvard and Radcliffe must be included, it should be said that the performance of Bach's B-Minor Mass is an important item in the program of the Academy, and that after the sixth rendering of that work (on April 21) by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the assistance of the Harvard-Radcliffe Chorus, the individual singers in five separate seasons have numbered nearly 2,500. Out of these a strong nucleus for the Mass choruses may well emerge.

Let not Harvard preen itself unduly, however, on what it is likely to contribute to the Berkshire undertaking. Students, Faculty members, assistants, and spe lecturers to whom Boston and Cambri are foreign parts, will bring their own uable contributions to this summer sch
The more Harvard itself can learn th the better.

QUITE appropriate to the date of issue is the rare piece of Har silver, the subject of our cover.
the following historical and descrip note, the BULLETIN is equally indebte
Yves H. Buhler, '20, who wrote it, an
Mrs. Buhler, assistant in Early Ame
Silver at the Boston Museum of Fine

Paul Revere's famous ride was but a men and the poem extolling it not yet written, w the patriot silversmith wrought this little cr pot. No poem is needed, however, to comm orate Revere's skill as a goldsmith, since in seums, churches, and in private possession remains ample evidence of the master crafts

His services to his country and his silversm ing were coincidental and of long duration first military service was against the Frenc Crown Point in 1756, two years after the d of his father, whose trade he had learned whose business he carried on. The roster ensuing civic and military activities leave wondering how he found time for his mu business affairs. Although he wrote that chief dependence is on my Goldsmith's bu for the expenses of my family," he was a engraver, maintained a hardware store, w in iron, brass, and copper; and practised tistry. His bells are still hanging in many England churches, and sheet copper from foundry covers the dome of the Massachu
State House.

He fought in the Revolution, but in resumed his craft. The Boston Tea Part which he had been an active participant, d less had had its effect on the type of silver he was commissioned to fashion; but per his pleasure in freedom to resume the long-amenity of tea drinking influenced this m craftsman to achieve particularly pleasing and proportion in his tea table appurtena of the next two decades.

Illustrative of such pieces is the crea given to the Fogg Art Museum by Mrs. E
G. Stillman. Its crest in a simple medallio emplifies the craftsman's engraving—the de bands of beading are comparatively rare in vere's silver which we know today.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAY 2 - 1940

Organ Presented Boston Symphony For 'Tanglewood'

An organ has been presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for use in the Berkshires, made possible by a fund of $12,000 granted by the Carnegie Corporation of New York.

The organ will be built by the Aeolian-Skinner Organ Company, from the design of G. Donald Harrison, president, and will be installed in time for use in the first sessions of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, to be given Aug. 1-18 under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Possessing an organ of its own at "Tanglewood," the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which appears with its complete personnel at the Berkshire Festival, will be entirely equipped for whatever instrumentation a symphonic score may demand. E. Power Biggs, announced as the organist for the Festival next August, will play the new instrument in the performance of Bach's Mass in B minor, and likewise in Respighi's orchestral transcription of Bach's Organ Passacaglia.

Acoustical Advice

The specifications of the organ have been decided upon in consultation by Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Biggs and Dr. Archibald T. Davison. The placement of the instrument has been subjected to the advice of Prof. Richard D. Fay of the Massachusetts Intitute of Technology, the acoustical expert to whom the sound proerties of the "Tanglewood" Shed are due. The new organ will be semi-concealed, and will be placed above the stage in a boxlike replica of the stage itself, designed both to project the sound to the best advantage and to enclose the delicate mechanism adequately against deterioration by weather conditions.

Adapted for Combination

The new organ is designed to resemble in tonal scheme the baroque period instrument which the same company built to restore the type of instrument which Bach used. This organ stand in the Germantic Museum of Harvard University. Variations in the plan of the "Tanglewood" organ will consist principally in suiting it for combination with a full symphony orchestra.

An enclosed section, not existing in the Germanic organ, will be added for the purpose of obtaining greater flexibility of tone and to provide a real pianissimo required under certain conditions. Other stops in this section will likewise make possible a fullness and brilliance of sonority suitable to the larger auditorium. The dynamic range will be notably increased, and the range in pitch as well, by the addition of the deepest pedal notes. The organ will be suitable not only in orchestral combination, but for solo use and for the purposes of the new Music Center.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

MAY 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE
MAY 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

MAY 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

MAY 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 2 - 1940

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

MAY 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

MAY 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
MAY 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORWICH, CONN.
RECORD

MAY 2 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
MAY 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAY 2 - 1940

Who Are The Men Behind The Music?

Who are the men who together constitute what many critics — and all Bostonians — consider the finest symphony group in the world — the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

What was their training — and what else do they do? How many are lawyers? What has been their musical training? Who are their favorite composers?

Starting next Friday, the Transcript brings you a series of vivid and authoritative biographies of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — by Paul D. Secon.

You will want to read and to save this interesting series of biographies and pictures of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Three Living Biographies of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYERS will be printed each Monday and Friday.

The Series Starts Friday, Nov. 10

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT

A typical selection (with choral background) by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A cool preamble at top, Then a smooth attack. Ooo, softly. Whew! A hot finish.

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

Introducing You to the Human Side of the Boston Symphony and Three of Its Fine Instrumentalists

(Today the Transcript prints the first of a series of articles called "Men Behind Music," which will present personal sketches of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

Musician at Five

RICHARD BURGIN

Concert master and assistant conductor.

By PAUL SECON

Richard Burgin is the man in the most difficult position in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that of leading the all-important first violin section and the unenviable post of conducting in Dr. Koussevitzky's absence. The latter, one that would shake a less strong and experienced personality, Mr. Burgin shrugs off with ease. Well versed publically, by the time he came to the orchestra as concert-master in 1920, at 27, under Pierre Monteux, he had already toured Scandinavia and Russia many times as soloist. One evening when concert-master in an orchestra in Scandinavia, the conductor was suddenly taken ill. Mr. Burgin was called upon to conduct for the first time in his life. He stepped to the podium, felt perfectly at ease, and led the orchestra through, amongst other things, Beethoven's Fifth.

Coincidentally, when Dr. Koussevitzky was taken ill in December, 1924, Mr. Burgin, conducting the orchestra for the first time, found the same symphonic work on the stand. . . . He started the violin at five and continued because his father thought he showed talent. His taste in music and for certain composers he finds changing with the passing periods of his life. He compares some phases of modern music to Joyce in literature. A good orchestral member should first be an excellent instrumentalist, he finds. Then he should be able to blend and adapt himself to the other players and at the same time understand perfectly the intention of the conductor. . . . Small of stature, very much alive, today Mr. Burgin reads a great deal, teaches, studies scores and plays bridge for divertissement. When performing in the orchestra he moves feelingly with the music. He conducts energetically, stiff-armed and with nodding head.

Albert Bernard

In June, 1922, a young violinist received a law degree from the U. of Paris. Diploma in one hand, violin in the other, he was at the cross-roads. His father wanted law; mother preferred music. Mr. Bernard said, "I found my love for music stronger than for prosecuting." So to the Paris National Conservatory he went. But could he get in? He had spent the last three years concentrating on his studies. He must have an audition. He did and passed first of 13 applicants. The next three years he studied with Capet, played in the Collonne Symphony and joined the Oberdoeffer String quartet. Then in December, 1925, Dr. Koussevitzky, who was in Paris, auditioned the young man. He heard him play a few concertos and Mr. Bernard was a member of the Boston Symphony. Now in his 14th season with the orchestra, his life has been one musical accomplishment after another. Besides playing "with one of the two best orchestras in the world" (the Philadelphia Orchestra being the other), he was decorated last year by the French Government; a reward for the advancement of culture and music. As a violist he is fond of the Suite by Bloch, Theme Varie of George Hue and the Hindemith Viola Sonata. Of the impressionist composers he prefers Debussy, Faure and Beethoven, Bach, Prokofieff and Strawinsky of the classicists and modernists. Of modern music, however, he feels that "dissonance is vanishing and the trend is toward the classic." . . . Mr. Bernard divides the rest of his time between the Boston Chamber Orchestra, the Society of Ancient Instruments (where he plays Treble Viol and Viol D'amore) and the gymnasium. "His only regret is that he could not have been a naval officer."

From Law to Music

ALBERT BERNARD

Violinist

Joseph Singer

Though only 30, this young man has already had the confidence of 24 years of musical experience. He began playing orchestral French horn under Dr. Koussevitzky at 23 and before that played viola for six years with the Detroit Symphony under Dr. Gabrilowitsch. Mr. Singer studied the French horn while in Detroit after making his early career as a violist. Within two years he had auditions on his new instrument with Stokowski, Sokoloff and others, but there were no openings. By 1932, he was ready for an audition with Dr. Koussevitzky. Understandingly our conductor asked the young man "what do you wish to play?" Confidently, the young man asked "what do you want to hear, sir?"

Dr. Koussevitzky took him up, suggesting parts of Beethoven's Ninth, the Andante Cantabile from Tschaikowski's Fifth, etc. Mr. Singer got the job. . . . He considers musicianship a talent inborn. "It requires an analytical and observant mind with a sense of rhythm and good intonation." He likes Brahms; Hindemith, he grants, has rhythm, but so do cannibals. He seems to play without effort. Off-stage or on, his manner is subdued. . . . Besides music Mr. Singer has several mechanical hobbies. He loves to tinker with his radio and hopes to attain an amateur broadcasting license. He is married, has a little girl of two and loves Boston.

Viola to French Horn

JOSEPH SINGER

Third French Horn

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1939

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

Here Are the Stories of Three More Boston Symphony Instrumentalists

(Today the Transcript prints the second of a series of articles called "Men Behind Music," which will present personal sketches of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

By PAUL SECON

Definitely a "first" musician, the Boston Symphony's first oboeist, Fernand Gillet, has the unique honor of being the youngest player ever to sit in the first chair of the woodwind section of any orchestra in Paris. This, at 18, in the celebrated "Lamaroux Concerts" seemed perfectly natural to him for he had completed the difficult Paris Conservatory, where he had started as a beginner, in the short space of two years. It was there, under the tutelage of his uncle, the famed oboeist, his progress and foundation on the instrument was so established that the four-year interval of the war instead of retarding him only served as a rest for his musical efforts. The armistice signed, he returned to Paris and was soon playing first oboe in the "Concerts Koussevitzky."

FERNAND GILLET
First Oboe

Through this association, Dr. Koussevitzky invited him here in 1925 and today Mr. Gillet has still the same impression he received when playing under him first in Paris; that our conductor brings more color and life to music than any artistic Ballet Russe designer brings to his scenery.

To Mr. Gillet, all music is part of a block. "Classic music makes modern music liked and so is the opposite true." "Each helps the other." His oboe playing is characteristic of the French School with the quality of tone prevailing, followed by a sought after "lightness of playing." Mr. Gillet describes the tone of his instrument as "Champatre," meaning light and airy. He occasionally appears as soloist, having performed a Handel Concerto with the orchestra in 1935. . . . He also plays piano, as does his wife, and likes mechanics and driving. Although he crashed as a flyer in the war, he would still like to own and fly his own plane.

Irving Frankel

In Pierre Monteux's first year as conductor, 1919, a big, serious minded youngster of twenty came for his audition on the double bass. He seemed awed at being in the presence of such a famous man, but shaking hands gamely, said, "I am ready, sir." Handling the huge instrument like a toy, he played Handel's Sonata with ease. Ten minutes later the Boston Symphony had its youngest member.

He had come to this country at the age of twelve and three years later heard the orchestra for the first time, then under Dr. Muck. Mr. Frankel describes this experience. "I found myself leaning forward eagerly and then I suddenly felt an 'inner urge' to make music my life's work." Serious and determined, he immediately started double bass. Soon he was receiving orchestral training at the New England Conservatory while working in a munitions factory at night. In the remarkably short time of five years after hearing the orchestra for the first time, he was in the double-bass section.

IRVING FRANKEL
Double Bass

Mr. Frankel likes all types of music, having played dance music with Meyer Davis prior to his engagement with the orchestra, and now also plays 'cello so as to take part in chamber groups. His favorite composers are Mozart and Beethoven; Prokofieff he finds interesting. . . . He divides the rest of his time between teaching, playing golf; and enjoys climbing mountains in vacationing moments.

JACOBUS LANGENDOEN
'Cello

Jacobus Langendoen

Fate seems to predominate in the life of this gifted and tenacious 'cellist, who at the age of 16, was a painter's apprentice in Capetown, South Africa. He began his musical studies by fashioning his own 'cello out of a box, a broomstick and mother's darning thread. Soon, giving little home concerts, accompanied by his sister's singing, he was heard by a musician who recognized talent in the scraping. A few years later, this time with a real instrument, he headed back to The Hague to study at the conservatory when fate first tolled with the death of both parents.

The plucky orphan, now with a sister dependent on him, played the caberets at night while studying nine hours a day in school. He soon graduated, playing his own work "Variations" for 'cello and orchestra at the commencement. This display of talent interested a wealthy banker who financed him toward a soloist career, when again fate struck; this time, with the outbreak of the war, in which the banker lost his money and Mr. Langendoen his soloist career. After the war, he succeeded in gaining a good position at the Royal Opera at the Hague only to have it, too, go into bankruptcy. He at last emerged triumphant when Pierre Monteux heard him play and asked him to join the orchestra, in 1919.

Besides having composed many works for orchestra, his "Burlesca" was well received when soloed by the celebrated Mr. Feuermann. The orchestra has also played his "Improvisations" and "Variations on a Dutch Theme," while the "Pops" have performed many of his smaller opuses. He has given recitals at Jordan Hall, and now divides his time between teaching, playing in chamber groups and for relaxation, sailing.

37

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1939

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

Presenting the Third Group of Instrumentalists

ERNST PANENKA
Bassoon

JEAN LEFRANC
First Viola

(Today the Transcript prints the third of a series of articles called "Men Behind Music," which will present personal sketches of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

By PAUL SECON

Jean Lefranc, first viola of the Boston Orchestra, is a virtuoso with that degree of musical calibre about which symphony orchestras boast. He began violin at the age of five and is a graduate of the Paris Conservatory. Since then he has held the position of first viola in most of the major orchestras in Europe. Among his many musical experiences, he reached a high point a few years back when he was first violist in the Opera Comique Orchestra in Paris, under the dynamic Gabriel Pierne. The orchestra, at that time, was giving first performances anywhere of the technically difficult and revolutionary works of such modern French composers as Ravel, Debussy, Faure, Roussel and others. The concerts were always lively affairs for, night after night, these composers and their friends would gather in the second balcony because of slender funds and there, with loud applause, would wage their fight for the new music.

ROSARIO MAZZEO
Bass Clarinet

This episode in Mr. Lefranc's life was climaxed during the rehearsal of Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande," at which the new manuscripts were being read at sight. With Composer Debussy on hand listening closely, Mr. Lefranc and his fellow musicians repeatedly halted proceedings by leaping to their feet crying, "The notes are wrong. It's a mistake." or "It doesn't sound right." At each outbreak Debussy would shake his head sadly but determinedly, and say slowly, "No, gentlemen, it is not a mistake. That is the music."

A few years later in 1925, Mr. Lefranc again reached a high spot when after playing the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, he accepted a contract with the Boston Orchestra. . . . He gave the first performance in Paris of the Bloch Suite for viola and piano, and later as a member of our orchestra, was the first in the United States to play the solo, in the revised orchestral version of the same work. His viola is a fine 15th Century Italian Ceruti.

A member of the Burgin String Quartet he also composes for his own pleasure. He likes reading, collecting antiques and his pipe. Married, he links his life now with that of his childhood by acting as member of the jury (judge of the applicants) at his first school, the Paris Conservatory.

Ernst Panenka

At the age of 25, on rehearsing with the orchestra for the first time, Mr. Panenka received his greatest thrill. He had just arrived from Vienna where Dr. Koussevitzky had auditioned him on Weber's Bassoon Concerto. As the rehearsal wore on, the young instrumentalist found himself marveling more and more at the display of tone color, the deft precision, and above all "the magnificent discipline and spirit of the members," as contrasted to European orchestras, with which he had played.

He still feels now, as he did that day, that if Dr. Koussevitzky, after rehearsing the orchestra for three hours, should suddenly call forth Beethoven's Ninth he would not mind it one bit. . . . He owes his career to his father who conducted a small pupil orchestra in Vienna. One Saturday, as usual, rehearsal was called. The players assembled but lo, no bassoon. Young Ernst, wishing to help by filling the vacant position, began the instrument. Teaching himself, he soon made such amazing progress that a year later he was accepted in the Academy of Music at Vienna, from which he graduated in four years instead of the usual six.

Mr. Panenka is extremely fond of combined string and woodwind combinations, his favorites being Beethoven's Septet and Shubert's Octet. An occasional soloist with the orchestra, he gave the first performance, in Boston, of the Mozart Bassoon Concerto. . . . He reads a great deal and enjoys playing works for four hands for piano with his wife. He considers himself fortunate to live in Boston. "It is one of the most beautiful places in the world," he says.

Rosario Mazzeo

Although Mr. Mazzeo entered the orchestra seven seasons ago, as E flat clarinetist, it was not until this year that he reached his "main" love in the woodwind section, that of bass clarinetist. His transition came about by easy stages, starting three years ago at a concert, prior to which, the regular bass clarinetist was taken ill. Mr. Mazzeo's debut took place under Serge Prokofieff with Dr. Koussevitzky a listener. So well did he perform that evening, that, since then he has been called on to fill in numerous times, until he assumed the chair this year. . . . In his new position he is thoroughly happy, he says, and would not exchange it for any other in the world.

Before coming to the orchestra, he organized and directed his high school's first band, and, prior to that began clarinet in his early 'teens. Since then, he has at one time or another played all the woodwind instruments, but he still feels that the clarinet offers the greatest possibility for expression because of its variety of tone color.

Mr. Mazzeo's keen and analytical mind has carried him into experimentations on the clarinet ,and now he has succeeded in completing an instrument whose mechanical details greatly facilitate playing. . . . His main avocation, however, is collecting and playing chamber music. For that reason, the Mazzeo parlor has been the scene of many unusual 'chamber evenings' at which many noted composers and members of the orchestra gather. On these occasions, no matter what instrumentalists are present, Mr. Mazzeo is always able to ferret from his huge collection (which represent more than a thousand works) music suitable.

A prodigious walker, both he and his wife are able mountain climbers. At rehearsals, when the bass clarinet is not called for, Mr. Mazzeo can be found back stage, perusing the literary classics.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1939

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

Now a French Horn, a Harp And a Violin

By Paul Secon

Willem Valkenier, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first French horn player, is just as much intrigued with his instrument today as he was on first hearing it as a lad in Rotterdam (there at a concert). With eyes glued to the men in the orchestra, young William suddenly found himself bewitched by this curly shaped horn that emitted such beautiful sounds.

Rushing home, he was soon beseaching his parents to buy him this new discovery. Day after day he tried, but his efforts proved unavailing At the point of despair, good fortune suddenly appeared in the person of his piano teacher. Understandingly, he listened to the boy and then approached the hesitant parents. Soon afterwards, Willem Valkenier, age 10, had his first French horn.

Learning fundamentals quickly, five years later found the young man with the horn a student at the Conservatory in Rotterdam. Spanning the course in the brief space of two years, he was soon gaining orchestral experience under such famous men as Weingartner, Nickisch and Richard Strauss, culminating in 1923 with his holding the important position of first French horn in the orchestra of the Berlin Royal Opera. His reputation, spreading to this country, led to an audition with our conductor, Pierre Monteux, and soon afterward Mr. Valkenier was a member of the horn section of the Boston Orchestra.

On arriving here he was immediately impressed by the complete diversification of programs as contrasted to European retinues. Today, he still speaks enthusiastically of our orchestra, as one that keeps growing in quality and one that is constantly alive. As an instrumentalist, he notes the ability of the French horn to blend itself with all other orchestral instruments, while enriching the tonal quality of the brass ensemble.

He takes time outside the orchestra to teach, and as non-musician scans the pages of biographies. Although having played and heard most composers, his greatest musical experience still remains that of hearing Beethoven's nine symphonies played in a cycle, while still a youngster in Rotterdam.

ELFORD CAUGHEY
Harp

WILLIAM VALKENIER
First French Horn

Elford Caughey

Mr. Caughey's nimble fingers have not only been instrumental in skillfully strumming the harp, but also in the writing of successful poetry. His dual versatility first showed itself while as a member of the Boston Orchestra his verse began to appear under the pen name of Tristan Livingstone. Soon, his poetical success was such that a decision had to be made between the two creative abilities. Deliberating carefully, Mr. Caughey at last chose the pen.

Temporarily resigning from the orchestra in 1937 he entered Harvard. There, writing to his heart's content the choice appeared to be the happy one. It was; until the appearance of the concert season the following year. At the first Friday afternoon performance, Mr. Caughey settled comfortably in his seat to listen to his "ex"-orchestra. The music started. As the magnificent orchestra tones resounded in his eardrums, he suddenly found himself sitting bolt upright. Then, as his fingers twitched eagerly with the pulse beat of the tempos, Mr. Caughey realized his mistake. Music was his true love.

He quickly rejoined the orchestra and now joyously is plucking the harp once more. A native of Pittsburgh, Mr. Caughey originally joined the orchestra in 1922. Fond of Bach and Schumann, he still thinks Ravel's "Introduction and Allegro the best thing written for the harp. He finds, however, many composers writing parts for the instrument that are almost technically unplayable.

Mr. Caughey's poems, written under his nome-de-plume, have appeared in Scribners, The Boston Transcript and The New York Times. An eligible bachelor, he spends most of his spare time browsing in book shops seeking publisher's limited editions.

Norbert Lauga

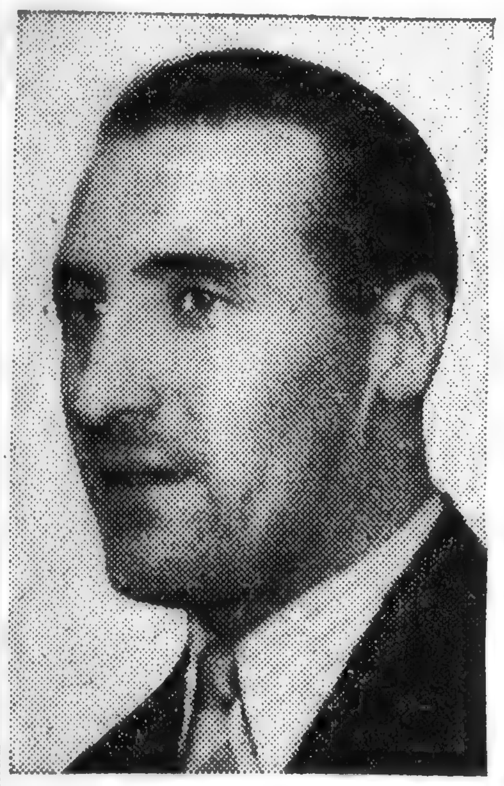
This member of our first violin section spent most of his early childhood listening to his father rehearse with a theater orchestra in Paris. There, perched on his special high chair, he displayed such delight and exuberance that, at the tender age of five he was the proud owner of his own small violin. Naturally gifted, he was soon giving solo performances. The Paris Conservatory came next, and the age of 18 found Mr. Lauga in its graduating class and at the same time a member of the Opera Orchestra, in the same city.

There his playing reached such heights that he was called to all parts of France where he rendered recitals and solos.

However, his orchestral background had instilled in him so deep a love for ensemble playing, that in 1928 Mr. Lauga once more returned to Paris where he participated in the "Concerts Koussevitzky." His enthusiasm at being once more in a string section now knew no bounds. His playing, always of excellent calibre, now seemed tinged with the immortals. Dr. Koussevitzky, impressed, auditioned him. That same year Mr. Lauga joined our symphony.

Although French, he feels more at home with Bach than any other composer. Among his other favorites are classic Beethoven and Mozart, and modern Debussy, Prokofieff and Strawinsky. He still finds Dr. Koussevitzky, today, as when first under him in Paris, able to make the dullest music sound alive and interesting. As a violinist, he notes with pleasure our combined orchestral arrangement of the first and second members of that section. This seating, he feels, attains unsurpassable tonal and harmonic blending.

Mr. Lauga teaches and is also a member of the temporarily disbanded Chardon String Quartet. When not attending art exhibits cr reading his favorite literary works he can be found strolling through the countryside. None of these, however, are capable of producing for him the jubilant and happy feeling he gets on completing one of the many successful concerts as a member of the Boston Orchestra.



NORBERT LAUGA
Violin

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1939 C

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

The Stories Of Three Musicians

(Today the Transcript prints the fourth of a series of articles called "Men Behind Music," which will present personal sketches of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

By Paul Secon

Louis Speyer, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's English Horn player, had the entire course of his musical life altered by a chance solo performance. The incident occurred in the summer of 1918 when, as oboeist in a French Military Band, here on a three-week tour, he came to Boston for a "Pops" concert at Symphony Hall.

At the end of a successful evening, shouts for encores arose. Having nothing on hand, the conductor suddenly called on Mr. Speyer to play an oboe work which he had prepared for another engagement. His impromptu performance went so well that he finished the tour with a Boston Symphony contract in his pocket. He finished one season as oboeist and then the related woodwind instrument, the English Horn.

Mr. Speyer comes from a musically-minded Parisian family. At one time he started to be a pianist, but changed to become an oboeist and as such he graduated from the Paris Conservatory. Some of his most colorful musical moments occurred at the "Theatre des Champs Elysees" in Paris, where as oboeist, he took part in the premiere of Strawinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," at which the audience rioted.

Although he still plays oboe (having recently made a recording of a Piston Suite on the instrument), Mr. Speyer prefers the romantic and melancholy tone of the English Horn. Of all orchestral music "Le Sacre" is his idea of the highest form in a rhythmical and visionary sense.

Fond of outdoor exercise, Mr. Speyer can often be seen (English Horn case under his arm) striding briskly to orchestra rehearsals from his home in Brookline.

LOUIS SPEYER
English Horn

Paul Keaney

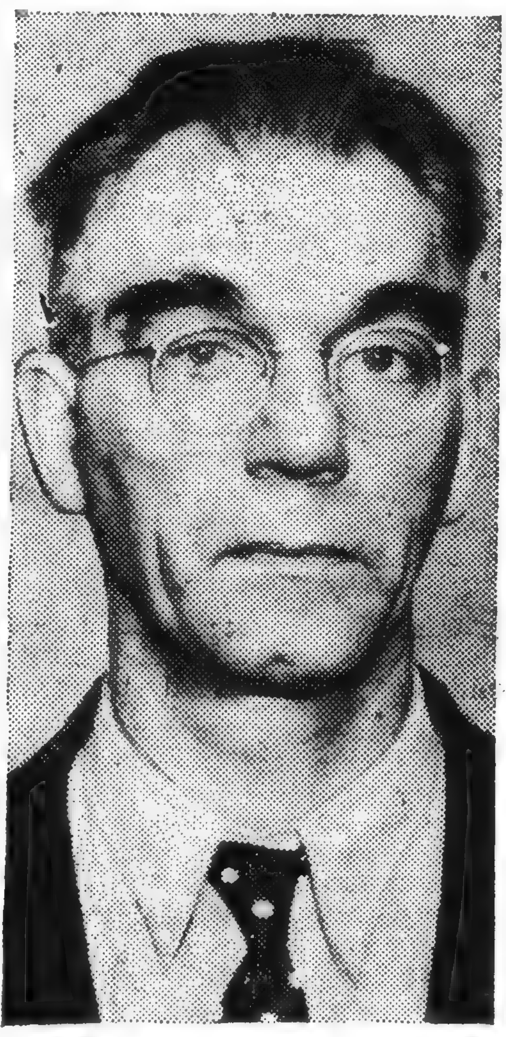
This young French Horn player owes his career to a vacant alto horn position in his high school band. Young Paul applied for a position of drummer, but found only a horn vacancy. He wanted to play, so putting aside his drum sticks he started this new instrument and soon, at the advice of his band master, was playing French Horn.

So well did he like it, that he sold all his "beat and roll" equipment to buy his own three-valved circular wind instrument. Graduating from high school, he next came to Boston further to pursue his music. Lessons were expensive, so the perseverant lad worked as clerk in a shoe factory to pay for his Sunday teacher. Night after night he practiced. At last he began studying with our first French Horn player, Mr. Valkenier. Under his tutelage, and with the new incentive, Paul made such progress, that soon his teacher was telling Dr. Koussevitzky of his amazing pupil.

Fortunately, our conductor had a vacancy and, after hearing the young man, offered him a contract. Mr. Keaney accepted, and his first professional engagement began in the French Horn section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

His favorite composers are Wagner, Mozart and Beethoven. Of the moderns he prefers Sibelius. On the horn, he gets great pleasure in playing the third Mozart Concerto (in E flat) and finds Richard Strauss's symphonic poems the most difficult of orchestral works.

Married, and a devoted philatelist, Mr. Keaney's motto today, as when he was a student, is still perseverance.



HENRY ERKELENS
Violin

Henry Erkelens

This member of our violin section has made three major musical moves in his life and strangely enough, they are all directly attributable to a musician who is a comparative stranger to Mr. Erkelens.

French Horn, English Horn And Violin

The first of this trio of events took place when Mr. Erkelens was a student in The Hague, and was suddenly called to fill a vacancy in an orchestra. The man who had left the position was the aforementioned "master of his fate."

The second occurred when Mr. Erkelens was offered a position in a newly-formed symphony orchestra in Java. He accepted, and later learned he had been chosen only after the same musician had been unable to go there.

The third and final turn took place on Mr. Erkelens' return to The Hague, from the Indies. He arrived, only to hear of a vacancy in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Strangely enough, it was told him by the same person who had affected his life twice before. Again, this musician, after having been signed for the position, had been unable to leave the Netherlands. Mr. Erkelens quickly sailed for America. Hastening to Boston, he played for Pierre Monteux and joined our orchestra in 1920.

His first musical experience took place on his seventh birthday. For his present, he was taken to see an opera. His Christmas present, however, was more important, for it was a nice, new violin.

Practicing and good instruction soon made young Henry a member of the Hague Conservatory. It was here that the first of the unusual events took place.

Under Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Erkelens had learned more than in all his other musical experiences put together. Our conductor has the power and the ability to draw the very best from each individual, he says.

Extremely fond of Brahms and Richard Strauss, his chief musical delight is the Cesar Franck Violin Sonata. A lover of the open roads, he combines his traveling with fishing and golf. Mr. Erkelens says that he would not know his unknown benefactor today if he were to meet him face to face.

PAUL KEANEY
French Horn

NOVEMBER 27, 1939

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

Presenting Another Trio in the Boston Symphony Orchestra Series

By PAUL SECON

Bernard Zighera, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's young first harpist, has also shown his capabilities on the podium. Today, besides strumming the harp in the orchestra he conducts the Boston Chamber Orchestra, which consists of thirty members of his fellow musicians.

At one time in his life he was caught between three musical desires. This occurred after graduating from the Paris Conservatory on the harp and the piano. Regular harpist at the Opera in Paris he also played piano for the ballet rehearsals. But the secret aim to conduct outshone these two.

As long as young Bernard could remember, he had wanted to conduct. He has two brothers who are also musicians. But he found the whole orchestra his best instrument. In what one instrument could one find so much color.

At first his thoughts were confused, then it was suddenly made easy when, in the summer of 1926 Dr. Koussevitzky put in appearance, looking for a harp player. He heard the talented youth and offered him a position in the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Zighara quickly accepted. Today, with Dr. Koussevitzky's aid, he has made great strides toward that third secret ambition.

His Chamber orchestra, which was organized three years ago, has become increasingly popular in Boston. The performances have gained note for offering seldom-heard works for small orchestra.

BERNARD ZIGHERA
Harp

HARRY DICKSON
Violin

Mr. Zighera spends the rest of his time teaching harp, and during the summer is judge of the instrument at his former school, the Paris Conservatory. Some of his colleagues he humorously notes all the same members who also judged him. Always looking for the best in food, Mr. Zighera has been known to go a hundred miles for a specially delectable dish.

Harry Dickson

Two years ago, on joining the Boston Orchestra, Harry Dickson realized his life ambition. As a youngster hurrying to his violin lessons, Harry would pause as he passed the massive walls of Symphony Hall and pull off his hat. He would silently vow that someday he too would play under the awesome figure of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The road was not smooth, however, for his first introduction into professional music was playing the Keith Theatrical Circuits. The tiresome travels, unbearable hours and music not to his liking soon brought him to the point of giving up the ambition. Perplexed, he tried Harvard but found himself more unhappy without his violin.

In desperation, the youth turned to the New England Conservatory. Within its confines he found his kind of music and soon was making rapid progress. He graduated, and next was accepted in the Berlin Conservatory. Hhe then returned in 1933 and was soon guiding the activities of the Federal Music Projects here in Boston.

His goal was still ahead, however. In the spring of 1937 he played for Dr. Koussevitzky. His bareheaded vow at last came true the following seaason, when he was offered a position in the orchestra.

To him, Dr. Koussevitzky is the orchestra, for Mr. Dickson, considers the conductor, the greatest man in music today. This violinist often appears as recitalist at the Gerdner Museum, and last year participated in a trio of a newly-discovered work of Brahms.

Max Polster

If Max Polster, an outstanding member of the orchestra's tympani section, ever enumerated the conductors or orchestras he has been associated with, it would resemble a musical Who's Who. From the age of seventeen, when he took his first engagement in a seventy piece orchestra in Germany till his present position in our orchestra, Mr. Polster has played in nearly half a hundred symphonic combinations.

At one point in his varied life he found this background extremely helpful. When he ap- [illegible] small summer engagements. After being recommended by a former tympani colleague, he then signed a contract with the Boston Symphony in 1923.

Mr. Polster's music has carried him to many countries but he finds no great difference in the performance of music in any one place. However, he says American music differs from European in the larger orchestras and halls in this country resulting in more volume.

He plays the violin for his own pleasure, and is often accompanied by his son at the piano in little home affairs.

MAX POLSTER
Tympani

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1939

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

A Trumpeter, a Violist, a Drummer And Percussionist Make Up This Trio

By PAUL D. SECON

Georges Mager, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first trumpet player, might have been a world renowned tenor today, if it had not been for the World War. Prior to the outbreak of hostilities he was a member of a Paris orchestra and was studying voice at the same time. He had just completed plans for his first professional singing engagement when the call came for mobilization.

That was the end of his vocal aspirations. The front lines were no place for formal music. Near the end of the war he was sent to the United States as trumpeter in the French Military Band. When the visiting musicians reached Boston, Mr. Mager, who also played viola, was asked to bow that instrument in an added performance of Saint Saen's Septet.

This event changed the course of his musical life. Soon afterward, he received a telegram, there was an opening for a violist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With the offer went the promise of a future trumpet position. He agreed and returned to Boston to enter the string section of the orchestra. And next season Mr. Mager was playing his wind instrument in the brass choir.

As a youngster in France he began violin. Later, he also played French horn, as did his brother. His father, a trumpet player, complained that neither of his two musical sons played the right instrument. Georges willingly changed to trumpet, and made such progress that soon he was enrolled in the Paris Conservatory. Inside he studied the trumpet; outside he played the violin. And when he graduated he branched off again—this time to study voice.

Today he carries his musical versatility further by playing piano for his own pleasure. He still sings and often voices duets with his wife, a professional singer. He is a fervent admirer of the Brahms Symphonies as well as the works of Ravel and Debussy. As a trumpet player he especially likes the Richard Strauss Tone Poems and the Mahler Symphonies.

At the age of 20, Harry Grover, member of the viola section, was thrown on his own by his father's sudden death. He hurried to nearby Boston, suitcase in one hand, violin in the other. The latter, which he had been playing since he was 10, now became his only means of support.

Here luck was with him. Victor Herbert, then at the Colonial Theater, needed a violinist in his orchestra. Harry applied. Never did time hang more heavily before the word of approval was given. His playing in the orchestra was so effective that he was also asked to teach at the New England Conservatory. However, all his supposed good fortune filtered away soon afterward when the Colonial closed, leaving him no income except his occasional pupil fees.

The tide turned once more. The Boston Opera Company came into existence. Harry found himself an original member of the orchestra, now as violist. It was here, while laboring under four, five and six hour rehearsals (often twice a day), that he gained his orchestral knowledge. This position also provided him with his greatest musical laugh; this, when the curtain dropped suddenly in the middle of an act in "Il Trovatore." The audience found the bellowing oaths of conductor Felix Weingartner comic relief against the arias of the operatic stars.

Misfortune struck again. The opera went bankrupt. Quickly Harry joined a traveling opera and ballet company. Their tour included Philadelphia. Harry had an audition with Stokowski. He stayed. Two years later he resigned and returned to Boston. Soon afterward, he was a member of the viola section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Extra-vocationally Mr. Grover teaches, and avocationally he and his daughter collect foreign stamps. Keeping physically fit is another of his pleasures, and this leads him into all sorts of outdoor games.

Simon Sternberg

There is no branch of the music business that Simon Sternberg, first percussionist in the orchestra, has not encountered at one time or another. Starting his professional engagements in Nahant, at 12 years of age, he has since drummed his way into and with every conceivable orchestral combination.

Military band, dance orchestras, theater pit all passed in quick succession. Suddenly he heard of an opening in the percussion section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He applied. To his dismay he found the position filled by a newcomer from New Orleans. So he turned once more to other musical ventures.

Two weeks after the season started he received a hasty call from the orchestra. The Southern musician had not been able to fit in. Arriving wholly out of breath at Symphony Hall, Mr. Sternberg was hastily auditioned. He ran through some symphonic routines for the conductor, Pierre Monteux, and the Boston orchestra had a permanent percussionist.

His musical life began at the age of ten. With his new drum he paraded around the house ratting and tatting five and six hours a day. The summer job two years later was at Bass Point. His first theatrical engagement came when he was fifteen in the Academy of Music at Chelsea. Later, he was a member of the Boston Festival Orchestra for many seasons under Emil Mollenhauer.

Mr. Sternberg favors the modern composers and is fascinated by the tonal colors of their harmonies. Of these he prefers Stravinsky, Ravel and Prokofieff. However, he feels that the classics are the basis of all music, modern or no. As an instrumentalist he thrills to the beat of the "Bolero" and to the subtle drum rhythms in the "Scheherazade."

Mr. Sternberg notes that the longer one remains in the percussion section of an orchestra the more one realizes that his main purpose is not solely to keep time. Rather, a percussionist should have a sense of musical appreciation and an acquaintance with harmony and theory. This factor enables one to play in balance with the other instrumentalists.

Married, he spends a great deal of his time practicing his other percussion instruments (bells, xylophones, etc.) to be constantly ready for future works. A real student of his instrument, Mr. Sternberg has written a book on all the varieties of drum rhythms used in various countries.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1939 C

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

Here's a New Trio—Trombone, Bassoon, Violin

(Because of lack of space, pictures of Monday's trio in this Men Behind Music series unfortunately had to be omitted. The Transcript is glad to print them today, along with the usual group, so that those who follow this feature may have it complete.)

By Paul D. Secon

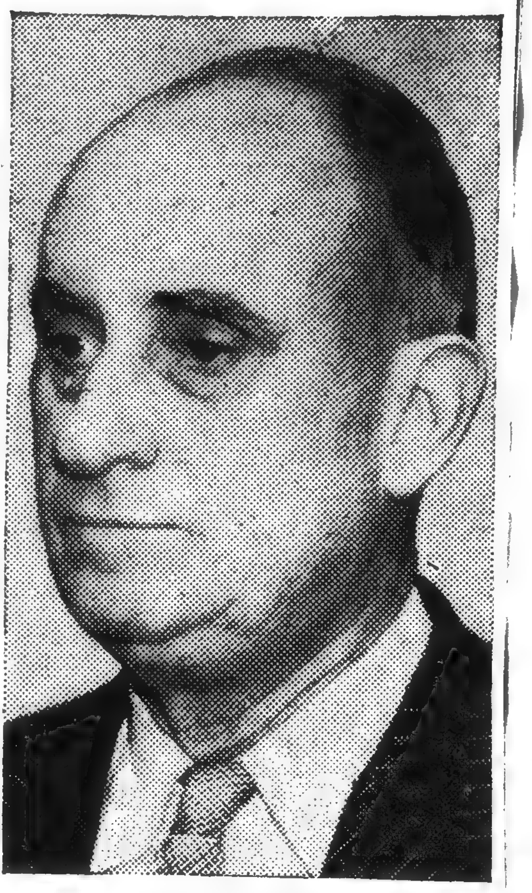
Jacob Raichman, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first trombonist, recently had his musicianship put to acid test. Delayed in Cuba, prior to the season's opening, he sought out the American consul for speedy passage back to the States. The consul's secretary refused his pleas, intimating that music had been overworked as a pretense for special sailing consideration.

A few days later the secretary received tickets for a concert. He went. Strange as it seems, Mr. Raichman played a trombone solo at the performance. The trombonist had no further trouble.

He was born in Russia. His father, a noted conductor, wished his son to study piano. The youngster preferred wind instruments and was soon playing trombone in his father's orchestra. He found he had a natural musical ear and lip. He graduated from the Royal Conservatory at St. Petersburg and played with various orchestras. Appearing as soloist throughout Russia, Mr. Raichman then had his first musical trial.

The famed Moscow Grand Opera and Ballet advertised for a trombonist. Almost totally inexperienced, Mr. Raichman applied. Also, on hand for the coveted position were Russia's finest instrumentalists. He got the job.

SIMON STERNBERG
Drums and First Percussion



HARRY GROVER
Viola

PAUL CHERKASSKY
Violin

In 1927, he came to Boston and played for Dr. Koussevitsky, who was so impressed, that, with no immediate opening available in the trombone section, he engaged Mr. Raichman. The conductor certainly did not err in his judgment. Mr. Raichman has since been offered contracts by other leading orchestras in the country.

The trombonist is noted for his teaching and soloist capabilities. Many of his pupils are in the trombone sections of major orchestras. He has often appeared as soloist at the "Pops." Tchaikowsky, Verdi and Stravinsky are among his favorite composers. He likes the natural and easy flow of Italian music. He is married and his hobby is motoring.

Abdon Laus

At 18, Abdon Laus, orchestral bassoonist, gave an exhibition of his musical determination. The Paris Conservatory had just refused him admittance as a clarinet student. He could not try again as he had reached the age limit for players of that instrument.

So Abdon began the bassoon. He had two short years to make the difficult transition, for the age of 20 was the bassoonist's limit at the Conservatory. The new instrument he found a complicated bundle of strange fingerings. His built-up clarinet embouchure went for naught.

Abdon persevered and perspired. He studied with the first bassoonist of the Paris Opera. The two years disappeared, and audition day arrived. That morning the Conservatory announced the possible entree of four bassoonists. That evening the Conservatory announced the entree of Abdon as the fourth bassoonist.

As a student Abdon progressed with ease. On his graduation day, he stepped from the school into the orchestra of the Theatre des Champs Elysees. Later, his former teacher played beside him in the Paris Orchestra. His musical career was only slightly delayed by the war, for he spent most of his hours organizing concerts for the Red Cross.

Near the end of hostilities he toured the United States with the French Military Band. After a concert at Symphony Hall, he stepped from the Band into the Boston Orchestra.

Mr. Laus was the first in this country to use a French bassoon. He is also a student of the saxophone, and has organized half a hundred saxophonists into the first orchestra of this kind. On many an occasion his Boston Saxophone Orchestra has shown the serious possibilities of the instrument.

Mr. Laus's fondest musical instrument is an autographed picture of Stravinsky. It was given him by the composer after he had played a first performance of "Le Sacre" at the Champs Elysees. Across the photo are inscribed words, "To Abdon Laus, who started a hurricane by his solo of the "Le Sacre Du Printemps."

Paul Cherkassky

Paul Cherkassky, a member of the violin section, has had his musical life inspired by five years of close association with Jan Sibelius. This Finnish period of his life came after an earlier musical education in Russia. In St. Petersburg, he graduated from the conservatory and played at the Opera. He concertized throughout Russia, and then accepted the concertmaster's position in Finland's celebrated Helsinki Orchestra.

It was during this time Mr. Cherkassky spent many hours with the celebrated composer. At one time he prepared his Violin Concerto for performance with the orchestra. Prior to the concert he played it for Sibelius alone. The composer offered suggestions and comments about the work. That evening Sibelius was so well pleased with the soloist that he threw his arms about him, and with a grand gesture, offered Mr. Cherkassky a cigar.

Another high musical moment came when he was called to play the first solo performance of Sibelius's six Impromptus for violin and orchestra. The violinist literally read from a wet manuscript, for the last few notes were written seconds before the concert.

He left Finland and joined the Boston Orchestra in 1923. Since then he has kept in touch with the great composer by mail and by return visits.

Mr. Cherassky has also appeared as solist in Jordan Hall. He calls himself a "step-in" conductor ever since he was suddenly called to the podium in Finland. The regular batoneer had a heart attack during a performance of "Tosca." The violinist, called on to read the score for the first time, ingeniously finished the performance.

His wife is a celebrated pianist, and his daughter a cinema actress in Finland. Although he has smoked continuously since then, Mr. Cherkassky finds nothing as enjoyable as his first cigar from the private stock of Sibelius.

GEORGES MAGER
Trumpet

ABDON LAUS
Bassoon

JACOB RAICHMAN
First Trombone

DECEMBER 11, 1939

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

The Story of Three Instrumentalists Of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

By PAUL D. SECON

The first double bass player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, George Moleux, is also a finished clarinetist. This dual versatility was the source of a musical dilemma that was not solved until he joined the Orchestra in 1930.

The question first arose when he graduated from the Paris Conservatory. One hand clutched a prize for clarinet; the other, a similar award for double bass. Which was he to finger—bow or keys? He was intrigued by the woodwind, yet the deep sentimental tones of the huge string instrument also captivated him.

His musical perplexity was intensified when he played solo double bass in the orchestra of the Concert Classic in Monte Carlo and clarinet in the Opera Orchestra at the same time. He rushed from rehearsal to rehearsal; from bass to clarinet, from orchestra to opera pit; the issue still remained unsettled.

GEORGE MOLEUX
First Double Bass

The enigma unriddled itself in 1930. He was invited to play the double bass for Dr. Koussevitzky at his Paris home. The following season George entered the orchestra as occupant of the last chair. Two years later, after competition, he held fourth position; and this season, on vieing with his bassmates for the post left vacant by Max Kunze's death, he holds the honored place.

France was his birthplace. He studied solfeggio when he was five years old. His father, an orchestra director, suggested the bass and clarinet. Thus began George's musical quandary.

He likes Brahms, Prokofiieff and Sibelius. Another of his favorite composers is Dr. Koussevitzky, whose Concerto for Double Bass rates tops. He witnessed the famed Salzburg Festival a few years ago, but prefers the Berkshire performances of the Boston Orchestra.

Married, he relaxes from music when he puts paint to canvas; he also gets a kick out of leading a little military band. But best of all is his between season time. George then turns fisherman.

EUGENE ADAM

Eugene Adam, the orchestra's tuba player, mastered his difficult instrument in a single fortnight. It occurred in 1920 when he was trombonist here under Pierre Monteux.

GEORGE HUMPHREY
Viola

At sa rehearsal of Wagner' Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" the tuba player was taken ill. Conductor Monteux called on trombonist Adam to fill in.

Eugene had a bare acquaintance with the deep curved horn. His regular instrument had a sliding valve; this brother wind member had finger valves; and the orchestral part was a complete stranger. The next two weeks were a nightmare. Mornings, Eugene played trombone in the orchestra; Afternoons, Eugene practiced tuba at home; Evenings, Eugene took the score to bed.

The night of the concert came; much too soon for him. He took his seat on the lighted stage. Conductor Monteux lifted his baton for the prelude and tuba player Adam glided through the work. Since that evening, Eugene has occupied the position permanently.

As a youngster in France, he studied voice at the Nancy Conservatory. One day a Parisian music teacher joined the conservatory with the first valve trombone the school, the city or Eugene had even seen. Enraptured, he was soon using his wind for blowing purposes rather than for vocal efforts.

Soon, he was a scholarship student at the Paris Conservatory. He graduated, and quickly garnered experience in Theater and Opera Orchestras in Paris; followed by the Ballet Russe and Opera Comique.

The war put a slight damper on his musical career. In 1918, he toured the United States with the French Conseravtory Band. The Band visited Boston temporarily, and Eugene stayed in Boston permanently.

His first impression of Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting was vivid. He had played the Oberon Overture a score of years, but he now heard parts brought out that he never knew existed.

He finds Beethoven's Ninth a constant source of pleasure, and modern music a constant source of displeasure. It has too many false colors and strange chords to suit him. He is especially annoyed when the new idiom breaks the melodious line.

He enjoys puttering in his garden when not collecting stamps and old coins. Mr. Adam is married, and congratulations are in order. He expects a boy.

George Humphrey

This member of our viola section, by name George Humphrey, has had a musical Horatio Alger life. At the age of 20 he was a clerk for the Pennsylvania Railroad in Pittsburgh.

One Sunday he attended a Fritz Kreisler recital. This was the first concert the young railroad employee had ever seen or heard. The performance had the same effect as a thunderbolt.

George soon had a victrola, and all the violin records of the great artists. Next came a violin; then music; but how could he practice and study and work at the same time? He asked for leave of absence; it was not granted. George quit his job and came to Boston to study at the New England Conservatory.

There he changed to viola. He was such a determined student that on graduation day he had a contract with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. George was there one season and then resigned. He wanted to study again. He entered Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, but left at the end of the first year. He wanted to get back into the fold of an orchestra.

He returned to Boston. He had heard all the orchestras in the country. This was "the" one. He played for Dr. Koussevitzky and was promised the next vacant position in the viola section. Three years passed; three years of suffering and hardship, but still George persevered. He was promised a position by the late Roxy. Before the job materialized, Roxy died.

In desperation he again played for Dr. Koussevitzky. This time the conductor was so impressed at the audition that he asked the trustees of the orchestra for permission to add another viola. They consented, and George became the 13th violist in the orchestra. Thirteen is not his unlucky number.

His chief pleasure is experimenting with violins. This unique avocation began when he came across a viola that had been smashed by a truck. He purchased the pieces, some 150, and so successfully did he put them together that he has played the instrument with the orchestra. Since then he has made copies of violins, the latest being an imitation of the Guarnerius used by the late Charles Loeffler.

EUGENE ADAM
Tuba

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1939

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By PAUL D. SECON

Two weeks before the World War began, Victor Polatschek, first clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, graduated from the Vienna Conservatory. Two days before the first shot he mailed a very important letter addressed to Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Would the famed podium artist audition the young clarinet graduate?

Forty-eight hours later everything stopped, including the mail. The young woodwind player waited for an answer, but none was forthcoming. He waited while he occupied the first chair of the Vienna Philharmonic; in all, he waited 17 years.

The answer came unexpectedly from another source. In 1930 Dr. Koussevitzky invited him here as first clarinetist. This time Mr. Polatschek made sure the mail was delivered. He brought the male in person.

He was first introduced to music in Czechoslovakia when he was five years old. He studied piano and violin, but longed to swing a baton. His violin teacher advised him to acquaint himself with a woodwind instrument. Victor picked up the clarinet and soon forgot piano, violin and conducting.

VICTOR POLATSCHEK
First Clarinet

VINCENT MARIOTTI
Violin

During his musical years with the Vienna Philharmonic he played under such musical greats as Weingartner, Nickisch, Richard Strauss and Bruno Walter. In making a comparison between American and European orchestras he finds playing technique here far more advanced.

Composers Beethoven, Richard Strauss and Ravel inspire him, as well as the works of the lesser known Franz Schmidt. He laments the fact that the works of composer Schmidt, who died this year, are not played more in this country.

Married, Mr. Polatschek reads a good deal; that is when not engaged in a hot game of chess. He recently spoke to Dr. Muck at one of the Salzburg festivals. Had he received the letter? No, but he did remember a vacant clarinet position at the time.

Vincent Mariotti

At the age of four, Vincent Mariotti, a member of the violin section of the orchestra, heard the sounds of the stringed instrument for the first time. The occasion was an impromptu recital at the Mariotti home in Rome. From that moment on he set up a howl for his own "guitar and a stick" and then fashioned his own violin from a large match box and elastics.

He soon had a real instrument and studied with Ernesto Rouillon, the famed Italian musician. In him Vincent found ideal musical inspiration. His teacher was his god. To this day he can still remember the high walls and massive art treasures of the princely palace where he took his lessons. That entire atmosphere developed within him the wholesome feeling for music that he carries today.

He left Rome to continue with teachers in Prague and Vienna, but none provided the same incentive as did his first apostle. He returned to study with his master and play in the city orchestra. He left once more, this time to tour South America with the Italian Opera Company.

He was glad to get back to his musical diety and remained in Rome as a member of the orchestra and the opera company. He departed for America in 1921 to visit relatives in Boston and while here, played for Dr. Koussevitzky. The temporary visit changed to a lifetime position the following year.

Mr. Mariotti likes the classic "St. Matthew Passion" of Bach, and the modern "Peaceable Kingdom" by Randall Thompson. He feels that music today is in a transitional stage.

Outside of the orchestra, Mr. Mariotti spends most of his time tinkering with things related to violins. For 25 years he has experienced with all makes of violin varnish, and has tried to find the secret formula used, the Italian brand. His efforts have produced a lacquer that has been tried and found successful by other members of the orchestra.

Lawrence White

The vibracussionist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "Larry" White, first began to finger musical instruments as an Idaho schoolboy. His parents suggested piano; Larry wanted drums. He earned money to buy a small xylophone, whose tinkling tunes were soon the talk of the neighborhood.

One captivated neighbor decided he would have his own instrument. He purchased a huge xylophone of the marimba type. After a week of unsuccessful struggle, his wife became as unmanageable as the instrument. She insisted he either learn to play it correctly or put it in the garage.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1939

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By PAUL D. SECON

MILTON SMITH
Trombone

At 18, Kilton Smith, a trombone member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left his Maine home for Boston and college. For the fun of it he brought his old battered trombone that he had been playing spasmodically. Kilton was no sooner a student than he found himself enmeshed in the proverbial Gordian knot. The classroom was dull; the books meaningless; suddenly he knew. It was music. He sought the advice of Jacob Raichman, the first trombone player in the orchestra. Mr. Raichman listened to the young man, heard him play and suggested that he study music. Thus began four years of concentrated private study combined with orchestral rehearsals at the New England Conservatory. At last his chance came; he was asked to play in the orchestra at the Esplanade concerts. He then joined the Pops Orchestra and quickly glided into a regular position with the orchestra.

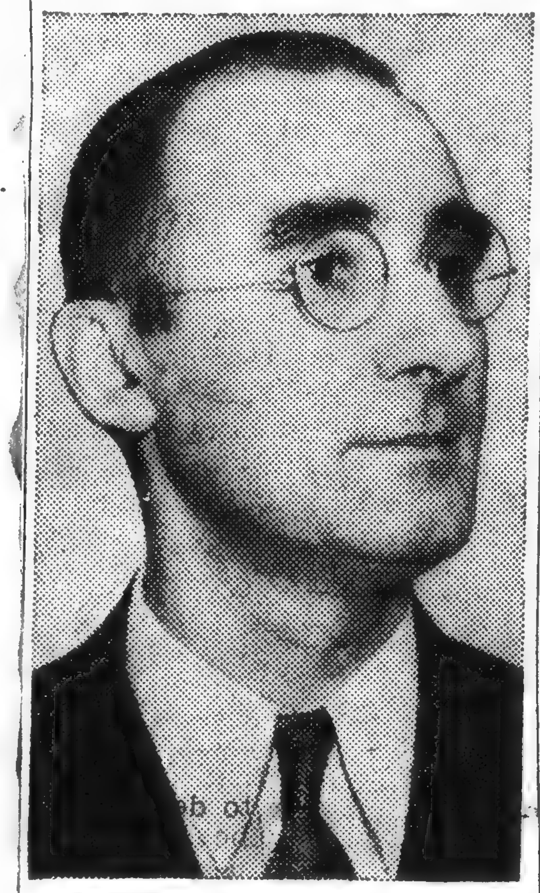
He hails from Vinalhaven. His mother was an amateur pianist; his father a trombonist. One day Kilton rummaged through the closet. His hand touched something cold and metallic. It was his father's trombone.

The 13-year-old was delighted with his discovery. He soon picked out the scales, took a few lessons and joined the school orchestra.

He likes Wagner's "Parsifal" and Hill's Violin Concerto. His favorite modern composers are Prokofieff and Hindemith. Next to the possession of his first battered horn, Kilton is proudest of his early American furniture collection, not to mention his china, prints and glassware. Outdoors he whizzes bullets at targets when the hunting season closes.

Paul Prose

Paul Prose, a newcomer in the double bass section of the orchestra, began his study of music in strange fashion. The school orchestra in Vienna, which 17-year-old Paul attended, needed a double bass player. The teacher picked out the largest boy in the class—Paul.



PAUL PROSE
Double Bass

PAUL TORTELIER
'Cello

He played the instrument in desultory fashion until heard by a visiting music supervisor, who was a former bass virtuoso. This gentleman recognized talent in the scraping sounds made by the lad. He took the young man as a pupil. Three years later Paul was a finished product. His musical godfather added further blessings, by finding him a position in the Hungarian Opera Company. Paul's luck was short-lived; war came.

He renewed his musical ventures in America. First in the bass section of the Cleveland Orchestra, then with Roxy in New York. The showman passed away, and the orchestra passed out of existence. Paul turned from orchestral duty to private study and spent six industrious years with a faculty member of the Julliard School of Music. He then joined the Boston orchestra last summer at the Berkshire Festival.

Mr. Prose's hobby is music. Orchestrally he likes Debussy, Franck, Beethoven, and rates the chamber music of Handel and Haydn tops.

Mr. Prose was born in Hungary of an all-musician family. As a baby he chimed in by forming his own orchestra of one. He would raid the Prose kitchen and set the air ringing with melodies and improvised rhythms of beaten pots and pans.

Paul Tortelier

The youngest member of the orchestra's 'cello section, Paul Tortelier, came here in 1936 from the solo 'cello position in the Monte Carlo Symphony Orchestra. It was in the orchestra of the popular resort that he had an unusual musical experience.

The orchestra rehearsed "Don Quixote" under the baton of its composer, Richard Strauss. Paul, as first 'cellist, resolved to play the difficult solo from memory. Day and night the score was his companion. Many times the feat seemed impossible, but he was determined. At the performance Paul played as one inspired. At the conclusion of the work he noticed a woman in the front row. She stood on her seat and threw ecstatic kisses at the young soloist. Came intermission and she besieged him with compliments. She enthusiastically remarked that this was the first time she had not been bored with the long work. She then took the young man by the arm and introduced him to her husband, Richard Strauss.

He began 'cello at the age of six in Paris. His mother bought him a special half-sized instrument and little Paul enthusiastically bowed away, perched on his high chair. At 16 he graduated from the Paris Conservatory only to re-enter again to study composition.

These added years of harmony and composition study have borne fruit. He has written 'cello studies, duos and pieces, as well as a string quartet. None of these, however, afford him the pleasure he gets from his trio for oboe and two celli. He wrote this for his family in Paris, and he has performed it with his mother and brother, who play oboe and 'cello, respectively.

He has appeared as recitalist in New York city and as soloist with the Boston Orchestra; he was the first in America to play the Hartmann Viola Concerto. Non-musically, he turns to literature and ice skating for relaxation. But most of Paul's spare time is spent, pen in hand, putting notes on paper.

He did neither. Larry soon owned one slightly used huge xylophone of the marimba type. Now the near-by families fairly danced to the music, and soon fair couples paid to dance to his music. At 18 he left home and entered the Boston Conservatory.

With graduation day in view, Larry played a marimba solo at a dinner given in honor of Maurice Ravel. On hand were many celebrities, including Dr. Koussevitzky. The conductor heard and applauded the dexterous young artist. The conductor heard Larry again at an audition after graduation. This time the applause was in the form of a contract.

Larry played the first vibraphone solo heard at a pops concert. The selection, written for him, was "Jungle, Jungle." But for the most part, with the limited repertoire of the instrument he has written his own compositions.

LAWRENCE WHITE
Vibracussionist

In the orchestral vein he prefers Prokofieff and Ravel. He finds more interesting percussion parts in modern music than in the classics.

Married, Larry teaches at the Boston Conservatory, where he received the first percussion and tympani diploma.

43

DECEMBER 27, 1939

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By PAUL D. SECON

Boaz Piller, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Contra-Bassoonist, who hob-nobs with musical greats, comes from a Hague family of professional musicians. He soon followed suit, after an early piano career, by studying the bassoon and entering The Hague Conservatory. There he also studied 'cello, but found his love for the woodwind instrument paramount.

In his last years as a student he played the bassoon in The Hague Symphony. He graduated, and seemed headed for a lifetime position until he decided to ask the orchestra directors for a raise. He did; the amount being the munificent sum equivalent to two dollars a month in American money. He received, instead, a polite letter of refusal. He sent a polite letter of resignation and joined the orchestra of the Paris Opera as a 'cellist.

This position lasted long enough to take him to America, where the opera gave performances. The first city was New Orleans, then came a long extended tour of the Middle West. The 'cellist, tired of traveling, jumped the train in St. Louis. He borrowed five dollars from the Dutch consul, returned to New Orleans, but soon hurried to his sick mother's side at The Hague.

He returned to the States, this time to Boston, where he soon had a teaching position as bassoonist at the New England Conservatory. A few years later he entered the orchestra as bassoonist and after a few seasons took over the contra bassoon position.

Mr. Piller is justly proud of his colletion of 275 framed autographs of musical celebrities with whom he is intimate. The latest addition to these being the modern English composer, Authur Bliss.

He is the only one in the United States who has a complete set of caricatures by Daumier. The 51 pictures took him many years to collect. Outside of music he enjoys hiking over the Presidential Range.

Pasquale Cardillo

The newest and youngest member of the clarinet section in the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Pasquale Cardillo, who plays the E flat clarinet. He joined the orchestra last summer in the Berkshires, after graduating from the New England Conservatory last season.

BOAZ PILLER
Contra-Bassoon

As a youngster in a nearby Massachusetts town, he attended concerts with his father and always found the long, black woodwind tone fascinating. His father, an amateur clarinetist, encouraged the youngster and at the age of ten Pasquale began the instrument. He progressed quickly and during his high school years often gave solos at assemblies and on special occasions.

In his final year at school he was overjoyed to discover he was to be the recipient of a scholarship to the New England Conservatory. This was quite an honor considering the fact that only one from each respective high school in a city was selected.

PIERRE MAYER
Violin

He graduated last spring and then his most trying period set in. What should he do? May, June, July dragged by; he was still undecided which musical course to pursue. Everything cleared on the last day of July. His phone rang. Could he take an audition for the summer season at the Berkshires immediately? He could and did, and after a successful summer season, joined the orchestra as regular E flat clarinetist.

He is completely thrilled at this, his first year with the orchestra. His greatest moment arose in Richard Strauss's "Zarathustra." Dr. Koussevitzky turned to him for a solo passage in the work, and the thrills piled high as he felt the great conductor concentrating all his attention on him. In fact, so thrilled is Mr. Cardillo with his new position, that oftentimes he has great difficulty restraining himself from arising and applauding at the end of many a number.

Pierre Mayer

Pierre Mayer, a member of the violin section of the Boston Orchestra, began violin at the age of seven in Paris. His parents decided against a professional musical career, but changed at the urging of Pierre's teacher. The lad quickly took advantage of his musical gifts and entered the Paris Conservatory at the age of 11.

Four years later he was a member of a theater orchestra and later gained a coveted position in the famed Lamoureux Concerts. At this point his close contact with Andre Caplet, French master of the violin and disciple of Debussy, gave his musical life new incentive.

Today, many years after these exciting years, Pierre still carries with him the teachings of Caplet. It was through Caplet that he gained his insight into music. Everything previous to his teachings seemed inconsequential. Here was the man who, Pierre says, took him by the hand and made his feel music for the first time.

Imbued with the spirit and flavor of his master's inspiration, he joined the orchestra of the Concerts de Conservatoire and bowed his violin with new zest. It was here also that Pierre got his greatest musical thrill. As he sat on the stage for the first performance, he suddenly remembered that he was playing in the same hall that had held every famous French violinist, conductor and composer. He was on the same stage where Beethoven had first performed in France; where Berlioz had played tympani; where Faure, Monteux, Pierne had all conducted; he still carries the spirit of that moment.

He later played in the Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris and was then invited by the conductor to the Boston orchestra. Here in Boston, he teaches and also plays in the Boston Chamber Orchestra. His favorite composers are the French impressionists, Debussy, Ravel and Faure.

Mr. Mayer is married and considers an evening spent with a friend worth a trip around the world.

PASQUALE CARDILLO
E Flat Clarinet

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRI

MEN BEHIND MUS

By PAUL D. SECON

Jean Bedetti, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first 'cellist, would make a happy addition to any orchestra. His musical aptitude was shown at an early age, for at the age of 11 Jean had already appeared as soloist with the Opera Orchestra, in Lyons, France.

He followed this auspicious beginning with a diploma at the Paris Conservatory and soon was seated as first 'cellist in the Opera Comique. Four years later he had the same position in the Orchestra of the Colonne Concerts. Jean, meanwhile, gave recitals every year and was undecided whether to continue his orchestral career or to pursue that of a soloist.

The question was temporarily settled by the war. All music was forgotten, orchestral and soloist. With the termination of hostilities came the answer. He was offered his present position by Conductor Monteux, under whom Jean had played. He accepted, and today feels sure he made the right choice, for since then he has soloed more than 50 times with the orchestra.

To add to this, he finds Dr. Koussevitzky a great inspiration and the complete understanding he gets from the conductor's interpretations makes his musical life a complete one.

Jean was the first in this country to play Bela Bartok's 'Cello Sonata, which he did with the composer. Also, heard for the first time in the United States, was his performance, a few years ago, of P. E. Bach's Concerto.

Personally, he enjoys the classics and the very modern composers. Sonorous and deep-toned Bach enchants him as much as the charm of Mozart, while Debussy is his greatest musical painter. He has three 'cellos, all of which are kept constantly in use depending on the music played.

Among Jean's fondest musical possessions are two letters, one from Saint Saens, the other from Ernst Bloch. The first thanks him for playing the Saint Saens Concerto with rare perfection, and in the second, Conductor-Composer Bloch admits that he almost forgot to conduct when he heard his concerto being played with such feeling by Mr. Bedetti.

Emil Arcieri

At 18, Emil Arcieri, clarinetist in the Boston Orchestra, was an enthusiastic woodwind player in the orchestras of the New England Conservatory and the McDowell Club. At a Conservatory concert he took his accustomed first clarinet chair, played with excellent musicianship, and was later congratulated by Conductor Monteux, who sat in the audience.

Through him, Emil joined the Boston Musical Association, which presented concerts given by members of the Boston Orchestra. A few months later, the 18-year-old clarinetist was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As a lad in Lynn he was always fascinated by the sounds of music. He began to imitate these by tinkering with the piano and blowing a harmonica. At nine, he was introduced to the clarinet and was immediately fascinated by the tone. He soon had a grasp on the instrument and a few summers later played with a concert ensemble. Later in Boston, he continued his studies until the eventful Conservatory concert. He then joined the Boston Orchestra as one of the youngest members ever to attain a position.

EMIL ARCIERI
Clarinet

He thinks all composers have something to say, and therefore deems no school a favorite. Modern music, to him, is intellectual, but does not seem as spontaneous as the classics. The best work for the clarinet in his estimation is the Mozart Concerto.

He adds to his regular position in the orchestra by playing in the Pops Concerts. Besides his capabilities as clarinetist he is a competent percussionist, and often lends a helping hand in that section. He relaxes from his musical activities by dabbling in many things, especially sports and reading.

JEAN BEDETTI
First 'Cello

Lucien Hansotte

Lucien Hansotte, a trombone member of the Boston orchestra, was undecided between two musical worlds: the symphony orchestra, or the opera orchestra. The question arose when he graduated from the Paris Conservatory. He played in the Geneva Orchestra, and then gained a coveted trombone position in the orchestra of the French opera.

The opera company toured America and Canada. The trombonist found himself more and more desirous for a symphony seat. At last the season finished. The opera returned to Paris. Lucien heard that Dr. Koussevitzky was in the city. He hastily made steps to his abode, played for the conductor and the question was settled.

He was born in Belgium, but raised in Geneva. His family were professional musicians. His father played French horn in the Geneva opera and at eight years of age Lucien began piano but made little progress. His father advised him to study a wind instrument. Lucien complied by studying the trombone and soon entered the Paris Conservatory.

He likes Schuman, Schubert and Beethoven, and in the modern field, Ravel and Debussy.

DECEMBER 27, 1939

43

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By PAUL D. SECON

Boaz Piller, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Contra-Bassoonist, who hob-nobs with musical greats, comes from a Hague family of professional musicians. He soon followed suit, after an early piano career, by studying the bassoon and entering The Hague Conservatory. There he also studied 'cello, but found his love for the woodwind instrument paramount.

In his last years as a student he played the bassoon in The Hague Symphony. He graduated, and seemed headed for a lifetime position until he decided to ask the orchestra directors for a raise. He did; the amount being the munificent sum equivalent to two dollars a month in American money. He received, instead, a polite letter of refusal. He sent a polite letter of resignation and joined the orchestra of the Paris Opera as a 'cellist.

PIERRE MAYER
Violin

This position lasted long enough to take him to America, where the opera gave performances. The first city was New Orleans, then came a long extended tour of the Middle West. The 'cellist, tired of traveling, jumped the train in St. Louis. He borrowed five dollars from the Dutch consul, returned to New Orleans, but soon hurried to his sick mother's side at The Hague.

He returned to the States, this time to Boston, where he soon had a teaching position as bassoonist at the New England Conservatory. A few years later he entered the orchestra as bassoonist and after a few seasons took over the contra bassoon position.

Mr. Piller is justly proud of his colletion of 275 framed autographs of musical celebrities with whom he is intimate. The latest addition to these being the modern English composer, Authur Bliss.

He is the only one in the United States who has a complete set of caricatures by Daumier. The 51 pictures took him many years to collect. Outside of music he enjoys hiking over the Presidential Range.

Pasquale Cardillo

The newest and youngest member of the clarinet section in the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Pasquale Cardillo, who plays the E flat clarinet. He joined the orchestra last summer in the Berkshires, after graduating from the New England Conservatory last season.

BOAZ PILLER
Contra-Bassoon

As a youngster in a nearby Massachusetts town, he attended concerts with his father and always found the long, black woodwind tone fascinating. His father, an amateur clarinetist, encouraged the youngster and at the age of ten Pasquale began the instrument. He progressed quickly and during his high school years often gave solos at assemblies and on special occasions.

In his final year at school he was overjoyed to discover he was to be the recipient of a scholarship to the New England Conservatory. This was quite an honor considering the fact that only one from each respective high school in a city was selected.

He graduated last spring and then his most trying period set in. What should he do? May, June, July dragged by; he was still undecided which musical course to pursue. Everything cleared on the last day of July. His phone rang. Could he take an audition for the summer season at the Berkshires immediately? He could and did, and after a successful summer season, joined the orchestra as regular E flat clarinetist.

He is completely thrilled at this, his first year with the orchestra. His greatest moment arose in Richard Strauss's "Zarathustra." Dr. Koussevitzky turned to him for a solo passage in the work, and the thrills piled high as he felt the great conductor concentrating all his attention on him. In fact, so thrilled is Mr. Cardillo with his new position, that oftentimes he has great difficulty restraining himself from arising and applauding at the end of many a number.

Pierre Mayer

Pierre Mayer, a member of the violin section of the Boston Orchestra, began violin at the age of seven in Paris. His parents decided against a professional musical career, but changed at the urging of Pierre's teacher. The lad quickly took advantage of his musical gifts and entered the Paris Conservatory at the age of 11.

Four years later he was a member of a theater orchestra and later gained a coveted position in the famed Lamoureux Concerts. At this point his close contact with Andre Caplet, French master of the violin and disciple of Debussy, gave his musical life new incentive.

Today, many years after these exciting years, Pierre still carries with him the teachings of Caplet. It was through Caplet that he gained his insight into music. Everything previous to his teachings seemed inconsequential. Here was the man who, Pierre says, took him by the hand and made his feel music for the first time.

Imbued with the spirit and flavor of his master's inspiration, he joined the orchestra of the Concerts de Conservatoire and bowed his violin with new zest. It was here also that Pierre got his greatest musical thrill. As he sat on the stage for the first performance, he suddenly remembered that he was playing in the same hall that had held every famous French violinist, conductor and composer. He was on the same stage where Beethoven had first performed in France; where Berlioz had played tympani; where Faure, Monteux, Pierne had all conducted; he still carries the spirit of that moment.

He later played in the Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris and was then invited by the conductor to the Boston orchestra. Here in Boston, he teaches and also plays in the Boston Chamber Orchestra. His favorite composers are the French impressionists, Debussy, Ravel and Faure.

Mr. Mayer is married and considers an evening spent with a friend worth a trip around the world.

PASQUALE CARDILLO
E Flat Clarinet

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 29, 193

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By PAUL D. SECON

Jean Bedetti, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first 'cellist, would make a happy addition to any orchestra. His musical aptitude was shown at an early age, for at the age of 11 Jean had already appeared as soloist with the Opera Orchestra, in Lyons, France.

He followed this auspicious beginning with a diploma at the Paris Conservatory and soon was seated as first 'cellist in the Opera Comique. Four years later he had the same position in the Orchestra of the Colonne Concerts. Jean, meanwhile, gave recitals every year and was undecided whether to continue his orchestral career or to pursue that of a soloist.

The question was temporarily settled by the war. All music was forgotten, orchestral and soloist. With the termination of hostilities came the answer. He was offered his present position by Conductor Monteux, under whom Jean had played. He accepted, and today feels sure he made the right choice, for since then he has soloed more than 50 times with the orchestra.

To add to this, he finds Dr. Koussevitzky a great inspiration and the complete understanding he gets from the conductor's interpretations makes his musical life a complete one.

Jean was the first in this country to play Bela Bartok's 'Cello Sonata, which he did with the composer. Also, heard for the first time in the United States, was his performance, a few years ago, of P. E. Bach's Concerto.

Personally, he enjoys the classics and the very modern composers. Sonorous and deep-toned Bach enchants him as much as the charm of Mozart, while Debussy is his greatest musical painter. He has three 'cellos, all of which are kept constantly in use depending on the music played.

Among Jean's fondest musical possessions are two letters, one from Saint Saens, the other from Ernst Bloch. The first thanks him for playing the Saint Saens Concerto with rare perfection, and in the second, Conductor-Composer Bloch admits that he almost forgot to conduct when he heard his concerto being played with such feeling by Mr. Bedetti.

Emil Arcieri

At 18, Emil Arcieri, clarinetist in the Boston Orchestra, was an enthusiastic woodwind player in the orchestras of the New England Conservatory and the McDowell Club. At a Conservatory concert he took his accustomed first clarinet chair, played with excellent musicianship, and was later congratulated by Conductor Monteux, who sat in the audience.

Through him, Emil joined the Boston Musical Association, which presented concerts given by members of the Boston Orchestra. A few months later, the 18-year-old clarinetist was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As a lad in Lynn he was always fascinated by the sounds of music. He began to imitate these by tinkering with the piano and blowing a harmonica. At nine, he was introduced to the clarinet and was immediately fascinated by the tone. He soon had a grasp on the instrument and a few summers later played with a concert ensemble. Later in Boston, he continued his studies until the eventful Conservatory concert. He then joined the Boston Orchestra as one of the youngest members ever to attain a position.

He thinks all composers have something to say, and therefore deems no school a favorite. Modern music, to him, is intellectual, but does not seem as spontaneous as the classics. The best work for the clarinet in his estimation is the Mozart Concerto.

He adds to his regular position in the orchestra by playing in the Pops Concerts. Besides his capabilities as clarinetist he is a competent percussionist, and often lends a helping hand in that section. He relaxes from his musical activities by dabbling in many things, especially sports and reading.

EMIL ARCIERI
Clarinet

JEAN BEDETTI
First 'Cello

Lucien Hansotte

Lucien Hansotte, a trombone member of the Boston orchestra, was undecided between two musical worlds: the symphony orchestra, or the opera orchestra. The question arose when he graduated from the Paris Conservatory. He played in the Geneva Orchestra, and then gained a coveted trombone position in the orchestra of the French opera.

The opera company toured America and Canada. The trombonist found himself more and more desirous for a symphony seat. At last the season finished. The opera returned to Paris. Lucien heard that Dr. Koussevitzky was in the city. He hastily made steps to his abode, played for the conductor and the question was settled.

He was born in Belgium, but raised in Geneva. His family were professional musicians. His father played French horn in the Geneva opera and at eight years of age Lucien began piano but made little progress. His father advised him to study a wind instrument. Lucien complied by studying the trombone and soon entered the Paris Conservatory.

He likes Schuman, Schubert and Beethoven, and in the modern field, Ravel and Debussy. However, he finds the classic composers more difficult to play.

LUCIEN HANSOTTE
Trombone

His favorite trombone passages occur in Beethoven, Wagnerian Operas and Rimsky-Korsakoff. He finds the tone of the German made trombone too large for most works; the French trombone too small; the American tone color well balanced and just right.

He finds Dr. Koussevitzky a musical animator in that he makes all music live. Away from music Lucien likes to romp around on a tennis court and then cool off in a pool.

He is proud of his professional piano playing brother, who was the first in this country to play the score in Stravinsky's "Petrouchke" and "Le Sacre."

NSCRIPT, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 29, 193

USIC

LUCIEN HANSOTTE
Trombone

However, he finds the classic composers more difficult to play.

His favorite trombone passages occur in Beethoven, Wagnerian Operas and Rimsky-Korsakoff. He finds the tone of the German made trombone too large for most works; the French trombone too small; the American tone color well balanced and just right.

He finds Dr. Koussevitzky a musical animator in that he makes all music live. Away from music Lucien likes to romp around on a tennis court and then cool off in a pool.

He is proud of his professional piano playing brother, who was the first in this country to play the score in Stravinsky's "Petrouchke" and "Le Sacre."

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1940

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By PAUL D. SECON

Rene Voisin, a member of the trumpet choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received his early training from his father, who played the instrument in an orchestra in Angers, France. The young Voisin showed a natural aptitude for the straight horn and was enrolled at the Paris Conservatory.

During his studentship war broke out. Rene left the conservatory and joined France's battalions. Hostilities over, he returned to Paris and the Conservatory, where he graduated shortly after. His musical training next took a practical slant and he played with many of the orchestras in Paris. The Concerts du Conservatoire, operas, theaters, all passed in quick succession. None of these, however, held his interest like the concerts Koussevitzky, which were given every spring.

At these affairs, new pieces were always played, and new interest was always stimulated throughout Paris, for the conductor selected musicians from every large orchestra. Year after year Rene looked forward to his coming for playing under Koussevitzky was a musical treat. Rene realized a long termed ambition when he was asked to return to the United States with the conductor in 1927.

As a trumpeter he prefers playing American works. The trumpet parts are more difficult, but more interesting and used more intelligently. His favorite work in the trumpet vein is Ravel's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

His biggest musical moment came when his son Roger, who also plays trumpet in the Orchestra, gave a performance at the Esplanade concerts. Although the lad was but 15 at the time, he was complete master of the instrument and gave a performance par excellance.

Rene relaxes completely when occupied in his workshop where he dabbles with the brush.

RENE VOISIN
Trumpet

Leon Gorodetzky

At 22, Leon Gorodetzky, a violinist in the Boston Orchestra, had finished his ninth year of solo and recital performances. He had toured the States time and again, but found that he missed a great part of music. That was, participating in a major orchestra.

As he had been raised in Boston, and was a graduate of the Conservatory, his first inclination was to return to his native city. He arrived to find Conductor Monteux rebuilding the Orchestra. The ex-soloist applied, and with years of skill at his finger tips was easily accepted.

Leon was born in Paris, but came to Boston at the age of four. He began piano at six with the intentions of becoming a concert pianist. A year later he added the violin and here he found a "natural." At the age of nine he was already giving concerts and recitals throughout the country, but returned to study with Boston's best teachers.

Gruenberg, Loeffler, Winternitz, Vitnech, all taught and praised. He took their teachings with him as he left once more on a concert tour, but again returned; this time to join the Orchestra.

LEON GORODETZKY
Violin

Here, as member of a major orchestra, he at last found his greatest enjoyment in music. Especially under the genius of Dr. Koussevitzky, for with him Leon finds himself constantly growing with the music.

He considers Beethoven's Concertos and the Cesar Franck Sonata supreme. He is also fond of the Kreisler arrangements in violin literature. Beethoven's Ninth, to him, represents the greatest work ever produced by man. Stravinsky as well as contemporary Sibelius, fascinates him.

Leon teaches and when away from his violin revels in outdoor sports, chief of which is mountain climbing.

Manuel Valerio

In his New Bedford home, Manuel Valerio, clarinetist of the Boston Orchestra, first started clarinet. He was still in high school at the time, and had never been interested in music prior to his first musical venture.

The venture came about through a friend; a classmate of his who played violin. Manuel envied his chum's ability and decided to try for himself. The question then arose—which instrument was it to be. He was undecided between violin and clarinet. He finally chose the woodwind and amazed himself by advancing quickly.

He graduated from school and decided to continue his music further. He hurried to Boston, but found his finances insufficient for the cost of lessons. He solved this problem by working in an organ factory and studied with members of the Orchestra. At last he had sufficient funds to devote his entire time to music, so he entered the New England Conservatory.

He took the courses in stride and so well did he play, that, during his Conservatory years, he substituted in the Orchestra. After graduation, he auditioned for a vacant clarinet position and by his rendition of the Weber Concerto earned his seat in the Orchestra.

His favorite composers are Beethoven and Richard Strauss. Brahm's Quintet, Mozart's Quintet and Concerto rank first. He finds the accepted modern composers no more difficult than the composers of past eras.

He admires Dr. Koussevitzky's great magnetism, which draws the very best from his men. He also respects the attitude of his fellow musicians in the Orchestra, and like them, does not consider his work a position, but rather the working towards an end.

Manuel is married and spends most of his spare time playing with his little girl. As for his chum, who originally played violin at school, he is now an engineer.

MANUEL VALERIO
Clarinet

EVENING [illegible], FRIDAY, JANUARY 5, 1940

45

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By PAUL D. SECON

Bernard Fiedler, a violin member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, comes from a long line of musicians. His family were all musical; his father and great-grandfather emminent violinists in Poland, his birthplace.

Bernard originally began music via the flute when he was six years of age. However, the continual expulsion of air called forth an expulsion of blood at the same time, so the young man followed his father's path.

Until he was 15 he studied at home and progressed in an amateur fashion. One day a message came from America. His brother Emanual, a violinist in the Boston Orchestra, wanted Bernard to join him and study with him at the same time.

Bernard sailed, and soon after arriving in Boston settled down to work. With his brother as an incentive he soon advanced to a near professional stage, and occupied himself playing in small orchestras and in the Festival concerts. Five years after coming here, Bernard took an audition for the orchestra and was successful.

His favorite composers are Tchaikowski, Wagner, Sibelius and Mendelssohn. Of the modern composers he ranks Hanson's music first rate, and always enjoys playing his compositions. His best liked concertos are those of Mendelssohn, Brahms and Sibelius.

Bernard, commonly called "Benny" by his associates, revels in all sorts of sports, one of which was horseback riding. This manner of exercise came to an end when his horse stopped one day, and left Benny in the middle of the road.

BERNARD FIEDLER
Violinist

Marcelle Lannoye

As a lad in Belgium, Marcelle Lannoye, a French hornist in the Boston orchestra, had heard a great deal about the far-off Boston Symphony Orchestra. His uncle, a professional flute player, would tell little Marcelle stories of the famed orchestra, and the young man resolved that some day he would play in that orchestra.

He realized that ambition 15 years later, when, after playing first horn in a Scottish orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky, he sent the conductor a letter asking for a chance to play under him permanently. Three months passed; no answer. One day a wire arrived. Come to Boston, was the message; Marcelle came and has remained ever since.

MARCELLE LANNAYE
French Horn

He first began musical studies at 13, when, at the advice of his uncle, he became acquainted with the French horn. He finished school and entered the Brussels Royal Conservatory, from which he graduated.

He spent a short while in the orchestra of the Brussel's Opera, and a long while in the Belgian army when war broke out. His uncle insisted he come to England after peace was declared, so Marcelle soon had the position of first French horn in the Royal Carol Rosa Opera Orchestra.

A few months later he was offered a position in a Scottish orchestra, and there encountered Dr. Koussevitzky. As a member of the Boston orchestra, Marcelle also plays tuba and enjoys the sensation of reading new parts in Wagner and Bruckner.

His favorite composer is Caesar Frank, whose D minor symphony expresses Marcelle's musical feeling. He is married, and with his wife enjoys countless hobbies. But best of all he delights in putting on apron and white hat to prepare some of Belgian's real dishes.

At 18, John Murray, a member of the violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, boarded a boat from his home in Scotland and sailed for America. He carried with him a violin and a diploma in mining engineering. Which was it to be?

He arrived in Boston; months passed, the question was still unsettled. One day he traveled to the mining districts in Pennsylvania. That night, after seeing the conditions in the mines, John decided that music was his career.

He hastily retraced his steps to Boston, and entered the New England Conservatory. Graduation day was just ahead when the war came. John left his studies to sail for England, where he joined the British Flying Squadrons. War over, he returned to the Conservatory and quickly received his diploma. He gained invaluable experience in theater orchestras, and with the Boston Sextette. The following year he entered the ranks of the orchestra.

He comes from a musical family; his father having been a violin teacher and maker. The family was large, for John had seven other brothers and sisters, and like two of the seven, he made music his career. He began violin when he was seven and then entered school to study mining engineering. The question between the two vocations remained a toss-up till he saw the mines in Pennsylvania.

His favorite composers are the three B's, Sibelius and Prokofieff. He rates the concertos of Beethoven, Brahms and Sibelius tops.

He thrills under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky, whose personality electrifies the entire orchestra. Married, John likes to putter around with saw, hammer and wood. His chief avocation is making violin bows; and some day he hopes to emulate his father and fashion first-class violins.

JOHN MURRAY
Violinist

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, JANUARY 8, 1940

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By PAUL D. SECON

The first flutist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Georges Laurent, has studied with France's finest. When Georges was 15 he had already completed studies with Philippe Gaubert, the gentleman who now directs the Paris Opera.

Master Gaubert recommended the Paris Conservatory. Georges complied by passing the competition with only two years of flute training. At the Conservatory he advanced quickly under the skillful hand of Paul Taffanel and graduated in three years. With the Conservatory first prize his, he joined a Monte Carlo orchestra, led by Louis Gannes, which was composed of 18 first prize students of the Conservatory.

Soon afterward he was first flutist in the Viche Orchestra, and then held the same position in the Orchestra de Concert du Conservatoire. Here he passed the war period and shortly before the end of the fighting came to America with the orchestra.

The orchestra visited Boston, played at the hall, and received tremendous ovations. Georges received a contract with the Boston orchestra. Since then he has organized the Boston Flute Players Club, which will give their one hundredth concert in February. The club is noted for the unusual chamber music it presents, many of the works being played for the first time in America.

He teaches at the New England Conservatory, and has pupils in many major orchestras in the country. In fact, the other members of the flute section of the orchestra are all his students.

GEORGE LAURENT
First Flute

Samuel Diamond, a violinist in the Boston Orchestra, indirectly owes his entrance into the orchestra to an accidental fire. This occurred when he was concert-master with Victor Herbert, Maestro Herbert organized his orchestra in Boston and took them on a supposed two-year tour throughout the States.

SAMUEL DIAMOND
Violinist

Five months later the tour ended when fire destroyed everything in Dayton, Ohio. The concert-master returned to Boston; played in the Opera Orchestra, and then slid into a position with the orchestra. His father was musically inclined; his uncle a violin teacher. He began violin at seven and soon was giving performances in school for the other children. As a Bostonian, his musical aim was always the orchestra. One day his father bade him take a day off from school to hear Elman play with the orchestra. Little Samuel did, and waited in line on a cold November afternoon. He spent the next few days in bed recuperating from a resultant cold.

He likes Deems Taylor, and thinks American composers have accomplished a great deal toward tomorrow's music. Virgil Thompson especially catches the American spirit. In fact, our violinist could play his works for a year straight and never get bored.

He uses two violins, an American and Italian. He prefers the former because of its healthier tone.

At 18, Leon Artieres, a member of the viola section of the Boston Orchestra, had completed a course of solfeggio at the Paris Conservatory. He was now ready for his entrance examination on his instrument, the violin.

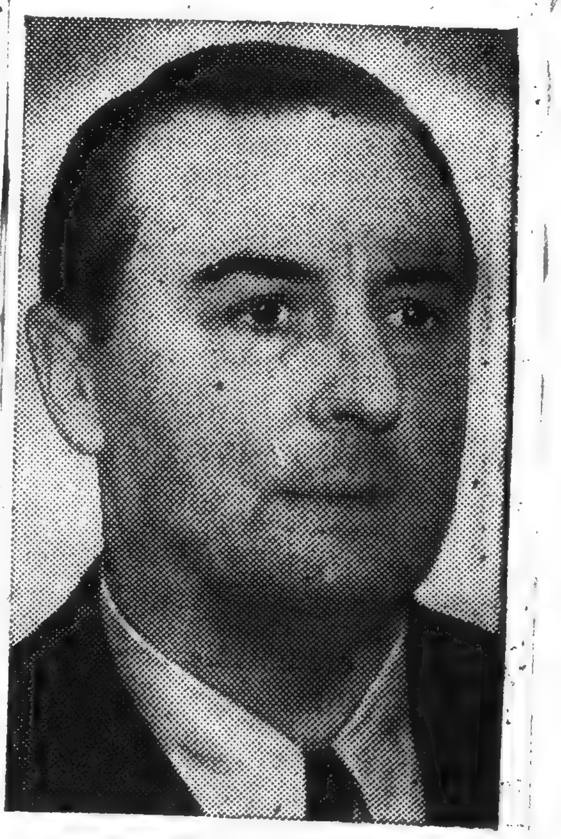
Two days before the trial Leon cut his finger. To his dismay he found himself unable to play, and, worse luck, he could not try again as he would be past the age limit as violinist the following year.

He quickly realized something must done, so he changed to viola. He had one year to master the instrument for 19 was the limit in age for violists. The year fled by; Leon persevered and gained admittance to the Conservatory. Once in, he discovered that his liking for the viola was even greater than for the violin, and rejoiced in his past misfortune.

Before graduation day his studies were interrupted by the war, so Leon took time off to join the ranks. Armistice found him once more a student, and a member of the Colonne Orchestra. At last graduation day came. Leon took his place for examination to gain the coveted first prize. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, was a member of the musical jury. Leon gained his first prize and an offer from Conductor Monteux to join the orchestra.

His favorite composers are Mozart, Debussy and Prokofieff; and best liked works for the viola include the Bloch Sonata, Handel Concerto and Enesco Concerto.

He is married and when not teaching, likes to dabble with photography and moving pictures.



LEON ARTIERES
Viola

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, JANUARY 12, 1940

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By PAUL D. SECON

Roger Voisin, a trumpeteer in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has the distinct honor of being the youngest player to ever join the orchestra. This occurred four seasons ago, when Roger was but 17.

He is what one would term a natural; for he began the instrument at the age of nine and one year later was already playing well known trumpet calls at the Esplanade concerts; used to recall the musicians at the end of intermission. Little Roger would make his entrance night after night, put the brass instrument to his lips, and the audience would gasp at the surety of tone, and command of instrument displayed.

ROGER VOISIN
Trumpet

While at junior high school in Boston, Roger was given special permission to play with the Latin School Band, and soon he was sitting in the first chair of the Mc'Dowell Club Orchestra. After another season, in which he gained experience in local orchestras, he was invited to occupy a chair in the orchestra.

He came here from France at the age of nine with his father, who also plays the same instrument in the Orchestra. His father was his first teacher, and with him Roger also mastered Solfeggio. Today, he still seeks advice from his first instructor, for through his great knowledge of all the classics and their interpretation, Roger feels much is to be gained.

He likes modern composers, especially Prokofieff, Piston and Hill. As an instrumentalist, he enjoys playing the works of Wagner and Richard Strauss. But of all music, Stravinski's "Le Sacre" gave him the greatest pleasure the first time he played it. This, although extremely difficult, he found deeply interesting, and he received tremendous thrills during its performance.

Away from music, the twenty-one-year-old virtuoso dabbles in his dark room, where many a fine photo has been turned out. Since he joined the orchestra he has appeared as soloist at the Pops Concerts. With the orchestra he has delighted audiences with Morton Gould's "Pavanne," "Toy Trumpet," "Eli Eli" and "Rachem"; and has made the same recordings for Victor Records.

RAFFAELO DEL SORDO
Violin

This member of the orchestra's violin section, Raffaele Del Sordo, today looks back at the time when he was but three years of age, in Italy. During this period he was struck with infantile paralysis. The little lad was tied to a chair and seemed slated for an invalid's berth. Came Easter Sunday, he suddenly got up from his seated position, and started to walk.

That was one happy occasion in the Del Sordo family. His mother decided that the youngster was too frail to do physical labor and then and there resolved that he was to become a violinist. She made plans to come to this country to gain the best teachers for him. Boston was the place and Raffaele began mandolin soon after reaching here.

He was soon playing violin, but lessons were very expensive. He and his uncle, a guitarist, ingeniously solved the financial problem. They serenaded future brides, for hopeful bridegrooms in Boston's Little Italy. If the groom was accepted, the door was flung open; if refused, the window raised and water hurled at all beneath. Many was the time he returned, soaked to the skin, but the necessary lesson money clutched tight in his hand.

He progressed rapidly; and soon was a pupil of Loeffler's and Weinternitz. This at 13. The orchestra, then under Pierre Monteux, was his goal. After years of earnest practice, he carried out his mother's conviction by being offered a seat which he accepted in 1920.

He likes the strings' seating arrangement, for in this way each member is able to hear the other player, and thus attain better ensemble. His greatest musical thrills took place on hearing Caruso sing the role of "Pagliacci" here in Boston; listening to Horowitz play the Tchaikowski Concerto; and the first time Dr. Koussevitzky rehearsed the Berlioz "Roman Carnival Overture."

Married, Mr. Del Sordo rummages about antique shops in his spare moments looking for European remnants.

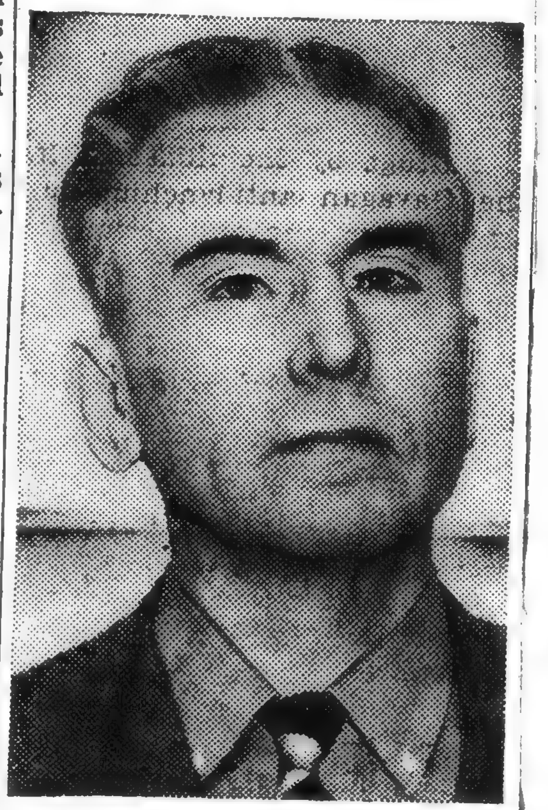
Carl Stockbridge

Carl Stockbridge, a member of the 'cello section of the orchestra, comes from a musical family. His father was a 'cello player before him in the orchestra; his brother played violin in the Philadelphia Orchestra, and his mother is an accomplished pianist.

Carl, with the natural musical environment, began his instrument in his 12th year, studying with his father, here in Boston. The low timbre of the tone fascinated him, as it still does today, and soon the young 'cellist was in various orchestras. First vaudeville, then musical shows, opera, and finally a coast-to-coast tour with a concert group.

The Sextette Club found Carl a member on its lengthy trips, where he gave a solo every performance. However, there was something lacking. His musical life seemed empty; he wanted to join a major orchestra. After playing everything but the circus, he heard of a vacancy in the Boston orchestra, applied and was accepted.

Prior to his joining the orchestra he had a scheduled audition with Oberhaufer, conductor of the Minneapolis orchestra. On the day set for the audition, Carl awoke to find six feet of snow outside his window. He set out for the train station, but no trains were forthcoming. Neither was the audition.



CARL STOCKBRIDGE
'Cello

He likes Brahms and Hindemith and the Lalo Concerto for 'Cello; and also the St. Saens and Haydn 'Cello Concertos. At one time he used his father's instrument in the orchestra, but now uses a French-made Gaud-Bernadil. He is a member of the Aeolians, a quartet that does light classics for Victor records.

Carl is a tennis enthusiast, and when not tearing around the court likes to tear around the Blue Hills with his two dogs.

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

Jan 15

By PAUL D. SECON

When Manuel Zung, a violinist in the Boston Orchestra, reached the age of 17, he found himself undecided between violin studies and medicine. The stringed instrument, which he had been playing seven years, had taken him as far as the New England Conservatory. Now that he was in, he was caught between the two interests.

The question was settled when he played for Eugene Gruenberg at the Conservatory. Mr. Gruenberg heard the young man perform and advised him to continue with his music. Manuel did, and the following summer was one of the four Gruenberg pupils that the teacher took with him to a summer camp for the purpose of practice. Seven and eight hours a day he worked, and by the end of the so-called vacation was well advanced.

CHARLES VAN WYNBERGEN
Viola

After graduating from the Conservatory another question arose. Was his to be a soloist career or that of orchestra instrumentalist? This was also settled quickly when he played for Dr. Koussevitzky, and the 22-year-old violinist was readily accepted.

Manuel was born in Russia; came here when he was four years old. His uncle played violin and interested the lad in the instrument.

His favorite composers are Brahms, Steavinsky and Prokofieff. He likes the rhythm and color of the moderns more than their melodic line.

He is a member of the Zimbler String Quartet and also makes a fourth in many bridge quartets. His wife is a well versed pianist and with her Manuel often plays duets at home.

He has given recitals at the New England Conservatory, and often performs on the links, but this time a golf club is his instrument.

MANUAL ZUNG
Violin

Charles van Wynbergen

Royalty plays an important part in the career of Charles Van Wynbergen, a member of the Viola section of the Orchestra. The royalty was no less a personage than the Queen Mother Emma of Netherlands.

At the time Charles was 10 years of age, he was a student at the Hague Conservatory, where he and his sister both studied. The Queen, interested in young talent, heard Charles play his viola, and his sister perform on the harp. She inquired and found they were the children of poor parents and that if financial aid was not forthcoming, the children would have to leave the conservatory.

She quietly paid the children's way through the school and so Charles continued musical studies that seemed almost certainly out of reach. He graduated and next studied at the Berlin Royal Conservatory and then played under all the great conductors in Berlin. In his 23rd year he was auditioned by the conductor of the Boston Orchestra and since then has been a member of the viola section.

He likes Bach and Mozart, Ravel and Debussy, but doesn't care for the real moderns. Especially a favorite is the Bach Sonata For Violin, transcribed for viola.

He is a great dog fancier and is known as the dog doctor of the orchestra. He relaxes from music amidst his paintings, books and collection of recordings.

His greatest thrill came last year, when, after an automobile accident he was not able to touch his instrument for some time. It was during this period that he heard the orchestra as a listener and still thinks it impossible that an orchestra could sound so beautiful.

Henri Girard

Before he was 10, Henri Girard, double bass player in the orchestra, had heard all of the repertoire of a professional orchestra. Sitting beside his brother, who played flute in a Parisian orchestra, he soon was acquainted with all the melodies and themes.

His father's death threw him off his course. Henri intended to go to college, but instead was forced to earn money for himself. He quickly learned the bass and was soon playing in orchestras in town. After attending the Paris Conservatory, he entered the new Theater Des Champs Elysees and still remembers rehearsals taking place while the hall of the new art theater was being built.

There his musical life was stimulated by playing under every modern composer of today. After this he played the Ballet Russe, the Opera and then after the war joined the Boston orchestra.

His favorite composers are Beethoven and the members of the French Impressionist School. All modern music he finds refreshing, for usually it contains something never heard before. All in all, it is more difficult to play Mozart than any modern composer.

HENRI GIRARD
Double Bass

He uses a German bass in the orchestra, for it has a very solid voluminous touch. Married, he teaches and relaxes between the covers of Molier. He adds to his musical enjoyment by playing 'cello for the fun of it in the McDowell Club.

117

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, JANUARY 22, 1940 B

Trio of World Travelers Among Symphony Men

Left to Right: Valdemar Lilleback, trombone; Einar Hansen, violin; Eugene Lehner, viola.

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By PAUL CRANE

There are only two Danes in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of them is tall, bespectacled Hans Valdemar Durck Lilleback, a member of the trombone section.

Mr. Lilleback's professional experience with the trombone began when, at the age of 15, he was admitted to the Danish army to play with the regimental band of the artillery unit. In 1899 he left the army so that he might give all his time to the study of his music. While studying in Copenhagen he was given the chance to play with the Copenhagen Opera Orchestra.

His studies completed, young Lilleback spent three years traveling about Europe with various symphonic ensembles. Then, in 1904, he came to the United States and continued his travels in this country with theatrical productions and orchestras until he was engaged by Leopold Stokowski to play second trombone with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

After several years with the Philadelphia group he resigned to take a seat as first trombone in the New York Symphony under the baton of Dr. Walter Damrosch.

Later he changed to the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and after four years there went West to join the Detroit Symphony where he played first trombone.

When a vacancy occurred in the trombone section of the orchestra in 1934 Mr. Fiedler was sent to New York to interview the impresarios as to a possible successor. Every one that he saw gave him the same answer; "Valdemar Lilleback is the man you want."

So for the last six years Mr. Lilleback has occupied his seat in the last row of the orchestra, the third from the center, on the right.

Einar Hansen

The second Danish representative is small, blonde Einar Hansen, the internationally famous concert violinist.

Mr. Hansen was born in Copenhagen in 1890, and showed such extraordinary talent as a child that his parents decided to move to Germany so that he could have the finest instruction. The family took up residence in Hamburg and young Einar was given a full scholarship at the Hamburg Conservatory of Music.

His studies were carried on under such masters as Jean Gesterkamp, Henri Marteau, and the former conductor of the Boston Symphony, Max Fiedler, under whom he studied chamber music.

Mr. Hansen became a popular young soloist and in his early twenties toured Europe appearing before the royal families of Sweden, Denmark, Germany and Greece. His concert work then brought him to the New World where he made an extended tour through the South American countries.

In 1922 he returned to Germany to become first concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestras of Bremen and Dresden. This position he held until 1925 when he came to this country to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a first violinist.

Eugene Lehner

Shy, but suave looking Eugene Lehner was born in a small Hungarian town in 1906. At least it was in Hungary when he was there. Today, with things changing so fast, he isn't quite sure.

Without any previous formal instruction he gave his first violin recital at the age of seven. Then the war came and the young Eugene was asked to play at charity concerts held in the town. Each military unit stationed in the town had its band and the young violinist was given an opportunity to play with them at these concerts.

The famed Hungarian composer, Bela Bartok, heard young Lehner at a Sonata Recital when the boy was only 13, and persuaded him to give up his ambition to become a physician and continue with his music.

After much persuasion the boy consented and went to Budapest to enter the Conservatory of Music. When he finished his studies, in 1925, he joined the Kolesch Quartet and for the next 14 years toured the world with this group.

This summer he joined the viola section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra while they were playing at the Berkshire Festival and, after fourteen years of traveling the sight of seeing the same policeman at the same intersection every day gives him great pleasure.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, JANUARY 19, 1940

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By PAUL CRANE

The man with the French Horn curled on his arm, sitting in the second last row of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and third from the center, on the left, is Walter Macdonald.

Mr. Macdonald was born in Watertown in 1901 and during his childhood was surrounded by a family which, although not professional, loved music. At the age of 12 Walter began his musical studies with the trumpet.

After high school he entered the Boston University College of Business Administration. Then the war came and Walter joined the Marines.

The war, as far as he was concerned, Walter says, was one of those "O. Henry wars." He was sent to Santo Domingo in the West Indies to chase bandits. It wasn't very hard because the bandits were glad to get caught. The food in the jails was much better than what they were getting in the hills.

When everything in Santo Domingo was under control Walter was sent back to Washington to play in the Marine band. He left the corps as soon as his enlistment was up and returned to Boston.

He began his study of music again at the New England Conservatory, this time with the softer-toned French horn.

Shortly after his graduation Frederick Shepard Converse, the New England composer, who was working with the Cleveland orchestra, asked that the vacancies in that orchestra be filled by Conservatory men. Walter was one of those chosen.

He went from the Cleveland Orchestra to the Detroit Symphony and in 1931 tried out for the Boston Orchestra and was successful.

The Symphonies of Brahms and Sibelius delight him. But he is wary of favorites for they often become "favorite bores." Among the moderns he likes Stravinsky and Prokofieff because, he says, they write from ideas and have something worthwhile to say.

Left to right, Walter Macdonald, French horn; Josef Zimbler, violoncello; Jean Devergie, oboe.

Josef Zimbler

Josef Zimbler is justly proud that all the male members of his family for several generations have been members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Zimbler, a violincellist with the orchestra, was born in Pilsen in 1900. At the age of five he started to study the violin with his father who is now conductor of the Municipal Symphony Orchestra of Pilsen. The family group had a string quartette in which the young Josef played second violin.

When he was 14 he heard the great Spanish 'cellist, Casals, play, and the beauty and tone of the master's instrument impressed him so that he resolved to give all his time to the study of that instrument.

He entered the Conservatory of Prague on a scholarship and later went to Berlin where he studied for three years. After his student days he played with chamber groups until he came to the United States in 1927.

He auditioned for Dr. Koussevitsky shortly after he arrived in Boston and was promised the first opening that occurred in the violincello section. Until his opportunity came in 1933 he played first 'cello in the People's Symphony Orchestra in this city.

His greatest interest is chamber music and the string quartet which he formed six years ago has enjoyed great success on the concert platform and the radio networks.

Jean Devergie

The lean faced gentleman with black hair, seated in the oboe section, just behind the first flute, is Jean Devergie who was born in Marseilles just 40 years ago.

M. Devergie's musical education began with piano lessons at the age of six years and was abandoned at the age of six years and six months. His musical talent was then submerged for 10 years, until he had completed his regular schooling.

At the age of 17 he entered the Marseilles Conservatory but this time his choice of instrument was the oboe. Although the instrument is considered to be one of the most difficult Jean graduated from the Conservatory with first prize in one year.

From Marseilles he went to Paris and again took first prize this time in the Paris Conservatory. After completing his studies he became a substitute player with the Paris Opera Orchestra.

It was here that Dr. Koussevitsky heard him and invited him, in 1925, to come to America to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

48

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, JANUARY 26, 1940

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

Left to right: Alfred Krips, violin; Raymond Allard, bassoon; Samuel Leibovici, violin.

By PAUL CRANE

The first bassoon player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sits in the third last row of the orchestra and slightly to the right of the center. He is round faced, 42-year-old Raymond Allard.

M. Allard was born in the village of Sin-le-Noble in the northern part of France. In 1908 he entered the Conservatory of Music at Douai where he studied solfegio and the saxaphone. He was studying at the conservatory when the German advance swept through that part of France in the early days of the World War. All the pursuits of peacetime were forgotten and the conservatory was closed. The young Raymond found himself a virtual prisoner behind the German lines. He managed to carry on his studies with the help of a friend.

Towards the close of the war he joined the French Army and entered the band as bassoonist. After two years in the army he entered the Paris Conservatory of Music. In order to carry on his studies he had to work. While at the Conservatory he played with several chamber groups and with the orchestra of the Theater de Champs Elysees for one season.

In 1922 he was awarded first prize by the Paris Conservatory. Shortly after, Pierre Monteux heard him play and engaged him at once to come to America to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Alfred Krips

Alfred Krips was born in Berlin in 1901. He started his violin studies at the age of eight under private tutors. Later Willy Hess, the former concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra accepted the young man as a pupil.

During the war he played first violin with the Berlin Symphony Orchestra and after two seasons went back to his studies.

After the war he took a position as concert master in the largest motion picture theater in Berlin. In 1920 he was one of a group of 25 of Germany's leading violinists to enter a competition for the position of first violinist in the Royal Opera House in Berlin. Mr. Krips was the successful competitor. He held this position until 1933, when the political changes in Germany made it necessary for him to leave his native land.

In January of 1934 he came to the United States and auditioned for Dr. Koussevitzky. Although there was no vacancy in the violin section at that time he was engaged immediately.

Besides his work with the Symphony he is a member of the Boston String Quartet and teaches at the New England Conservatory.

Samuel Leibovici was born in France in 1897. When he was still very young his parents reccognized his musical ability and he was brought to Paris so that his instruction on the violin might be the best.

Young Samuel soon proved that his parents were justified in moving to Paris, for at the age of 11 he was admitted to the Paris Conservatory of Music. At the Conservatory he attracted the attention of such masters as Edouard Nadeau and Alfred Brun, who accepted him as a pupil. Later the internationally famous violinist, Jacques Thibault, became interested in the young man's work and extended his services as an instructor.

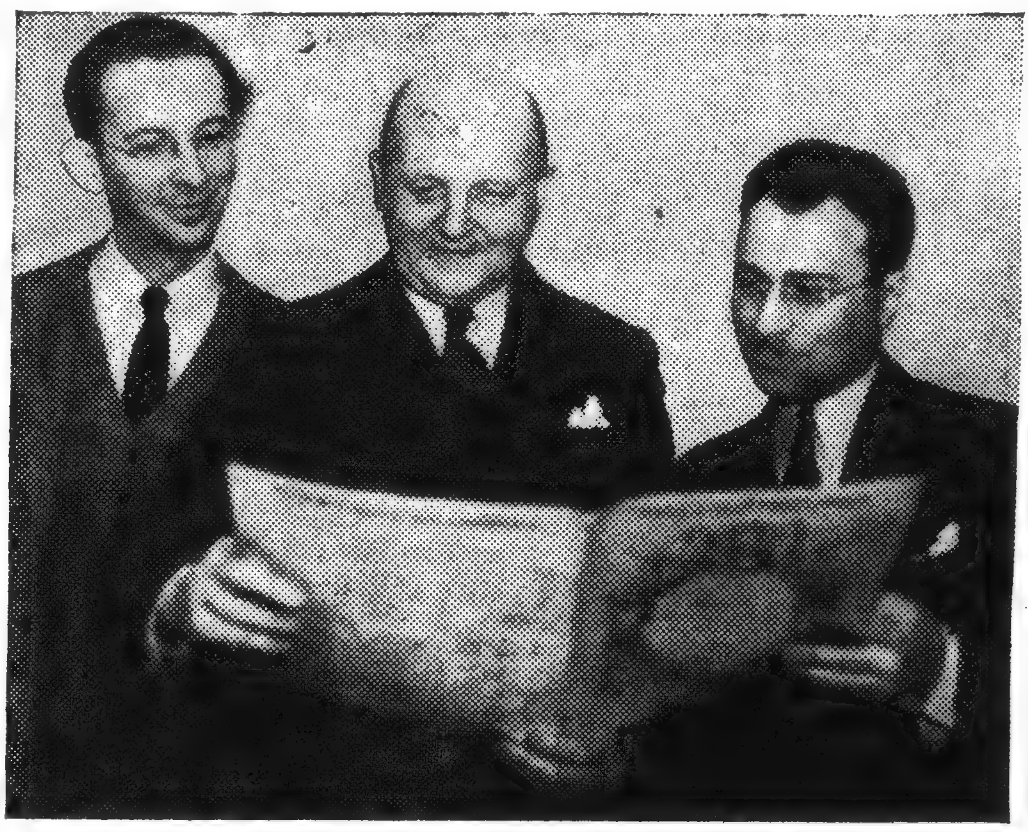
In 1911, when he was 14, Mr. Leibovici received first prize from the Conservatory in solfegio and three years later he was graduated with first prize in violin. Thus he had finished his musical education at an age when most young men are just beginning to think of theirs seriously.

At the outbreak of the war he was playing first violin with the orchestra of the Paris Opera. He left this position to join the Concert Touche as concert master and violin soloist.

In 1925 he auditioned for Dr. Koussevitzky in Paris and although the conductor had not heard of him before, he engaged him immediately to come to the United States as a first violinist with the Boston Symphony.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, JANUARY 29, 1940

MEN BEHIND MUSIC



Left to right: Phillip Kaplan, flute; Gaston Elcus, violin; Enrico Fabrizio, violincello.

By PAUL CRANE

One of the younger members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Boston-born Phillip Kaplan who joined the orchestra last October.

Mr. Kaplan started playing the flute in 1926, when he was twelve years old. He studied under the virtuoso, George Laurent, and later at the New England Conservatory on an Oliver Ditson Scholarship.

In 1933, after finishing his work at the Conservatory, Mr. Kaplan went to New York where he became first flutist with the National Orchestra Association. In the Carnegie Hall concerts he appeared as soloist with the Association's orchestra. After leaving this group he joined the New York Philharmonic with whom he also appeared as soloist.

Last year he returned to Boston and became interested in the work of the New Friends of Music Society, a group devoted to the chamber music of Bach and Haydn.

Besides his work with the Symphony as flutist he also plays with the American Lyric Opera under Fritz Reiner.

Enrico E. Fabrizio

Another Boston born and Boston educated member of the orchestra is the violincellist, Enrico Fabrizio.

Mr. Fabrizio began his musical education with the piano and then changed to the violin. Still later his fancy turned to the violincello and he carried on his study of this instrument under Antonio Amendola, Alvin Schroeder, who was formerly a first violincellist with Boston Symphony, and the Belgian cellist, Horace Britt.

In 1912, when he was 16, Mr. Fabrizio made a concert tour of the United States and Canada. Later he joined the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra as one of its youngest members.

He returned to Boston in 1918 and auditioned for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One of the auditors was the former first violinist of the orchestra, Charles Martin Loeffler, who had resigned his position with the orchestra to give all his time to composing.

Mr. Fabrizio not only plays the 'cello but he makes them. He has just completed one and is starting work on another. Among his cherished possessions is the Giovanni Battista Roggierius 'cello which was made in 1671, and was owned at one time by the composer David Popper.

Gaston Elcus

Gaston Elcus boasts of a musical lineage which goes back over a century. He was the student of Alfred Brun, who had been a pupil of Massart, who in turn had been taught by the early 19th century virtuoso Kreutzer, for whom Beethoven named his famous sonata.

Born in Paris in 1884 Mr. Elcus first studied violin in Amsterdam under Joseph Kramer. He returned to his native city on the advice of his teacher and entered the Paris Conservatory of Music. It was at the Conservatory that he studied under Brun and later under Marsick and Nadaud. In 1904 he graduated from the Conservatory with first prize for violin.

In the same year he received his first position, that of concert master with the "Opera Comique." From the "Opera Comique" he turned to solo work and appeared with the "Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire," the "Concerts Colonne" and several other well known groups in France. On his concert tours around France he appeared in joint recitals with Saint-Saens, Debussy, Ravel. Gaubert, and Paul Parray, all internationally known figures in the world of music.

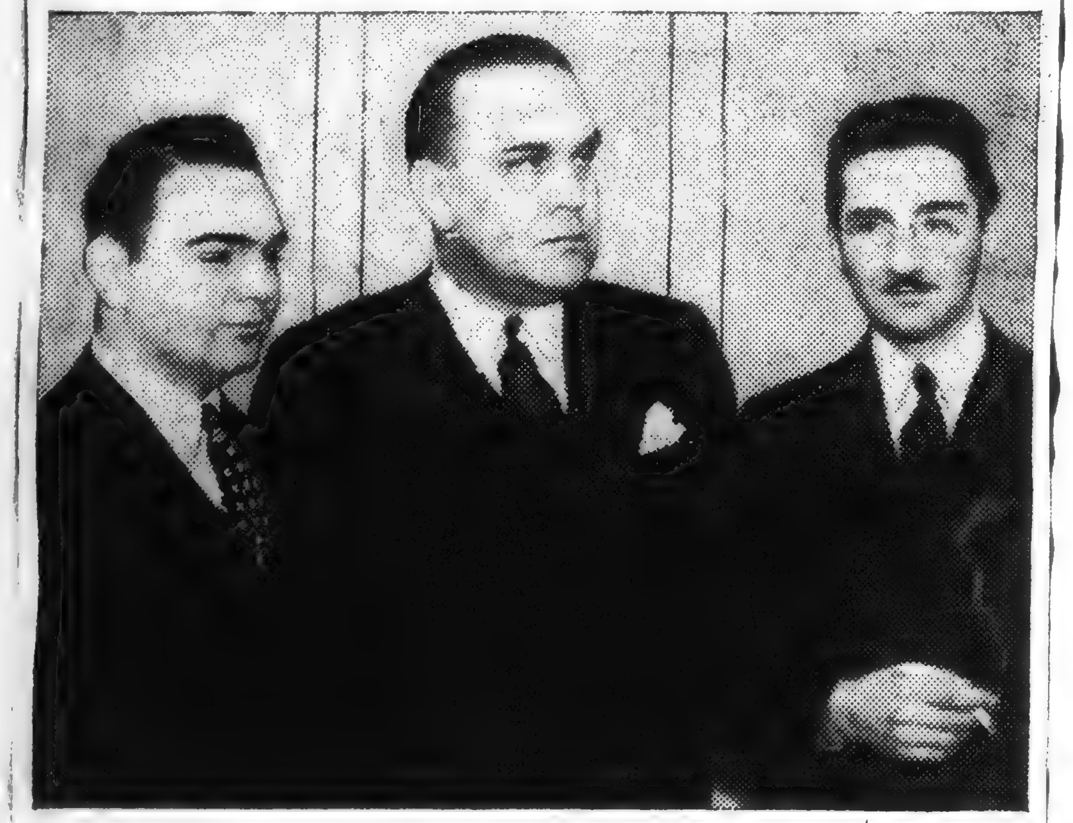
For fifteen years he was a member of the Commission of Examinations and Competitions of the Paris Conservatory, and during the same period he taught advance classes in violin at the Nantes Conservatory.

In 1926 he joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a first violinist, and today sits just behind Richard Burgin, the concert master.

49

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1940

MEN BEHIND MUSIC



Left to right: Joseph Lukatsky, oboe; Ludwig Juht, double bass, James Pappoutsakis, flute.

By PAUL CRANE

Heavy set Ludwig Juht is a double-bass player with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was born in Esthonia in 1894 and began, when he was eight, to study the flute with Davet Otto Wirkhaus. He soon tired of the flute and turned to the trumpet, but he gave that up, too. When he was 17 young Juht entered the Conservatory of Music at St. Petersburg, where he studied the double-bass under the famed Professor Peck.

When the war came things tumbled and music was hard to get—especially music for the bass viol. The only music the young student could find was written for violin or 'cello. He took this music and worked it for the double-bass so that he might keep up with his practice.

In 1916 he went to Helsingfors where he joined the Symphony Orchestra as first double-bass. While he was a member of this orchestra, during the seasons of 1916-17 and '17-'18, he had the pleasure of playing under Jan Sibelius and Sneveigt.

In 1918 the war reached Finland and all foreigners were forced to leave the country. Mr. Juht returned to Tallinen and played in the Symphony and Opera Orchestras of that city until 1921.

In 1921 he went to Berlin where he entered the Berlin Academy of Music to study composition under Paul Juan. Seven years later he joined the Berlin Philharmonic as bassist and played under Richard Hagel and Arthur Niekesch.

He stayed with the Berlin group for one year and spent the next three years in London as a member of the Savoy Concert Orchestra and as a popular figure on the concert stage.

He returned to his native Esthonia in 1932 and was engaged as a professor in the Riga Conservatory of Music. He retained this position until he came to the United States in 1934 to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Joseph Lukatsky

Joseph Lukatsky comes from Brooklyn. He was born there in 1913. When he was 12 years old he decided to study music and chose the violin as his instrument. But after six months he was convinced that the violin was not the instrument on which he would achieve success.

He turned to the clarinet and felt more at home with the wind instrument. He played the clarinet for five years and then an oboe player was needed in the high school orchestra. Young Mr. Lukatsky applied for the position and got it.

When he finished high school he was awarded a scholarship to the Eastern Music Camp and in the fall of the same year he came to Boston to enter the New England Conservatory on another scholarship. At the conservatory he was the pupil of Charles Lennon.

When his work in Boston was finished he went to Philadelphia where he entered the Curtis Institute of Music on a scholarship. While in Philadelphia he studied the oboe with Marcel Tabuteau and solfeggio with Madame Miquelle.

After leaving the institute he played with several chamber groups until a vacancy occured in the Boston Orchestra in 1938.

James Pappoutsakis

Twenty-seven years ago James Pappoutsakis was born in the shadow of the mighty pyramids of Cheops. Shortly after James arrived his Greek parents decided to move on again, this time to the United States.

James was very young when he came to this country and all his education has been received in the schools around Boston. He started playing the flute when he was 13 and continued his lessons under private tutors while he was attending the Boston Latin School.

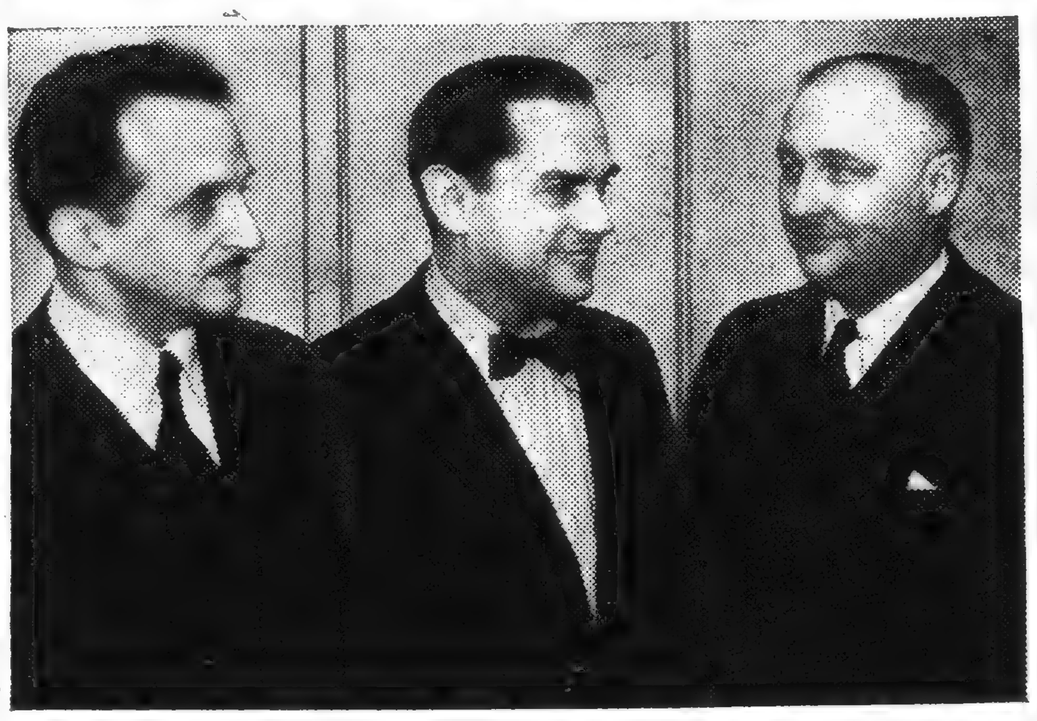
After his graduation from high school he entered the New England Conservatory of Music to continue with his work on the flute. At the Conservatory he studied as a pupil of the virtuoso George Laurent.

In 1932 he finished his work at the Conservatory and for the next few years he was connected with several chamber groups and did work on the radio.

In 1937 he joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a flutist. He also plays first flute with the popular Zighera Chamber group, and has been featured as the flute soloist at the Pops and Esplanade Concerts.

FEBRUARY 5, 1940 B

MEN BEHIND MUSIC



Left to right: Samuel Seiniger, violin; Roman Szulc, timpani; Marcel Lafosse, trumpet.

By PAUL CRANE

The throbbing beat of the timpani in the Boston Symphony Orchestra is under the direction of 45-year-old Ramon Szulc.

Born in Warsaw, the son of a cellist with the Warsaw Opera Orchestra, Ramon was naturally attracted to music. His first musical education was on the piano but he gave that up after three years. When he was 17 he was attracted to the percussion instruments and studied the snare drum under Alexander Jarekov, who played with his father in the Opera Orchestra.

After studying the snare drum for about three years he began to take an interest in all other percussion instruments and for several years practiced by himself until he had mastered them sufficiently to apply for a position with a "Pops" orchestra which gave outdoor concerts at Dubbien, a Lativian watering place on the Baltic, near Riga.

In 1912 he joined the Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra to take the place of Karl Ritter who left to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In 1920 Dr. Koussevitsky stopped in Warsaw for a short time before coming to the United States. During his visit he conducted the Warsaw Philharmonic and after the performance congratulated Mr. Szulc on his magnificent playing. The doctor promised that if ever a vacancy occurred in the Boston Symphony he would call him. The years passed and Mr. Szulc forgot about the promise. But in 1934 Mr. Ritter left the Boston Symphony and Mr. Szulc was asked to come from Poland to take the vacant seat in the orchestra.

MARCEL LAFOSSE

Marcel Lafosse, the trumpeter, was born in Marly-le-Roi, near Paris, in 1894. His first musical lessons were on the piano with his mother as teacher. Not to be outdone his father started to teach him the trumpet and the more militant instrument won out.

In 1914 he graduated from the Paris Conservatory of Music with first prize and a few months later he was mobilized. He served the entire four years of war in the army.

After the war he took a position as first trumpet with the Concert Pasdeloup. He stayed with that group for two seasons and then joined the Concert Colonne as first cornet. In 1922 he journeyed south and took a seat as first trumpet under Louis Ganne with the orchestra of the Casino de Monte Carlo.

In 1924 he returned to Paris to join the Opera Comique Orchestra and later to play with the Concerts Koussevitsky. During this latter group of concerts Dr. Koussevitsky invited him to come to Boston to be a member of the trumpet section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SAMUEL SEINIGER

Mr. Seiniger of the violin section is Harvard, 1913. Before entering college, however, he was, and continued to be, deep in musical study—violin with Mahr, Witek, and Burgin, and composition with George Chadwick.

During his first year at the University, he rose from the ranks of the string choir to the post of Concertmaster of the Harvard Orchestra. But his interest in the orchestra soon lagged, for he found that it lacked the material to perform most of the standard symphonic repertory. So he gave it up for the chess team.

He earned money for his tuition by playing evenings in the Boston theaters for the Victor Herbert operettas and the Ziegfeld Follies.

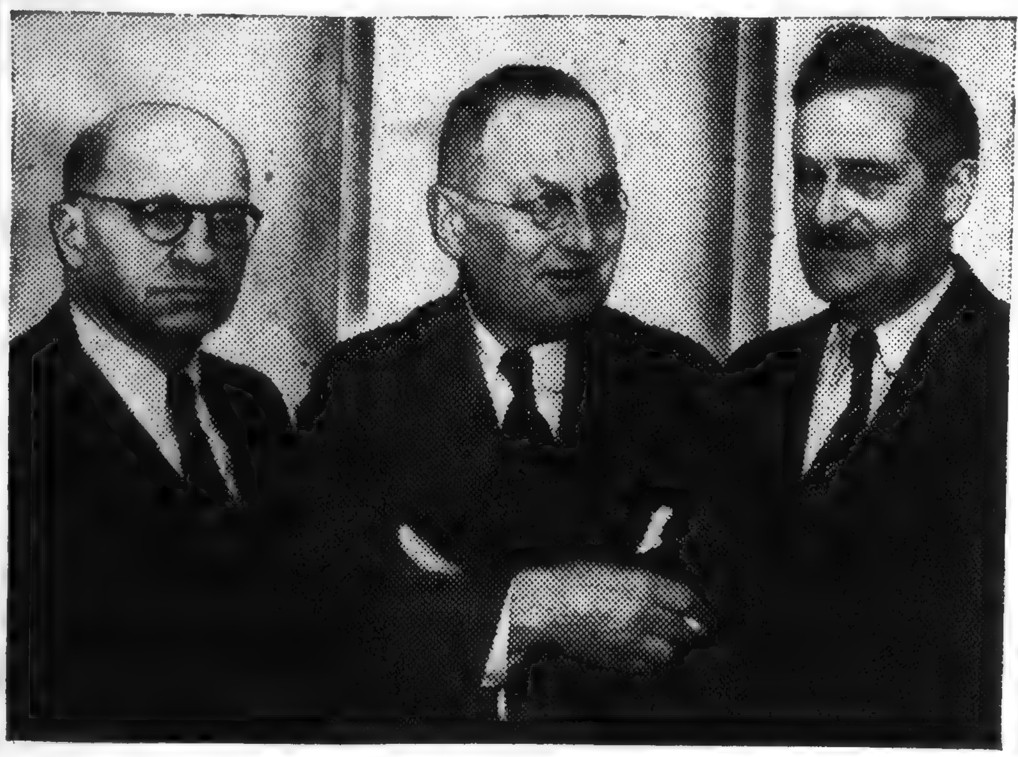
The year after his graduation he went with the St. Louis Symphony as first violin. After one season in St. Louis, he left to be conductor of a traveling orchestra. This group fulfilled an important special musical mission of those days. It was the era of silent film epics like "The Birth of a Nation," and they required incidental music from proficient orchestras.

Seiniger next joined the Detroit Symphony as a violinist under the conductorship of Gabrilowitch. He also began the serious study of orchestration.

In 1920 he joined the violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and continued his work in orchestration and transcription. His transcriptions have been performed by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Heifetz and the Radio City Orchestra.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1940

MEN BEHIND MUSIC



Left to right: Nicholai Kassman, violin; Julius Theodorowicz, violin; William Gebhardt, French horn.

By PAUL CRANE

A toy fiddle bought at a country fair somewhere in Poland was Julius Theodorowicz's first instrument. The boy was only four years old and was sick in bed with the measles when his father came home with the fiddle tucked under his arm.

Two years later Julius started taking violin lessons in Czerniowce, the picturesque capital of the mountainous Rumanian province of Bukowina. His stay in Czerniowce was short for his parents decided to move on to Lwow. Here the boy entered the Conservatory and after studying for several years was graduated at the early age of 11.

After his graduation from the Lwow Conservatory he went to Vienna. He spent the next four years in the city by the Danube and graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1893, when he was 15, with first prize.

For the next five years he played with several philharmonic orchestras and at the Royal Opera. In 1897 he went to Berlin where he joined the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He stayed with the Berlin group for two seasons. His summers were spent at the famous Dutch spa Scheveningen, where he conducted an orchestra.

In the fall of 1899 he came to the United States and joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra then under the direction of William Gericke. He left the orchestra in 1902 to make a European tour with the Kneisel Quartet. When the quartet came back to America they moved to New York and opened the Institute of Musical Art. Mr. Theodorowicz went along and remained with the institute until 1907. He then came back to Boston and the orchestra and has been with the orchestra since. In 1915 he was appointed concert master of the Pops and in 1919, assistant concert master of the orchestra.

William Carl Gebhardt was born in Boston and at an early age began to torture a bugle. In an effort to direct his son's musical talent along the right lines, William's father, a musician, undertook to teach his son to play the violin. The results were not all that had been hoped for. But about this time a member of the horn section of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, who had been visiting with William's grandmother in New York, left on a hurried trip to Germany and left his instrument behind. Thus by a devious route the fates presented Carl with his instrument.

Albert Hackebarth, then first horn player with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, taught Carl for five years. In 1907, when he was 23, Carl joined the Boston Orchestra after several seasons playing with the Colonial Theater and Sousa's Band. In 1915 he left Boston to join the St. Louis Symphony for one season. Then he toured with the Russian Ballet for several seasons. But eventually he returned to Boston.

In 1927 he left the orchestra again for a season with the St. Louis Symphony. In his long tenure with the Boston Orchestra he has played under Dr. Muck, Rabaud, Monteux and Dr. Koussevitsky.

Nicholai Kassman was born in Moscow in 1887. He studied violin at the Warsaw Conservatory of Music with the eminent Professor Barzavicz and later returned to Russia to study at the Imperial Conservatory of Music in St. Petersburg. He spent four years at the Conservatory and during this time his work was under the direction of the world renowned Professor Auer.

After leaving the Conservatory he went to Abo, in what is now Finland, where he became concert master of the Abo Symphony Orchestra. In 1921 Mr. Burgin, then seeking a violinist for the Boston Orchestra, brought him to this country.

Mr. Kassman has appeared in many recitals in this part of the country and is quite often accompanied by his daughter, Elly, who is an accomplished pianist.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1940

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

Left to right: Harry Shapiro, French horn; Yyes Chardon, cello; Karl Zeise, cello.

By PAUL CRANE

When the Symphony season started last fall there were several vacant chairs. But each ship from Europe brought one or two more occupants back until only one chair was left vacant, that Yves Chardon. Mr. Chardon, a cellist with the orchestra, was in the French army.

He was mobilized on September 2 and was sent to Rheims, where he remained until he was demobilized in December to return to the United States. The report that he had returned from a listening post beyond the Maginot Line, in No Man's Land, sounded exciting, but was not true. His three months in the army were spent with members of the French National Broadcasting Orchestra and the Paris Opera organizing military concerts.

M. Chardon was born near Rheims, in Villier-sur-Marne, in 1902. He started taking lessons on the cello when he was six years old. Four years later he entered the Paris Conservatory for the solfeggio classes and in 1915 he began his cello study there. Three years later he graduated from the Conservatory with first prize.

In 1920 he was offered a seat with the Concerts Colonne and was soloist with this group. He left Paris for Athens where he joined Dimitri Mitropoulos and became a member of the Greek String Quartet. While in Athens he also taught at the Conservatory and found time to do solo work.

When he left Athens he toured Italy and France and in 1928 he came to the United States to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He founded the Chardon Quartet and was instrumental in reviving an interest in chamber music which had long lain dormant in this section.

Besides his work with the orchestra he teaches at Wellesley College and is head of the graduate department of the Longy School of Music.

Harry Shapiro

Harry Shapiro is another of the Boston-born, Boston bred member of the orchestra.

Mr. Shapiro began his study of the French horn with his father the well known horn player, Max Shapiro. He continued his study of music while attending the Boston Latin School, studying under the first horn player of the orchestra, Mr. Valkenier.

After his graduation from Latin School he was given a position with the People's Symphony and played first horn with this orchestra during the season of 1933-34. In the following year he received a scholarship to the Juilliard Graduate School of Music in New York where he studied under Joseph Franzl. While attending the school he played in the school orchestra and afterwards was given a seat as first horn player with the National Symphony Orchestra.

During the summer of 1937 he played with the New York Symphony Orchestra at Chautauqua and in the fall came to Boston to audition for a place with the Boston Symphony and was successful.

Karl Zeise

Karl Zeise was born into a musical family here in Boston thirty-six years ago. He became a boy soprano and started his instrumental training on the cello with his uncle, Oscar Schultz. Later he studied with Alwin Schroeder, who was then solo cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When his musical training was finished he appeared several times as soloist with the Boston Festival Orchestra under Emil Molinhauer. Leaving Boston he toured the East with a trio until he was offered a seat with the Philadelphia Orchestra. He joined the orchestra at the age of eighteen, the youngest man in the entire group.

After three seasons in Philadelphia he went to Europe where he studied first in Italy and then with Hugo Becker in Germany. On his return to the United States he played second solo cellist with the Cleveland Symphony for two seasons following which he became interested in the development of electric musical instruments. He left the Cleveland Orchestra to spend a year in the Theremin laboratories in New York where he experimented with an instrument practical for symphony work. An instrument was developed and the Philadelphia Orchestra became interested enough in the development to place one in their group. Mr. Zeise spent the next six years with the Philadelphia Orchestra and his electric instrument.

He returned to Boston to play on the famous Whithall Stradivarius and in the Goding-thiede-Zeise trio. Last season he played all the concerts of the New Friends of Music chamber orchestra in New York.

In the spring of 1939 Mr. Zeise played as soloist at one of the late Pops concerts and later in the summer he joined the orchestra in the Berkshires. He took a regular seat in the orchestra last October.

51

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1940

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

Left to right: Carlos Pinfield, violin; Rolland Tapley, violin; Robert Gundersen, violin; Lloyd Stonestreet, violin.

By PAUL CRANE

One quartet of Boston Symphony men which has never appeared on the concert stage as such is the "Yankee Quartet," made up of four members of the violin section. Although they are not the only Americans in the orchestra they are called the "Yankee Quartet" by both their fellow countrymen and the foreign born members of the orchestra.

The senior member of the group, in point of service with the orchestra, is Carlos E. Pinfield, who joined the orchestra in 1912.

Mr. Pinfield was born in Roslindale and started to study the violin under Henry Heindl. Later he came under the tutelage of Willy Hess and when Mr. Hess became director of the Royal Academy in Berlin the young student went abroad with him. After two years in Berlin he was invited by Dr. Muck to come to Boston to join the Symphony Orchestra. He left the orchestra for one brief period during the World War when he joined the Army.

For 10 years he directed a summer orchestra at Poland Spring and is interested in presenting classical music to students in the private schools of this section of the country.

At the present time he is interested in an amateur orchestra made up of residents of Milton.

Robert Gundersen

Robert Gundersen came to the orchestra in 1913, a year after Mr. Pinfield. He was born in New Bedford in 1895 and after receiving his preliminary training in his home town came to Boston when he was 13 to study under Willy Hess. While in high school his musical studies were carried on with Felix Winternitz.

In 1913 he was given a seat in the back row of the second violin section and has since progressed until today he is within easy reach of the conductor's baton in the first violin section.

He plays with Burgin's String Quartet and is one of the original members of the Zighera group. For many years he led an ensemble made up entirely of Symphony Orchestra men at the Wentworth Hotel in Newcastle, near Portsmouth, N. H.

Rolland Tapley

Rolland (pronounced as in Holland) Tapley was born in Hudson in 1901. At a very early age the Tapley family moved the future violinist to Malden and it was in that city that he began to study the violin when he was nine years old. He studied under Dodge and Daly. In high school he had to decide whether he would continue his music or train for the Congregational ministry. Music won and he began his intensive study with Felix Winternitz. In 1920 he auditioned for Monteux and although he was only 18 at the time he was accepted as a second violinist. Since then, like Mr. Gundersen he has moved up to the first violin section.

On those rare occasions in symphonic literature which call for the use of a saxaphone, Mr. Tapley fills in. He was formerly a member of the Chardon Quartet and in 1929 formed his own quintet, consisting of the usual string quartet with a string bass added.

In the summer he is head of the music department at Camp Medomak in Maine, where he has made some interesting experiments with the effect of music on sleepy boys.

Lloyd Stonestreet left Harvard in his sophomore year to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was born in Revere in 1896 and started to study the violin at the age of seven. For several years he studied in Revere and then came to Boston to study with George E. M. Dickinson. He also studied under Jacques Hoffman, then a member of the orchestra, Felix Winternitz, and he spent several years in New York studying with Emil Werner. He entered Harvard in 1917 and left in October of the following year when, after an audition, he was given a seat with the orchestra.

He was with the Hoffman Quartet and is currently playing with Mr. Tapley's Quintet.

All four members of the "Quartet" have one interest in common—bridge. Their bridge game begins in October and continues right through the symphony season. After this week's concert tour, which took them to Springfield, Philadelphia and New York, the score will have piled up considerably.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1940

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

Left to right: Melvin Bryant, violin; George Madsen, piccolo; Henry Greenberg, double bass.

By PAUL CRANE

Henry Greenberg came from New York and the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Arturo Toscanini last October to join the double bass section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Greenberg was born in Poland in 1895 the son of an army band leader and a mother who was an accomplished pianist. Mr. Greenberg started taking piano lessons when he was six years old, but after four years he changed to the trumpet. He continued with the trumpet for several years until a cracked lip forced him to give it up.

It was then that he turned to the double bass and when he was 14 he entered the Warsaw Conservatory of Music where he studied under Bech and Wolanek for six years.

Following the completion of his studies he auditioned for the Warsaw Philharmonic, was successful, and played with them for four seasons. He left the Philharmonic to join the orchestra of the Warsaw Opera and remained with them for 13 years as first bass.

In 1923 Mr. Greenberg left Warsaw for Paris. It was in Paris that he met Mr. Gabrilowitch, who persuaded him to come to America to play with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. He was with the Detroit Orchestra for six seasons and then left to join the New York Symphony, under the direction of Mr. Damrosch. He stayed with that group for one season and then joined the New York Orchestra under the direction of Nicholai Sokoloff where he played the next season.

After the New York Orchestra he played with the Conductorless Orchestra for two years and traveled around until he was offered a seat with the National Broadcasting Company Symphony Orchestra. He stayed with the NBC group until last October when he came to Boston to take a seat in the double bass section.

George Madsen

George Madsen was born in Gloucester in 1906. He began to study the flute when he was 12 years old and after four years of private tutoring in Gloucester he came up to Boston and entered the New England Conservatory of Music, where he studied under George Laurent and played in the Conservatory Orchestra.

While he was attending classes at the Conservatory he was also working in a flute factory making the instruments he was learning to play. When it finally came to a decision as to whether he should spend his life making the instruments or playing them he decided he would rather play them.

After the Conservatory he spent seven years in the instrument department of the Boston public schools teaching the fife and flute to classes in the various schools around the city. In 1935 he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a piccolo player.

In the summers he was a member of Mr. Gundersen's ensemble at Newcastle, N. H., and like all who are natives of Gloucester should, he likes to spend his spare time sailing.

Melvin Hurd Bryant

When Melvin Bryant was six months old his father held him up to an admiring visitor and said: "Here is a future member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Born in Belmont both his parents, his father who was a violinist and his mother, a cellist, always spoke in such glowing terms of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that early in life the boy set for his goal a place in the orchestra.

His first music lessons were on the piano but after three years he turned to the violin. He studied under Karl Scheurer and later while he was attending Bryant and Stratton Business School he studied with Karl Rissland.

After graduating from business school he entered the business world but still kept the Symphony Orchestra as the goal for which he was heading. In 1918 a vacancy occurred in the violin section and Mr. Bryant auditioned for Dr. Muck and was accepted.

With Mrs. Bryant, who is a pianist, and his eight-year-old daughter, he lives in Belmont where he grew up. One of his hobbies is playing chamber music with Mrs. Bryant and his colleagues in the orchestra.

Mr. Bryant has interested himself in the history of his family. His researches into the geneology of his family have revealed

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

Left to right: John Barwicki, bass. Gaston Dufresne, bass; Siegfried Gerhardt, viola.

By PAUL CRANE

Siegfried Gerhardt is one of that small group which had the privilege of playing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the same time that his father was a member.

Mr. Gerhardt was born in Boston in 1891 and, as might be suspected, first studied music with his father. The elder Gerhardt taught his boy piano for a year. The next year young Siegfried took up his studies with Carl Faelton and after several years at Mr. Faelton's school he entered the New England Conservatory of Music. He shifted from the piano to the violin at this time and came under the tutelage of Felix Winternitz.

At the Conservatory he played first viola in the orchestra and was awarded a scholarship which enabled him to finish his studies with Charles Loeffler.

After leaving the Conservatory, Mr. Gerhardt played in a number of orchestras around the country. Chamber groups, symphony orchestras, theaters, he played with them all—all but the circus, he says.

During the war he joined the navy and spent his time on convoy duty in the North Sea. When he returned to the United States he joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra and has been a member ever since.

GASTON DUFRESNE

Gaston Dufresne was born in Lille, France, in 1898. He began to study solfeggion in theory at the Conservatory of Music in Lille when he was nine years old. The next year he began studying the cornet, a study which he continued for the next 12 years. When he was 16 he added the double bass to his studies and after finishing at the Conservatory in Lille he went to the Paris Conservatory. In Paris he continued his study of the double bass for four years and in 1923 he joined the Concerts Colonne, then under the direction of Gabriel Pierne.

He also played in the Concerts Koussevitsky and it was here that the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra heard him and asked him to come to America to take a seat with the Boston group.

Besides his work with the Symphony, Mr. Dufresne is interested in the Society of Instruments. This group of five men play the ancient instruments such as the harpsicord, viola de Gamba, dessus de viole and the bass vioie.

JOHN BARWICKI

Mr. Barwicki is the youngest member of the bass section of the orchestra. He was born in South Boston 29 years ago and at an early age was induced by his father, who was a violinist, to study the piano.

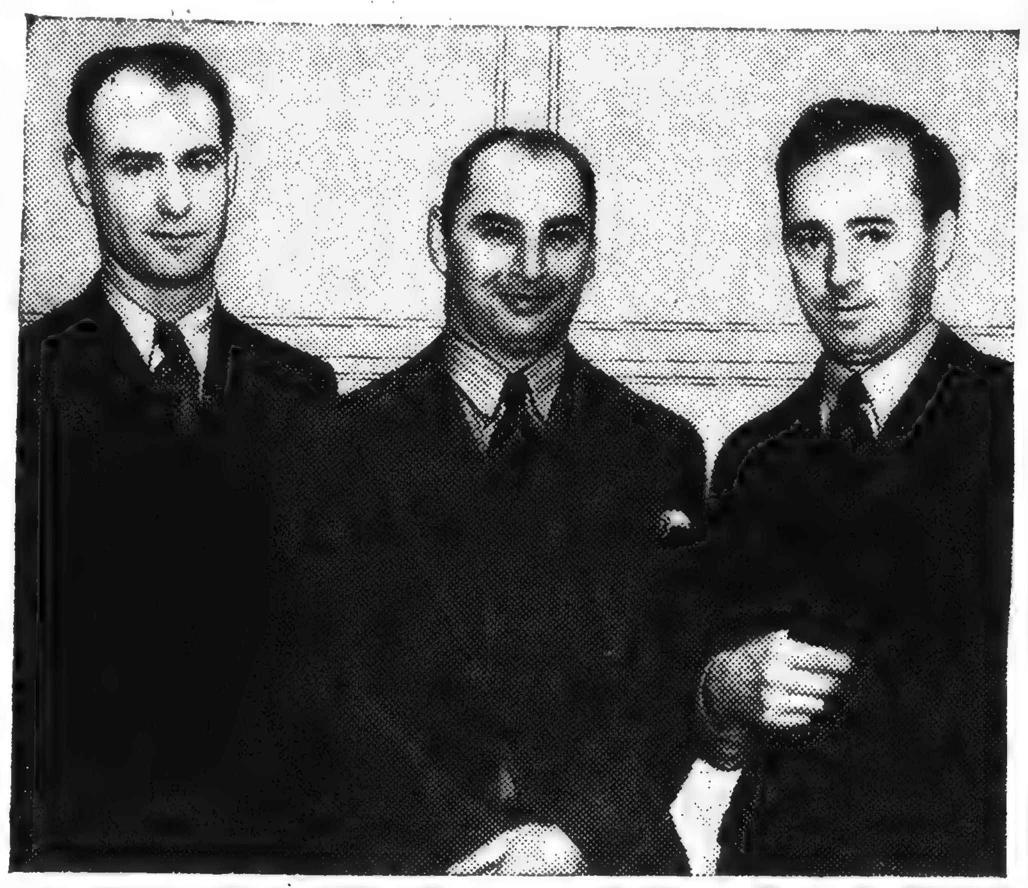
When he entered South Boston High School he played with the school orchestra and with the glee club. The late Samuel F. Tower, then headmaster and conductor of the orchestra, decided to make use of a bass viol which the school possessed but had not used for a number of years. After much persuasion John agreed to join the double bass classes which were then being started at the Memorial High School by the Boston Public School Music Department.

After graduating from high school Mr. Barwicki entered the New England Conservatory of Music where he continued to study the double bass under the late Max O. Kunze, who for many years was first bass player with the Boston Symphony.

In the summer of 1929 he joined the Esplanade group of the Symphony Orchestra and has played with them since. During the next seven years he played with various chamber music groups, community symphony orchestras, light operas and did musical work for the radio.

In the 1936 Berkshire Music Festival he substituted with the orchestra and during the winter of the following season he was given a regular seat with the chestra.

MEN BEHIND MUSIC



Left to right: Alvin Ball, trumpet. Daniel Eisler, violin. Emil Kornsand, viola.

By PAUL CRANE

When his school teacher started to sing a song in E flat which was printed in the song book in D flat, 10-year-old Emil Kornsand sadly shook his head and asked her why she had changed the key. The amazed teacher experimented with the boy and found that he had perfect pitch.

Born in Colmar in Alsace-Lorraine 46 years ago Emil began to study music when he was five years old. His mother was a painter and the two of them studied together, the mother at her easel and the boy at his music stand.

When he finished school in Colmar, Emil entered the gymnasium in Karlsruhe. In 1911 he left Karlschule for Berlin and the Staate Hochschule fur Musik where he studied for the next two years. After graduating from the state music school he entered Sternsches Konservatorium and studied there for three years.

Following the completion of his studies he joined the Deutsches Opera House Orchestra in Berlin. He left that group to join the Staates Opera Orchestra and was with them for the next 13 years. While in the latter orchestra he played under Richard Strauss and Dr. Karl Muck.

Mr. Kornsand came to the United States in July of 1938 and joined the National Broadcasting Company's Symphony Orchestra. He stayed one season and in May of last year joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Ftstival.

In Germany he played the violin in the orchestra and the viola in string quartets. In this country the order is reversed. He plays the viola with the orchestra and the violin with Mr. Zimbler's string quartet.

Daniel Eisler was born in Poltava, Russia, in 1887. When he was quite young his mother recognized his musical talent and took him to the Moscow Conservatory of Music where the director, P. E. Safonoff, after listening to the boy awarded him a scholarship. In the Conservatory his studies were under the direction of Professor Grimaly, who is famous for the scales which he devised.

On his graduating from the Conservatory in 1910 he entered a competition for a place in the Grand Imperial Orchestra. There were 35 other outstanding musicians from all over Europe competing, but the young Eisler was successful. During this time he occasionally played with the orchestra which a young conductor by the name of Serge Koussevitzky had organized.

In 1925 Mr. Eisler left Russia for Mexico where he played with several symphonic groups and in various theater orchestras. He was not content there because the standard of music was not as high as it had been in Europe.

Hearing that Dr. Koussevitzky had become director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eisler decided to write to him and request that he be considered if there was an opening. An answer was immediate and within a short time Mr. Eisler was given a seat in the violin section of the orchestra.

His interest, outside of music, is painting, and during the several years passed he has collected a small but fine group of oils and water-colors.

Alvin Ball is a young man out of the West. He comes from the copper-mining town of Miami, Arizona, where he was born in 1909.

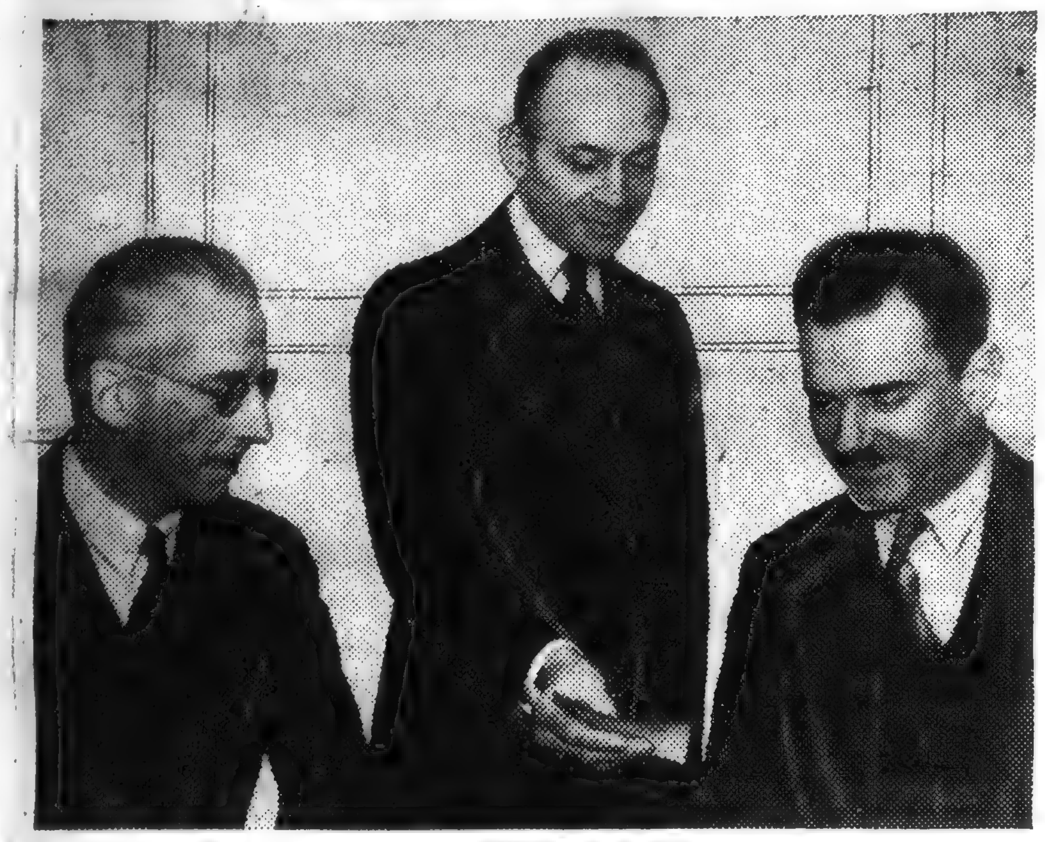
When he was in junior high school, the conductor of the school orchestra interested him in studying the trumpet. When his family came as far East as Pittsburgh, Kas., Alvin brought his trumpet along and played it with the high school orchestra in Pittsburgh. He entered the tri-State solo contest and won first prize two years in a row.

While he was still in school he met a conductor who was interested in his playing and gave him a place with an orchestra which was traveling around the country. Alvin traveled in the summer and went to school in the winter. He finally arrived in Boston in 1932 and entered the New England Conservatory of Music. At the same time he studied trumpet with Walter Smith.

In the spring of 1937 he joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the Pops season and he has been playing with them since.

63

MEN BEHIND MUSIC



Left to right: Paul Fedorovsky, violin; Paul Leveen, violin; Jean Cauhape, viola.

Mar 4

By PAUL CRANE

The Transcript is responsible for at least one member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Percy Paul Leveen was so encouraged by the favorable criticism Edward B. Hill accorded him for a concert which he gave at the New England Conservatory that the young music student decided to make music his career.

Born in Boston in 1893, Mr. Leveen began to study music when quite young and was considered a "child prodigy." He attended the elementary schools of Chelsea and the Boston English High School.

After graduating from high school Mr. Leveen entered the New England Conservatory of Music where for three years he was the winner of competitive scholarships. It was while he was attending the Conservatory that Mr. Hill's criticism of a solo appearance caused Mr. Leveen to decide on music as his profession

In 1914 he was studying at Prague in Czecho-Slovakia and in September of that year he was awarded the German Government Scholarship to the Hochschule in Charlottenburg. But the outbreak of hostilities in Europe made it impossible for him to accept the award and he returned to the United States. On his return to this country he joined the B. F. Keith circuit and appeared as soloist in many cities.

In 1918 Mr. Leveen joined the Symphony Orchestra here in Boston and has been with it ever since. During this time he has also held the position of director general of the Canadian Pacific Hotels, having charge of the music in all these hotels from coast to coast, during the summer season.

Mr. Leveen is also active behind the scene in the orchestra. He is at present secretary of the executive committee of the orchestra and director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund. This latter position is considered by the members of the orchestra to be the foremost honor within their power to bestow on a colleague.

Jean M. Cauhape

Jean Cauhape was born in Toulouse in 1902. At the age of nine he entered the Conservatory of Music at Toulouse to study the violin and solfeggio. While at the conservatory he was asked to play the viola for the chamber music which the conservatory orchestra played. At the end of eight years he graduated from the conservatory with first prize and was eligible to go to Paris to compete with other first prize winners from all over France for admission to the Paris Conservatory of Music. He was successful, and in 1921 he entered to study the viola. During his military service he was at the conservatory, so after he graduated he had only one year to serve.

Following his graduation from the conservatory, where he again won first prize, he played with various symphonic and chamber groups around Paris. And when Dr. Koussevitsky was in Paris he held a competition to choose a man for the viola section of the Boston Orchestra. Mr. Cauhape was the successful candidate.

Outside of his music Mr. Cauhape is interested in woodwork and although he has thought a lot about it he has not yet got up the courage to begin carving in wood.

Paul Fedorovsky

Paul Fedorovsky came to this country by the devious route of Vladivistok, China and Japan. He was born in Saratov in Russia and first attended music school there when he was ten years old. He studied violin until after his graduation from high school.

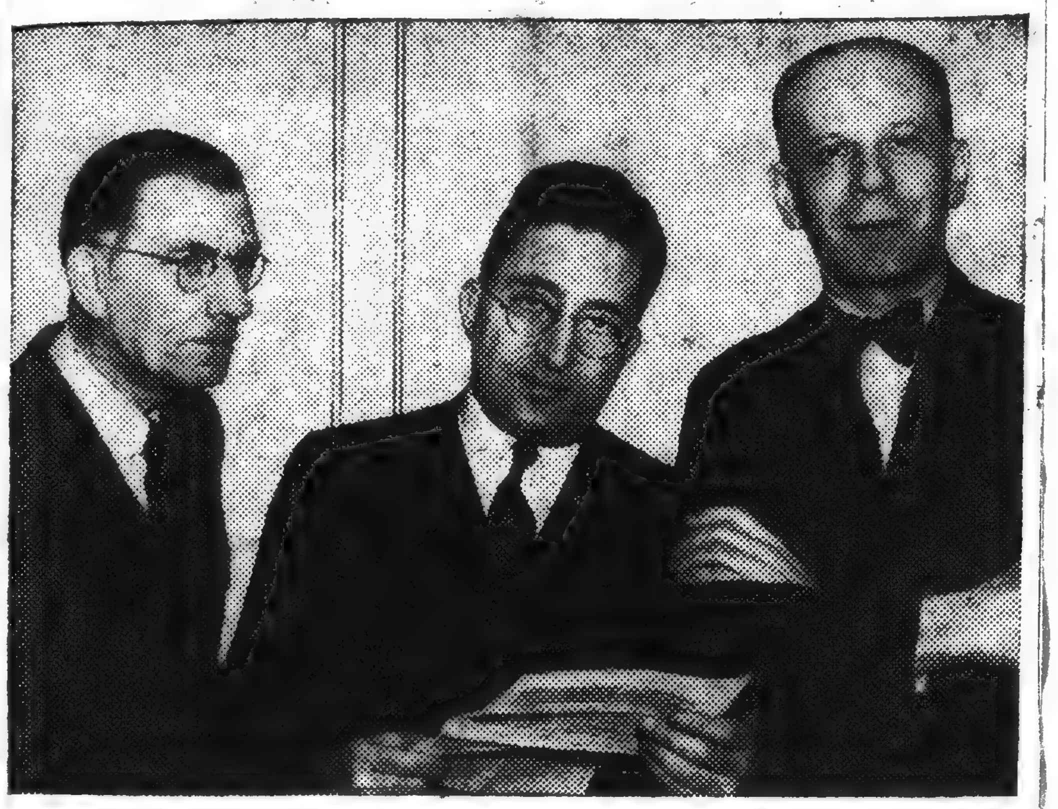
In 1907, at the age of seventeen, Mr. Fedorovsky left Russia and went to Zurich in Switzerland where he entered the Conservatory and the University. In 1909 he left Zurich for Vienna where he studied with Prof. Sevcik, then head of the Vienna Academy of Music. Several years later he returned to Russia but was exempted from military duty because of his position as a music teacher.

During the revolution Mr. Fedorovsky left Saratov and made his way to Vladivistok and then through China to Japan and on across the Pacific to the west coast of the United States.

In 1925 he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where he holds a seat as a violinist. He is a former member of the Boston String Quartet and is at present a member of the Ancient Instruments Group in which he plays the discant viol.

N EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, MARCH 11,

MEN BEHIND MUSIC



Left to right: Emil Droeghmans, 'cello. Saverio Messina, violin. Alois Vondrak, double bass.

By PAUL CRANE

Emil Josef Hippolyte Droeghmans was born in Liege of French parents. His mother was an excellent pianist and encouraged her son to study music. But more important in inspiring the boy was his uncle, the famous European violinist Martin Pierre Marsick, who persuaded Emil to study the 'cello.

At the age of 14 the boy became a member of the orchestra of "Le Theatre Royal de Liege" and later he joined the concerts Sylvain Dupuis where he played under the direction of Gustave Mahler. The boy received his first musical education at the Conservatory of Music in Liege and graduated from there with first prize.

From Liege he went to the Paris Conservatory and after three years he graduated at the age of 17 with another first prize. After finishing his studies he joined the Concerts Colonne and performed with them for 19 years. During this time he served under such world famous conductors and composers as Richard Strauss, Mosse, Weingartener, Nikisch and Mengelberg.

During these years he also appeared with many of the great orchestras of France as a soloist. Even to this day he recalls vividly a performance of Beethoven's Third Symphony which was performed in Paris in 1910 under the direction of Dr. Kousevitsky.

In 1927 he accepted with enthusiasm Dr. Koussevitsky's offer of a seat with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and he has remained with the orchestra ever since.

Saverio Messina was born in Boston in 1900. He began his study of the violin when he was 12 years old and for the next five or six years devoted all his time to perfecting himself in the playing of this instrument. All his studying was done in Boston and was under the direction of several teachers who are well known in this vicinity.

After he finished his studies Mr. Messina entered the ranks of the professionals by joining a theater orchestra in Boston. He moved from one theater to another and then tried hotels for a while. But with all his moves he had his eye on the ultimate goal at the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues.

In 1919 he was invited to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra and has played in the violin section of the orchestra ever since. He is also one of the members of the Esplanade group and plays with the Pops Orchestra.

Outside of music his greatest interest is languages and he spends much of his spare time reading in French, Spanish and German.

Mr. Vondrak is a very reticent gentlemen who plays the double bass. He was born in Vienna in 1888 and as a child he learned to play both the violin and the piano.

Mr. Vondrak entered the Academy of Music in Vienna to study the viola and somewhere along the line he was shunted into the classes for double-bass. But with his talent he quickly adapted himself to the larger instrument.

When he left the academy he was grabbed by the army to do the three years' duty expected of every youth in those countries which have universal conscription. He served his three years cheerfully, but then the war broke out and he had to serve four more—not so cheerfully.

He played with the Vienna State Opera and later with the Philharmonic Orchestra in the same city. In 1925 Dr. Koussevitzky heard him and asked him to come to America to join the Boston orchestra.

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

Left to right: Leon Marjollet, violincello. George Fourel, viola. Harry Dubbs, violin.

Mar 15

By PAUL CRANE

Leon Marjollet has been a member of the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1920. And according to his colleagues he is very happy about it—otherwise he would not come upstairs three steps at a time.

M. Marjollet was born in Chalons-sur-Marne in 1893. His mother was a singer and interested her son in the study of music to the extent that at the age of ten he began to study the 'cello in his home town. His studies were halted five years later on the death of his father and the removal of the family to Paris.

Young Leon went to work to help support the family but he continued to practice on his 'cello whenever he had a leisure moment. He began to take lessons and it was not long before one of his teachers recognized the boy's talent and advised him to pay more attention to his music. He was admitted as an auditor to the Paris Conservatory and studied under Professor Loeb and Professor Pessard.

In 1914 he was mobilized and served in the engineers until following a serious illness he was transferred to the G.H.Q. staff. When he was demobilized, in 1919, he returned to Paris and plunged into his music in an effort to forget the horrors of the Armageddon.

It was in Paris that he met Mr. Monteux who invited him to come to Boston to join the 'cello section of the Symphony Orchestra. That was in 1920. He has remained here since and is also a member of the Pops Orchestra and the Esplanade group.

George Fourel

George Fourel was born in Grenoble in 1892. At the age of 11 he was admitted to the Municipal Conservatory at Douai in northern France. The boy continued his studies at the Lycee, for his father thought that he was too young to devote himself exclusively to music.

After several years the boy's devotion to music as a career convinced his father that he should work more intensely on his musical studies. George was sent to Paris, where he studied the violin with Firmin Touche and Hayot. Later he continued his studies on the viola under LaForge and Vieux.

He entered the Paris Conservatory in 1911 and studied chamber music with Cherillard and followed the orchestra class of Vincent d'Indy. Two years later he won first prize in viola. In the meantime he had joined the National Opera House and Lamoureux concert orchestras.

Called for military duty in October, 1913, he joined the 79th Infantry Regiment on the eastern front at Nancy and served with it throughout the war. He was wounded at Verdun in 1916 and in Flanders in 1918. He received the war cross following Verdun.

After the war he auditioned in Paris for Dr. Walter Damrosch and was offered a place with the New York Symphony. He declined in favor of the Concerts Touche, a small group of 18 musicians who gave daily concerts of classical and chamber music at their small hall on the B. de Strassbourg. Later he joined Robert Rettly in organizing the Rettly String Quartet.

In the winter season of 1920-21 he went to Monte Carlo with Louis Gamme's small orchestra and in the following spring was offered a seat with the Boston Symphony by Mr. Monteux.

He joined the Boston Orchestra as first viola in 1921. But after several seasons he was forced by ill health to give up that position. However, he remained with the orchestra as a member of the viola section.

He is now a member of the newly formed Boston String Quartet and does some teaching at the New England Conservatory of Music.

Harry Dubbs

Mr. Dubbs is one of the younger members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was born in Boston in 1910 and at the early age of five began his study of the violin.

He studied with Timothy Adamowski and later while attending Malden High School he studied under Felix Winternitz. At the high school he was concert master and soloist with the orchestra.

After finishing his schooling he entered the field of professional music and played as concert violinist at the Ritz Carlton. He joined a chamber music ensemble which did radio work and later became a member of the Keith Theater orchestra.

In May, 1939, he auditioned for Dr. Koussevitzky and after a second audition in August of the same year he was given a seat in the violin section of the orchestra.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, MARCH 22.

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By PAUL CRANE

Huber A. Sauvlet was born in Rotterdam in Holland. He is descended from a long line of French musicians. Both his father and his mother were musicians and his paternal grandfather was the famed flutist, Antoine Sauvlet, who astonished the natives of northern Europe when he toured as co-soloist with Jennie Lind.

The violinist began the study of his instrument when he was six years old. At that time his father bought him a small violin and before the end of the year he had mastered the "Carnival of Venice" without the benefit of any formal instruction.

He entered the Conservatory of Music at Rotterdam where he studied music under the famed Professor Wolff. And again showed his genius by writing a concerto for violin at the age of fourteen.

ALFRED ZIGHERA, 'cello

Following his graduation from the Conservatory he was admitted at the age of 16 to the violin section of the Dutch Opera Company at Amsterdam. And while a member of this group he played the Paganini concerto at the regular Sunday afternoon concert of the group.

He left Rotterdam to join a symphonic group in the Hague, and followed that with a tour of Europe playing with various chamber groups and quartets.

In 1914 he came to the United States and joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra the same year.

Although he is a native of Czecho-Slovakia, Hans Werner spent his boyhood in Vienna where he began his musical education. He was one of the last pupils of Professor Gruen, the internationally famous teacher, who, by the way, also taught the famed former concert master of the Boston Orchestra, Franz Kneisel.

At the Vienna Conservatory of Music Mr. Werner studied violin, viola, and composition and graduated with a first prize.

In 1912 he joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was then under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. He joined as a violinist but later changed to the viola section.

In 1921 he left Boston to play with the Detroit Symphony under Gabrilovitch and later came east to play with the New York Symphony under Mengelberg. But after two seasons he returned to the Boston Orchestra and has been here since.

He is quite fond of chamber music and was formerly a member of the Keller Quartet and is now a member of the Boston Sinfonetta under Arthur Fiedler.

Alfred Zighera was born in Paris in 1898. He started studying the 'cello when he was eight and at the age of 16 he entered the Paris Conservatory. After six months he was awarded a first prize.

He became 'cellist with the Paris Opera, but left that group to join the army in 1917. During his service he was awarded the Croix-de-Guerre with two citations.

Following the war he became first 'cellist with the orchestra of the Champs Elysee Theater and later played with the Concerts de Conservatoire. While in Paris he founded the Zighera Quartet with his brother. He played the viola de gamba with the Violes and Clavecin group which toured throughout Europe.

He joined the Concerts Kousevitsky and was invited in 1925 to come to this country to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In Boston he founded the Boston Society of Current Instruments and the Boston Society of Early Music. The latter society which was founded in 1938, gives three concerts a year. Mr. Zighera is also a 'cellist with the Boston String Quartet.

Left to right: Huber A. Sauvlet, violin; Hans Werner, viola.

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

Left to right: Vladimir Rasnikoff, violin; Minot Beale, violin.

By PAUL CRANE

Vladimir Resinkoff is a member of the violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and has been since the season of 1932.

The slight, curly haired Mr. Resnikoff was born in Russia. In a city with the intriguing name of Nizhni Novgorod, Mr. Resnikoff began to study the violin quite young. It was quite natural for the boy to take to the violin for his mother was an excellent player.

After a preliminary musical education in his native land, Resnikoff was sent to the Meister school in Vienna. Here he studied under the internationally famous Belgian violinist and composer, Eugene Ysaye. On his graduation from the Meister School Resinkoff was awarded first prize. He then went on a concert tour of Europe.

In 1922 he came to America and was made the director of the violin department of the Eastman Conservatory of Music in Rochester, New York. During one of the Boston Orchestra's swings around the country they stopped at Rochester and Mr. Resnikoff was invited to play as soloist with them for the evening. His playing was noted by Doctor Koussevitzky and when an opening occured in 1932 Mr. Resnikoff was given a seat with the violin section of the orchestra.

Minot Beale

Mr. Beale is a New Englander, born in Rockland, Mass., in 1897. He began to study the violin when he was only six. After studying with the local teachers around Rockland for nine years he came to Boston. He was fifteen when he entered the New England Conservatory of Music.

At the Conservatory he studied under such well known teachers as Felix Winternitz and Timothee Adamowski. Mr. Beale was also made Concert Master of the Conservatory Orchestra while he was a student at the school. When he graduated and joined the faculty of the Conservatory he retained his position as concert master.

When Doctor Koussevitzky came to Boston his friends were anxious to show him the cultural development in the city and so they brought him to a concert played by the Conservatory Orchestra. It happened that the works played called for several violin solos and Mr. Beale performed. The doctor was so impressed with the young man's work that he asked him to join the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Beale is the organizer of Aeolians, a quartet consisting of a harp, violin, cello, and a flute. Because of the unusualness of the group Mr. Beale has to make all his own arrangements for the music which this group plays during its chamber concerts and recordings.

Clarence Knudson

American born Clarence Knudson is first second violin of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was born in Lynn of a Norweigan father and a Swedish mother.

He lived most of his life in Beverly and it was there that he took his first music lessons on the violin. It was no accident that he became a musician. His father was an amateur flutist and encouraged his son to take up music.

He came to Boston and entered the New England Conservatory of Music from which he graduated with honors. And then with one bound he found a position in the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1920.

He is now first member of the second violin section and in those symphonic works in which the first violins play against the seconds he leads his section with rare mastery.

He also plays at the Berkshire Festival and on such occasions he takes his wife and son along. They camp on the edge of Lake Mackeenac which borders on the Tanglewood Estate where the concerts are played.

MEN BEHIND MUSIC

By Paul Crane

JESUS MARIA SANROMA, PIANO

The dashing, witty Jesus Maria Sanroma is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's most popular figure. He is popular not only with the public but with his colleagues in the orchestra as well.

Mr. Sanroma was born on the American possession of Puerto Rico, the son of Spanish colonizers. He was sent to this country in 1917 by the Puerto Rican Government to study at the New England Conservatory of Music. He studied with the celebrated Polish concert pianist, Madame Annette Szumowska-Adamowska.

His performances with the Pops Orchestra and particularly his presentation of the works of the ultra - modern composers have made him a popular figure to Boston audiences.

On a concert tour of Europe some yars ago, Mr. Sanroma decided to experiment with the tastes of audiences and see if they really understood the works of the moderns or if they were merely being polite when they applauded.

In London he played some Schoenburg sketches, pieces which require only about four minutes to play. After finishing the piece he remained seated at the piano. The applause broke out all over the house and continued until the artist arose and acknowledged it. This convinced him that English audiences understood and appreciated this music. In France the same experiment was tried with the same success. But in Spain a woman was heard to say in a loud voice: "How horrible."

While he was finishing his studies here in Boston he was an extra percussion man with the Symphony Orchestra. The result was that even now, when the coast is clear, he will slip up to the left-hand corner of the stage and amuse himself with Mr. Sternberg's instruments

Although most of his appearances on the concert platform are made in a very serious mood he did break down at the "Gay Nineties Night" of the Pops several years ago. Appearing on the stage dressed as a dude of the period, he sat down to the piano and without removing his white gloves gave a rendition of "Hearts and Flowers" with all the gestures and fluttering motions at his command.

His gay wit is always present behind the scenes and particularly on the long trips that the orchestra takes. He has his own quiz program on these trips.

Wandering through the train he hums or whistles themes from various scores and challenges his traveling colleagues to identify the works from which they come.

His subtle persuasion with an audience was noted one night at the Pops after he had played the "Rhapsody" of Gershwin. The audience demanded an encore, and got it. Then they called him back to the stage several times for curtain calls. Despite the presence of Mr. Fiedler on the podium the applause continued unabated. On his fourth trip to the center of the stage Mr. Sanroma bowed to the audience and then very gently drew the cover over the keys of the piano. The effect was startling. The audience which had been thundering applause became absolutely quiet and the concert continued.

In spite of his readiness to joke he is intuitive about the most profound phases of artistic thought. And what is more he can play the cold, calculating music of the abstract moderns with an exciting fervor and understanding.

56

$12,000 Organ to Be Built for Boston Symphony Orchestra

M 2

A fine organ has been presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for use in the Berkshires. The gift has been made posible, it is announced, by a fund of $12,000 granted by the Carnegie Corporation of New York. The organ will be built from the design of G. Donald Harrison, and will be installed in time for use in the first session of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August.

May 2

Symphony Gets Baroque Organ

Trans

$12,000 Gift Aids Berkshire Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today the receipt of a gift of $12,000 from the Carnegie Corporation of New York for a baroque organ for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

The baroque organ, designed to duplicate the qualities of the instrument used by the composer, Johann Sebastian Bach, will be installed in the music shed at Tanglewood, Stockbridge, where it will be first heard by the public in a performance of the Bach B-Minor Mass this summer.

Before that the organ will be used in courses at the new Music Center, established by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for advanced study.

The organ has been designed by G. Donald Harrison, president of the Aeolian-Skinner Company, Boston, manufacturers of the organ at the Harvard Germanic Museum.

Gift of Organ To Orchestra In Berkshires

Monitor May 2

To the strains of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be added the tones of an organ this summer at "Tanglewood," their Berkshire Festival home, for the Carnegie Corporation of New York has just granted $12,000 for the purchase of a new organ, it was announced by Orchestra officials today. The new instrument will be installed in the shed in time for the first sessions of the Festival, to be held this year from Aug. 1 to 18.

The specifications of the new instrument have been decided upon in consultation with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, E. Power Biggs, who is to be the organist for the Festival, and Dr. Archibald T. Davison. The organ will be built by the Aeolian-Skinner Organ Company, from the design of G. Donald Harrison, the company's president. The placing of the new organ will be under the direction of Prof. Richard D. Fay, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the acoustical authority who is responsible for the sound properties of the shed. It will be concealed above the stage.

The organ will be of the type that was used by Johann Sebastian Bach, but will possess modern improvements enabling it to produce a fullness and brilliance suited to the size of the shed. The dynamic range will be noticeably increased and the range of pitch extended.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL
MAY 2 - 1940

Benefit Pops Concert Will Be Staged May 12

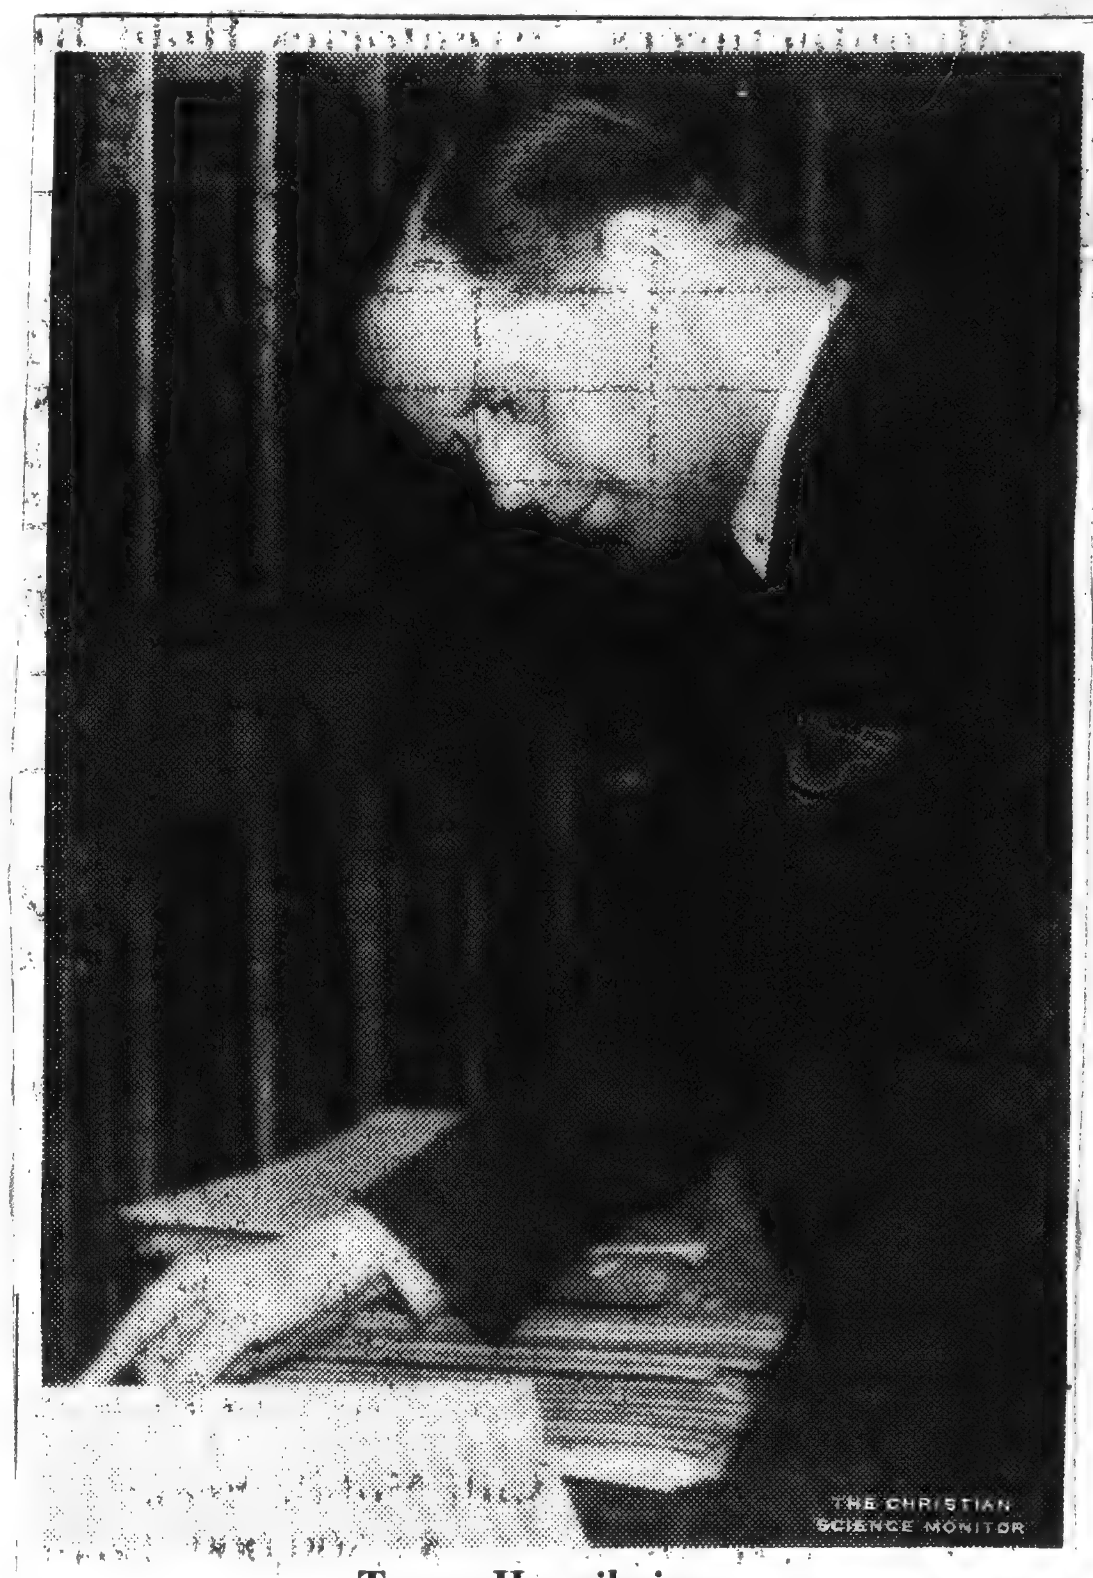
Many Fitchburg residents are planning to attend the special symphonic concert to honor and aid Finland scheduled for May 12 at 8.30 p. m. in Symphony hall, Boston. The concert, one of the most important musical events of the season, will be conducted by Tauno Hannikainen who will direct the full Boston Pops orchestra of 93 members. Proceeds from the affair will be devoted to Finnish relief and reconstruction.

Mr. Hannikainen came to this country on the invitation of Serge Koussevitzky early in January. Since then he has twice conducted the Boston symphony orchestra in Symphony hall and twice in New York city. Mr. Hannikainen is the regular conductor of the Helsinki and Turku symphony orchestras and of the Finnish National opera. He is a close friend of Jan Sibelius and will play several selections from the Finnish composer at the concert.

Mrs. Aimo Ahola of 346 Elm street is on the general arrangements committee for the concert. Mr. and Mrs. Douglas Crocker of Nichols street are among the sponsors. Tickets may be secured

---

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, MAY 2, 1940



Tauno Hannikainen

Will direct a Boston Symphony Pop Concert on May 12 for the benefit of Finnish relief

---

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE

May-Time Flowers

Helping open the second annual May festival this morning was Angela Bradanes with Courtright House's decorative flower cart. Proceeds of the festival, which this year includes shops, studios and schools on Brimmer, Byron, Chestnut, River, Lime and Mt. Vernon sts., will be given to the Esplanade Concert fund.

It's May Time in Old Boston

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

By a Staff Photographer

Beacon Hill Has Its Annual Festival

Throngs gather for open-house day among the various shops where the arts and crafts prevail. In the above picture Angela Bradanese, flower girl, has it right from the horse's mouth that it's carnival time, as the animal takes a May basket in his mouth in front of the Old English Galleries on Chestnut Street. A part of the proceeds of the two-day event goes to the fund for the Esplanade concerts.

Beacon Hill opens May Day Festival with picture: Page 13.

On the Hill They Go a-Maying

Transcript

(Transcript Photos—Turner)

All are neighbors on Beacon Hill today and tomorrow during the May Festival which will help raise funds for the Esplanade Concerts. The merry-go-round horse, with George Hodges, Jr., up, grins at a basket of posies from his hitching post on "Horse" Chestnut street. The strolling troubadours are Pietro Mordelia and his daughter, Flora. Below, Esther M. Rubin (left) puts her flowers in an 1832 copper salt box; Marcia Johnson arranges a period bouquet in Rudolph P. Pauly's early 19th century iron urn, as Susan and Sally Inman look on admiringly.

FLOWER GIRL at the May festival on Beacon Hill yesterday was Miss Angela Bradanese.

Herald May 3

May Festival on Beacon Hill Benefits New Esplanade Shell

The second annual May festival of Beacon Hill residents for the benefit of the new Esplanade concert shell was forced indoors by rain yesterday, but the singing and dancing and other gay events lost little of their color in the gymnasium of the Brimmer and May School. Several hundred attended.

There were three groups of dancers. Students of the Brimmer and May School, under the direction of Miss Priscilla Goodman, did an early American dance, a May pole dance and a Tarantella.

A flower stick dance and a gavotte were done by students from Emerson College under the direction of Miss Elsie Riddell.

Country dances and jigs were staged by members of the English Folk Dance and Song Society under the direction of Miss Louise B. Chapin. The dances included the Circassian Circle, the Morpeth Rant, the Molly Oxford, the Pipers Fancy, the Newcastle, the Step Stately and the Argeers.

Shops throughout the area hung out May baskets of flowers and had special exhibits and demonstrations in celebration of the festivities.

The program will continue today. Street dancing is scheduled for 2:30 P. M. and an assembly of children of the Beaver School will be held at 10:30 A. M.

Society Debs Give May Dances for Concert Fund

Post May 3

ENGLISH COUNTY DANCERS

These dancers are shown doing the "Groburne Proffesinal," an old English folk dance, at 69 Brimmer street. Left to right, Mrs. Robert Wilkes, Miss Louise Chapin, Morris Mynard and Robert Wilmes.

Braving a heavy drizzle of rain, bareheaded Boston debs sold flowers as they strolled through gaily decorated streets bordering the Charles River Esplanade yesterday afternoon, but the programme of May dances planned originally for the out-of-doors had to be held under cover at the Brimmer and May School, Inc., at 69 Brimmer street.

The proceeds of this second annual May festival, which will be continued today, together with a percentage of sales from the shops, studios and schools on Brimmer, Byron, Chestnut, River, Lime and Mount Vernon streets will be turned over to the Esplanade Concerts' Fund.

Flowers for the festival were donated by shops and by private gardens on Beacon Hill.

Included in the flower girl group were: Rhoda Belknap, Nancy Delano, Clara Jackson, Dorothy Storer, Peggy Paine, Natalie North, Helen Pierce, Esther Merchant, Mrs. Winthrop Lane Brown, Jr., and Mrs. Robert S. Weeks, Jr.

Strolling accordionists gave a picturesque touch to the scene. A few of the traditional May dances given under the direction of Miss Priscilla Goodman of the Brimmer and May School, Inc., included the Taranetella, the Early American dance and the May Pole dance.

The Emerson College group presented the flower stick dance and the gavotte under the direction of Miss Elsie Riddell. The English Folk dance and Song Society, under the direction of Miss Louise B. Chapin, presented such old-timers as country dances and jig, the processional dance, the Circassian Circle, the Morpeth Rant, the Molly Oxford, the Pipers Fancy, the Newcastle, Step Stately, Argeers and the Processional Off.

The general committee in charge of the programme was directed by Mrs. Dorothy B. Barbour, chairman. Assisting her were: Miss M. Lillian Link, Mrs. Roger C. Merrill, Mrs. William Power and Mrs. Malcolm Derry.

The programme will begin at 11 o'clock today with the May Day assembly of the children of the Beaver School. The street dancing will begin at 2:30.

Beacon Hill Opens May Day Festival

C.S.M. May 2

By Josephine Ripley

Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

In gay salute to spring, to the merry month of May, and to everybody in general, the May Day Festival on Beacon Hill defied gray skies and radiated an open-house hospitality that made sunshine of its own, as the annual two-day carnival got off to a spirited start this morning.

May baskets, bright with jonquils, tulips, and all the brilliance of a spring garden, hung on the door of each shop participating in the open-house festival. Strolling minstrels put music to the words of welcome that drifted from shop to shop through the narrow streets on the river side of Beacon Hill. Flower girls in costume sold bouquets from a gay Corsican flower cart, and the streets were cleared for the folk dancing.

The carnival is not being held on the Hill itself, but on the river side of Charles Street, including Brimmer, Byron, Chestnut, Lime, Mt. Vernon, and River Streets.

Proceeds of the festival and a percentage of sales of all shops participating will be given to the Esplanade Concerts Fund.

True to Beacon Hill tradition, open house means just that and the May basket was a genuine invitation to come in. Silversmiths put on a real show for the visitor, demonstrating all the processes of silver-making and hammering out shining spoons beneath the very noses of the onlookers.

Potters, too, extended a cordial welcome at the Pottery Workshop on Chestnut Street, shaping smooth, symmetrical vases and bowls out of pudgy lumps of clay. A number of private schools in the vicinity were alive with youthful activity as preparations for special entertainments, both inside and out, got under way.

The Brimmer and May School made ready for folk dancing in the street at 2:30 p. m. under the direction of Miss Priscilla Goodman. A group from Emerson College, under the direction of Miss Elsie Riddell, wriggled into their costumes for street dancing an hour later, while the program of the English Folk Dance and Song Society included country dances and jigs. The Bishop-Lee School prepared for an evening entertainment at its own stage.

It was carnival time in real Beacon Hill spirit, and Mrs. Dorothy Barbour, who originated the idea last year and who is chairman of this year's affair, sallied forth bright and early for calls on all of her open house neighbors.

"The idea," she explained, "is to get people acquainted with the neighborhood and the activities here, as well as to help us all to become better acquainted with each other.

"Of course, in doing anything of this kind," she continued, "one wants to make it a worth while undertaking, and since the Esplanade Concerts are a neighborhood interest, we decided to give a percentage of our sales on these two days to help the concert fund."

Assisting Mrs. Barbour as chairman are Miss Lillian Link, Miss Mary C. Hardy, Mrs. Roger Merrill, Mrs. William Power and Mrs. Malcolm C. Derry.

Beacon Hill Makes Way ay-Time Festivities

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

By a Staff Photographer

Scenes at Opening of Annuaand Open House

Left, Flora and Pietro Mordelia greet Beacon Hill visitors with accordion music, at the sign of the May basket by the shop of Mrs. Dorothy B. Barbour. ay ahead of the old-fashioned "welcome" mat, as she e "come-in" bouquet in front of the Bishop-Lee School treet, preparatory to this evening's dramatics which will d there.

Right, Dorothy Holman of Melrose thinks that a May basket at the

---

GLOBE—FRIDAY, MAY 3, 1940

Rain Fails to Halt May Festival on Beacon Hill

Flower Girls, Dancers Perform for Benefit of Esplanade Shell

Despite intermittent rainfall the second annual two-day May festival, a typical English fete being staged by the residents of Beacon Hill for the benefit of the new Esplanade Concert Shell, got under way yesterday with several hundred visitors circulating through the shops, studios and schools bounded by Beacon, Brimmer, Mt. Vernon and Charles sts.

The spirit of the festival prevailed all through the afternoon as flower girls, mainly debutants of the current season, vended their colorful wares in streets where baskets of flowers in various receptacles hung from the shop doorways and added to the gayety of the scene.

The main disappointment came when the street dancers were forced to perform in the Brimmer and May School gymnasium, but it is hoped they will be able to repeat their performances in the streets today. The first group of dances, was presented by 75 gayly costumed girls, ranging in age from 10 to 17 years, from the school, under the direction of Miss Priscilla Goodman. Mrs. Stedman Snow was in charge of the modern dances on this program. A group of 10 colorfully garbed girls from Emerson College, under the direction of Prof. Elsie Riddell, then sang and tripped a gay gavotte and a flower stick dance. The program closed with six adult couples from the English Folk Dance and Song Society contributing various songs and dance steps under the direction of Louise Chaplin. Music was furnished by the Strolling Mordelias, Flora and her father, Pietro, of Revere, accordionists.

The debutante flower girls, under the direction of Mrs. Francis G. Jackson, included Rhoda Belknap, Nancy Delano, Clara Jackson, Dorothy Storer, Peggy Paine, Natalie North, Helen Pierce and Esther Merchant. Post "debs," Mrs. Winthrop Lane Brown Jr. and Mrs. Robert S. Weeks Jr. Mrs. Howard M. North was in charge of the flowers.

The Emerson girls were Geraldine Ledwith and Pearl Winick, Hartford, Conn.; Ruth Gray, Cambridge; Anne Franklin, Methuen; Marie Surbeck, Haworth, N. J.; Betty Moore, Needham; Eleanor Levy, Brookline; Barbara Levine, Newton Centre; Virginia Richardson, Raleigh, N. C., and Dorieann Wait, Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

Tomorrow afternoon at 2 Gov. Saltonstall is expected to make a tour of the district.

Mrs. Dorothy Barbour, chairman of arrangements, is being assisted by Miss Lillian Link, Miss Mary Hardy, Mrs. Roger Merrill, Mrs. William Power and Mrs. Malcolm Derry.

Emerson Girls Dance in Beacon Hill May Festival

THEY PERFORMED AT BRIMMER AND MAY SCHOOL GYM

Left to Right—Geraldine Ledwith, Anne Franklin, Barbara Levine, Dorieann Wail, Ruth Gray, Pearl Winick, Virginia Richardson, Betty Moore, Eleanor Levy and Marie Surbeck.

REDUCTION
RATIO
16x

2.5 mm

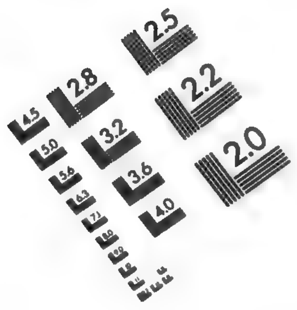
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

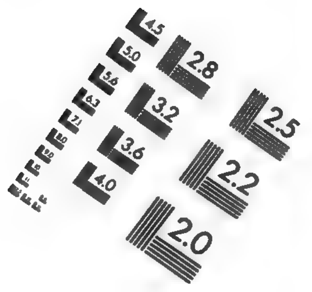
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

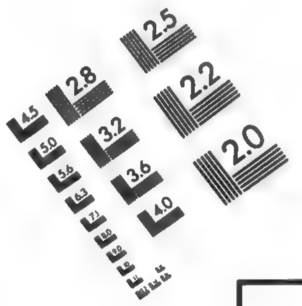


2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6

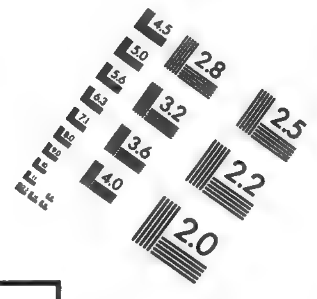


4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

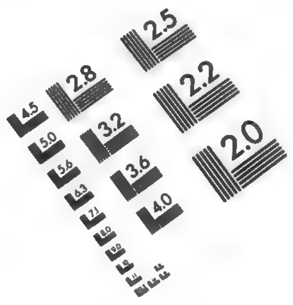
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



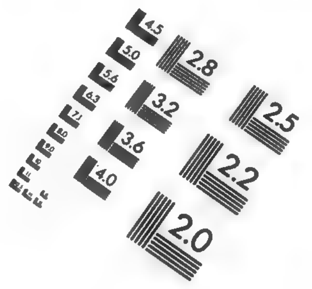
2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0



4.5
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0

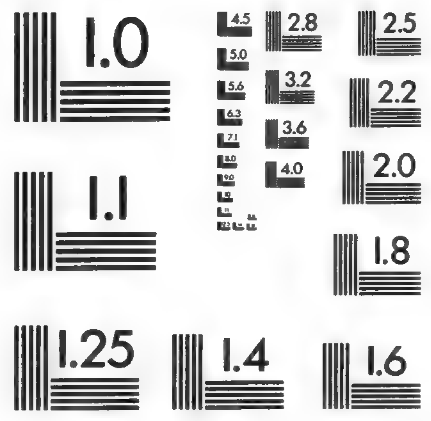


4.5
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

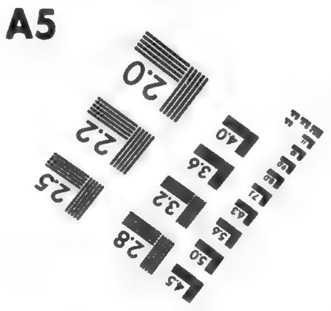
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

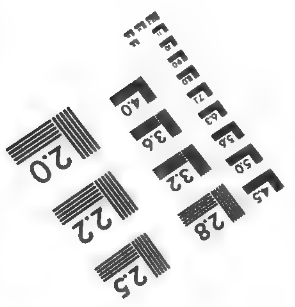
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

A5



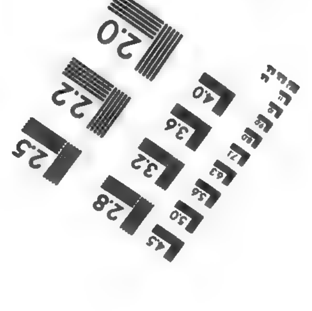
2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5



2.0
4.0
3.6
2.2
3.2
2.8
2.5

A4

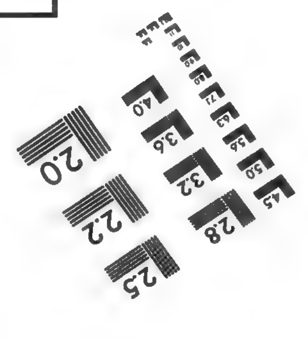
A3



2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

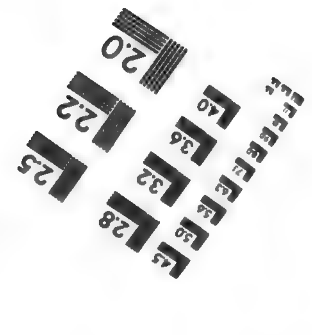
Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



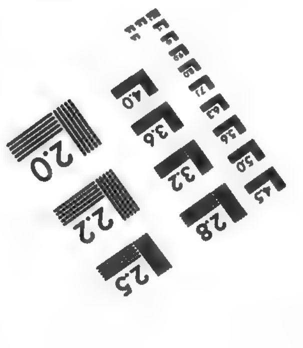
4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm



2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5



4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

I album

BERKSHIRE SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL

at "TANGLEWOOD"
(Between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Nine Concerts on Thurs. and Sat. Eves., and Sunday Afternoons

Series A: August 1, 3, 4

The First Symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann and Sibelius.

The C major Symphony of Schubert, the Second Symphony of Brahms, and the Third of Roy Harris

Other works include Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony and Stravinsky's "Capprieeio" (Soloist, J. M. Sanroma).

Series B: August 8, 10, 11

(Celebrating the 100th Anniversary of Tchaikovsky's birth)

The Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Symphonies.

The Violin Concerto (Soloist, Albert Spalding).

Other works to be announced.

Artur Rodzinski will conduct one of the three programmes.

Series C: August 15, 17, 18

The Third Symphony of Beethoven, the First of Brahms, and a Symphony of Haydn.

Other works include Wagner excerpts, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," arias by Dorothy Maynor and Bach's Mass in B minor with the Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center.

For Tickets Apply To
BERKSHIRE SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL
Stockbridge, Mass.

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Director
G. Wallace Woodworth, Assistant Director

JULY 8 - AUGUST 18, at "TANGLEWOOD"

The Berkshire Music Center will consist of an Institute for Advanced Study, with an orchestra and classes in conducting, composition, opera dramatics; and an Academy having no formal entrance requirements, with general sessions of singing, playing, lectures and concerts, and special classes in choral conducting and music in the schools. Enrollment will carry the privilege of attendance at Festival rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the nine concerts (August 1-18).

A catalogue for the Berkshire Music Center will be sent on application to Symphony Hall, Boston

---

The Up-Beat for Wednesday's Concert

Arthur Fiedler, as he will appear at Wednesday night's opening of the 'Pop" Concert season in Symphony Hall—a candid camera shot taken from the orchestra during actual performance.

59

THE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, MAY 2, 1940 .... PAGE TWENTY-FIVE

Symphony Artists Don Cap and Bells for 'Silly' Venture in Swing

'Gone with the Woodwinds' Is Parody on Dance Bands

Hilarious Performance at Modern Art Institute Benefits Music School

By ALISON ARNOLD

Boston's Symphony Orchestra turned silly last evening. At least a group of its leading members did. And Boston likes them that way, judging by the cheers and applause that rang out from the throng of distinguished Symphony-goers. All this took place in the galleries of the Institute of Modern Art, where the first floor show to be given by members of the Symphony Orchestra was held for the benefit of the South End Music School. "Gone with the Woodwinds" was the title of the show, and with their tongues in their cheeks, the self-styled "Silly Symphonists" provided an evening of rare entertainment.

"Dick" Burgin was master of ceremonies and turned tables on dance bands, which have been adapting the classics for their own use, by showing what Symphony men can do with swing. And what that is, is most remarkable. "Choo Choo" San Roma proved himself a veritable wizard of the keyboard, and the various popular tunes to which Boston has been dancing all winter were "swung" with such rhythm that it was with difficulty that the members of the audience kept their seats.

Those who attend the Symphony concerts each week can hardly picture Einar Hansen, sedate violinist, alternately strutting a spirited cake walk, appropriately equipped with a top-hat and cane, and draping himself in a Spanish shawl to execute a fandango. That is exactly what he did, however, and simply brought down the house with his antics. Nor could Symphony audiences imagine Ludwig Juht impersonating an elephant with his bass viol, while "Choo Choo" San Roma took the part of a mosquito with a piccolo, and "Ziggy" Zighera, the Harpo Marx of the Boston Symphony, played the piano. Marcel Lafosse played the trumpet with one hand and his own accompaniment with the other, and also on the program was a mysterious new singer, Chloe Woodwind from the Windward Islands.

The audience sat about the gallery at small tables, cabaret style, and refreshments were served during the entertainment. Enjoying the fun hugely was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, who was accompanied by Mrs. Koussevitzky, in a gown of flowered chiffon. Sitting with them were Mrs. Gorham Brooks, a member of the entertainment committee, her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Curtis Prout, and the latter's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Prout.

Seated at a table together were Mrs. Allan Forbes and her sister, Mrs. Daniel A de Menocal, and the latter's daughter, Miss Esmee de Menocal, and son, Richard A. de Menocal. Mrs Forbes was gowned in black chiffon and carried a striking black and silver fan, and Mrs. de Menocal topped with a silver fox cape her black gown with which she wore pearls and a sparkling diamond brooch. Miss Esmee wore a cotton frock fashioned of a quaint India print.

Down front were Mrs. George H. Monks and Mrs. Edward D. Brandegee, Mrs. Brandegee in black with a sable jacket. Mr and Mrs. Edward A. Taft applauded enthusiastically, Mrs. Taft wearing a bolero of glittering gold sequins with her black gown. Nearby were Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett Harwood, sequins glistening on the bodice of Mrs. Harwood's black frock. Sitting together were Mrs. William Stanley Parker and Miss Amelia Peabody.

In a flowered print with a tiny cluster of flowers in her hair was Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears. Mrs. Henry Kent White was escorted by Mr. White, and still others we glimpsed were Mr. George Foote, president of the South End Music School; Mrs. Henry McBurney Parker, Mrs. Wallace McI. Scudder, Mrs. William Ellery, Mr. and Mrs. James Jackson, Jr., Mrs. John T Bottomley and her daughter, Miss Ellen Bottomley; Mrs. Wilbur Higgins, Miss Nancy Putnam Smith Mrs. Cushing Carleton, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dreyfus and Mrs. Arthur Beale.

Pop Concerts Give Benefits

Next Wednesday night Symphony Hall will appear in its gay summer garb, with tables covering the floor at which refreshments will be served, and the Pop Concerts will open their 55th season. Arthur Fiedler, for the 11th consecutive season will preside as the Pops conductor over a full-sized orchestra of Symphony players.

The first Sunday concert, May 12, has been taken over for Finnish relief, and will have a notable Finnish guest conductor in Tauno Hannikainen. Monday, May 13, will bring an annual Harvard night, with numbers by the Harvard Glee Club.

The George Junior Republic will be benefitted by the Pop Concert of Thursday, May 9, at which Peggy Stuart, conductor of the Junior League Orchestra, will play the piano part in the premiere of her own work for piano and orchestra, "Smoke Drift." On May 15, Elizabeth Travis will play the Chopin F minor Concerto as part of the benefit for the New England Deaconess Hospital.

The Malkin Conservatory is to have a benefit night at the Pops on Monday evening, June 3. As a gesture to the centennial year of the birth of Tchaikovsky, director Joseph Malkin has arranged with Arthur Fiedler for the performance of the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto with Leon Tumarkin as soloist with the Pops orchestra. Mr. Tumarkin is a member of the Malkin Conservatory faculty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HUDSON, MASS
MAYNARD NEWS
5/3/40

CONCERT FOR FINLAND AID

Maynard Residents Interested in Benefit Affair At Symphony Hall

Maynard — Many residents of Maynard are planning to attend the special symphonic concert to honor and to aid Finland, one of the most important musical events of the season, which will be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday evening, May 12, at 8:30 o'clock. The concert will be conducted by Tauno Hannikainen, who will direct the full Boston Pops Orchestra of 93 members.

Mr. Hannikainen came to this country on the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky early in January. ~~Proving~~ that conductors as well as composers are bred on Finnish soil, he has demonstrated his thorough musicianship on at least four occasions since his arrival, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra twice in Symphony Hall and twice in New York. Everywhere the noted Finnish conductor has been enthusiastically received by audiences paying homage to a great artist as well as to an heroic nation.

A leading member of Finnish musical circles, Mr. Hannikainen is the regular conductor of the Helsinki and Turku Symphony Orchestras and of the Finnish National Opera. He is a close friend of Jan Sibelius and will play several selections from the Finnish composer at the concert on May 12. The program will be divided between Sibelius and Brahms as follows: Finlandia, Elegy from "King Chistian II" Suite, Night Ride and Sunrise (Symphonic Poem, Op. 55), and Scherzo and Finale from Symphony No. 2 in D major, all by Sibelius; and following intermission, Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68, by Brahms.

Rev. and Mrs. George Koponen of Maynard are among the distinguished list of sponsors for the May 12 concert. Miss Martha Koski and Miss Vieno Koski of Fairfield Street, and Miss Ellen Haapala of Chandler Street, Maynard, are among the attractive group of ushers who will be dressed in the bright costumes of Finland. Miss Martho Koski is in charge of concert arrangements in Maynard. Proceeds of the concert will be devoted to Finnish relief and reconstruction. Tickets may be secured in advance at the Box Office, Symphony Hall, Boston.

Harvard Alumni Bulletin
May 3

BERKSHIRE SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL

at "TANGLEWOOD"
(Between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Nine Concerts on Thurs. and Sat. Eves., and Sunday Afternoons

Series A: August 1, 3, 4

The First Symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann and Sibelius.

The C major Symphony of Schubert, the Second Symphony of Brahms, and the Third of Roy Harris.

Other works include Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony and Stravinsky's "Cappriccio" (Soloist, J. M. Sanroma).

Series B: August 8, 10, 11

(Celebrating the 100th Anniversary of Tchaikovsky's birth)

The Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Symphonies.

The Violin Concerto (Soloist, Albert Spalding).

Other works to be announced.

Artur Rodzinski will conduct one of the three programmes.

Series C: August 15, 17, 18

The Third Symphony of Beethoven, the First of Brahms, and a Symphony of Haydn.

Other works include Wagner excerpts, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," arias by Dorothy Maynor and Bach's Mass in B minor with the Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center.

For Tickets Apply To
BERKSHIRE SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL
Stockbridge, Mass.

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Director
G. Wallace Woodworth, Assistant Director

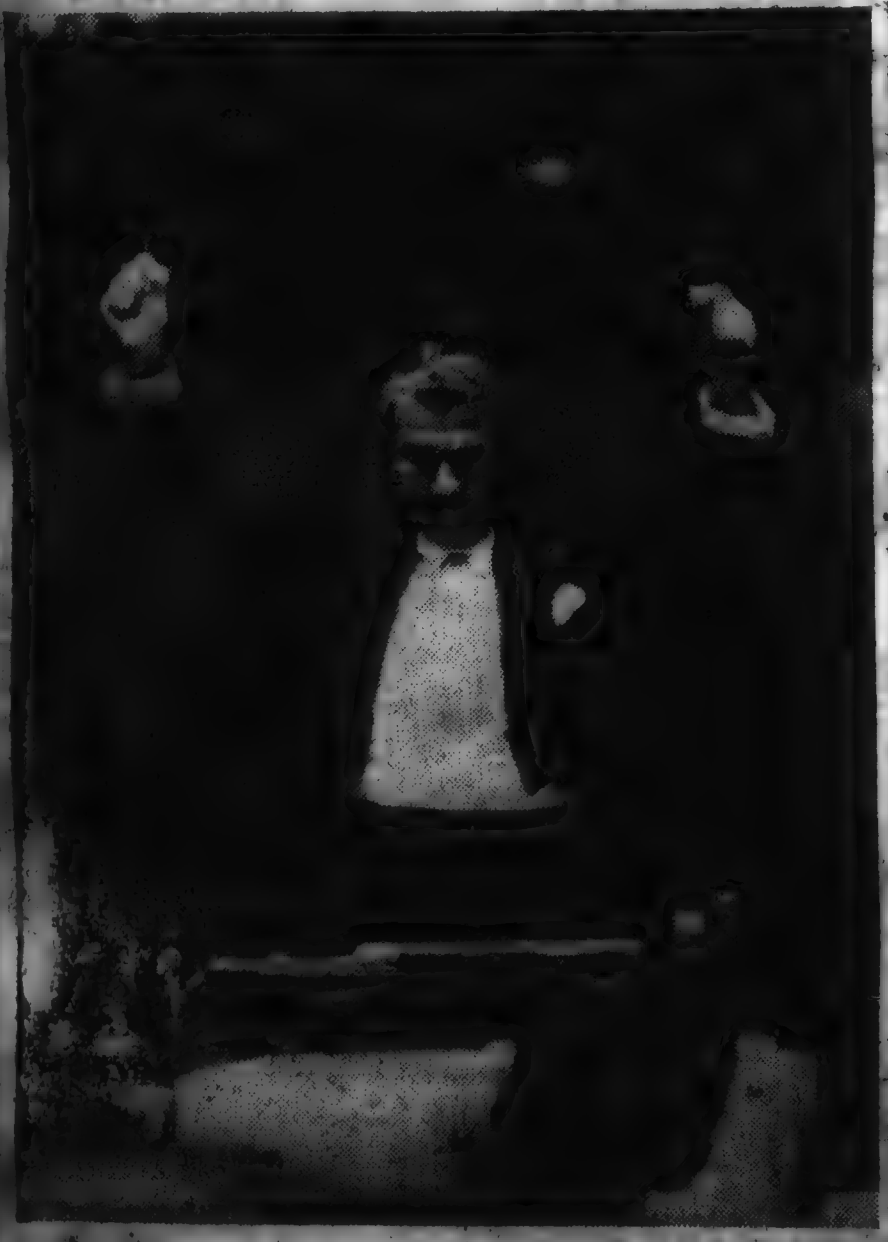
JULY 8 - AUGUST 18, at "TANGLEWOOD"

The Berkshire Music Center will consist of an Institute for Advanced Study, with an orchestra and classes in conducting, composition, opera dramatics; and an Academy having no formal entrance requirements, with general sessions of singing, playing, lectures and concerts, and special classes in choral conducting and music in the schools. Enrollment will carry the privilege of attendance at Festival rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the nine concerts (August 1-18).

A catalogue for the Berkshire Music Center will be sent on application to Symphony Hall, Boston

---

The Up-Beat for Wednesday's Concert



Arthur Fiedler, as he will appear at Wednesday night's opening of the "Pop" Concert season in Symphony Hall—a candid camera shot taken from the orchestra during actual performance.

59

THE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, MAY 2, 1940 PAGE TWENTY-FIVE

Symphony Artists Don Cap and Bells for 'Silly' Venture in Swing

'Gone with the Woodwinds' Is Parody on Dance Bands

Hilarious Performance at Modern Art Institute Benefits Music School

By ALISON ARNOLD

Boston's Symphony Orchestra turned silly last evening. At least a group of its leading members did. And Boston likes them that way, judging by the cheers and applause that rang out from the throng of distinguished Symphony-goers. All this took place in the galleries of the Institute of Modern Art, where the first floor show to be given by members of the Symphony Orchestra was held for the benefit of the South End Music School. "Gone with the Woodwinds" was the title of the show, and with their tongues in their cheeks, the self-styled "Silly Symphonists" provided an evening of rare entertainment.

"Dick" Burgin was master of ceremonies and turned tables on dance bands, which have been adapting the classics for their own use, by showing what Symphony men can do with swing. And what that is, is most remarkable. "Choo Choo" San Roma proved himself a veritable wizard of the keyboard, and the various popular tunes to which Boston has been dancing all winter were "swung" with such rhythm that it was with difficulty that the members of the audience kept their seats.

Those who attend the Symphony concerts each week can hardly picture Einar Hansen, sedate violinist, alternately strutting a spirited cake walk, appropriately equipped with a top-hat and cane, and draping himself in a Spanish shawl to execute a fandango. That is exactly what he did, however, and simply brought down the house with his antics. Nor could Symphony audiences imagine Ludwig Juht impersonating an elephant with his bass viol, while "Choo Choo" San Roma took the part of a mosquito with a piccolo, and "Ziggy" Zighera, the Harpo Marx of the Boston Symphony, played the piano. Marcel Lafosse played the trumpet with one hand and his own accompaniment with the other, and also on the program was a mysterious new singer, Chloe Woodwind from the Windward Islands.

The audience sat about the gallery at small tables, cabaret style, and refreshments were served during the entertainment. Enjoying the fun hugely was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, who was accompanied by Mrs. Koussevitzky, in a gown of flowered chiffon. Sitting with them were Mrs. Gorham Brooks, a member of the entertainment committee, her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Curtis Prout, and the latter's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Prout.

Seated at a table together were Mrs. Allan Forbes and her sister, Mrs. Daniel A de Menocal, and the latter's daughter, Miss Esmee de Menocal, and son, Richard A. de Menocal. Mrs. Forbes was gowned in black chiffon and carried a striking black and silver fan, and Mrs. de Menocal topped with a silver fox cape her black gown with which she wore pearls and a sparkling diamond brooch. Miss Esmee wore a cotton frock fashioned of a quaint India print.

Down front were Mrs. George H. Monks and Mrs. Edward D. Brandegee, Mrs. Brandegee in black with a sable jacket. Mr and Mrs. Edward A. Taft applauded enthusiastically, Mrs. Taft wearing a bolero of glittering gold sequins with her black gown. Nearby were Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett Harwood, sequins glistening on the bodice of Mrs. Harwood's black frock. Sitting together were Mrs. William Stanley Parker and Miss Amelia Peabody.

In a flowered print with a tiny cluster of flowers in her hair was Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears. Mrs. Henry Kent White was escorted by Mr. White, and still others we glimpsed were Mr. George Foote, president of the South End Music School; Mrs. Henry McBurney Parker, Mrs. Wallace McI. Scudder, Mrs. William Ellery, Mr. and Mrs. James Jackson, Jr., Mrs. John T Bottomley and her daughter, Miss Ellen Bottomley; Mrs. Wilbur Higgins, Miss Nancy Putnam Smith Mrs. Cushing Carleton, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dreyfus and Mrs. Arthur Beale.

Pop Concerts Give Benefits

Next Wednesday night Symphony Hall will appear in its gay summer garb, with tables covering the floor at which refreshments will be served, and the Pop Concerts will open their 55th season. Arthur Fiedler, for the 11th consecutive season will preside as the Pops conductor over a full-sized orchestra of Symphony players.

The first Sunday concert, May 12, has been taken over for Finnish relief, and will have a notable Finnish guest conductor in Tauno Hannikainen. Monday, May 13, will bring an annual Harvard night, with numbers by the Harvard Glee Club.

The George Junior Republic will be benefitted by the Pop Concert of Thursday, May 9, at which Peggy Stuart, conductor of the Junior League Orchestra, will play the piano part in the premiere of her own work for piano and orchestra, "Smoke Drift." On May 15, Elizabeth Travis will play the Chopin F minor Concerto as part of the benefit for the New England Deaconess Hospital.

The Malkin Conservatory is to have a benefit night at the Pops on Monday evening, June 3. As a gesture to the centennial year of the birth of Tchaikovsky, director Joseph Malkin has arranged with Arthur Fiedler for the performance of the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto with Leon Tumarkin as soloist with the Pops orchestra. Mr. Tumarkin is a member of the Malkin Conservatory faculty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HUDSON, MASS
MAYNARD NEWS
5/3/40

CONCERT FOR FINLAND AID

Maynard Residents Interested in Benefit Affair At Symphony Hall

Maynard — Many residents of Maynard are planning to attend the special symphonic concert to honor and to aid Finland, one of the most important musical events of the season, which will be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday evening, May 12, at 8:30 o'clock. The concert will be conducted by Tauno Hannikainen, who will direct the full Boston Pops Orchestra of 93 members.

Mr. Hannikainen came to this country on the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky early in January. ~~Proving~~ that conductors as well as composers are bred on Finnish soil, he has demonstrated his thorough musicianship on at least four occasions since his arrival, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra twice in Symphony Hall and twice in New York. Everywhere the noted Finnish conductor has been enthusiastically received by audiences paying homage to a great artist as well as to an heroic nation.

A leading member of Finnish musical circles, Mr. Hannikainen is the regular conductor of the Helsinki and Turku Symphony Orchestras and of the Finnish National Opera. He is a close friend of Jan Sibelius and will play several selections from the Finnish composer at the concert on May 12. The program will be divided between Sibelius and Brahms as follows: Finlandia, Elegy from "King Chistian II" Suite, Night Ride and Sunrise (Symphonic Poem, Op. 55), and Scherzo and Finale from Symphony No. 2 in D major, all by Sibelius; and following intermission, Symphony No. 1 in C Minor. Op. 68, by Brahms.

Rev. and Mrs. George Koponen of Maynard are amony the distinguished list of sponsors for the May 12 concert. Miss Martha Koski and Miss Vieno Koski of Fairfield Street, and Miss Ellen Haapala of Chandler Street, Maynard, are among the attractive group of ushers who will be dressed in the bright costumes of Finland. Miss Martho Koski is in charge of concert arrangements in Maynard. Proceeds of the concert will be devoted to Finnish relief and reconstruction. Tickets may be secured in advance at the Box Office, Symphony Hall, Boston.
)

REDUCTION RATIO
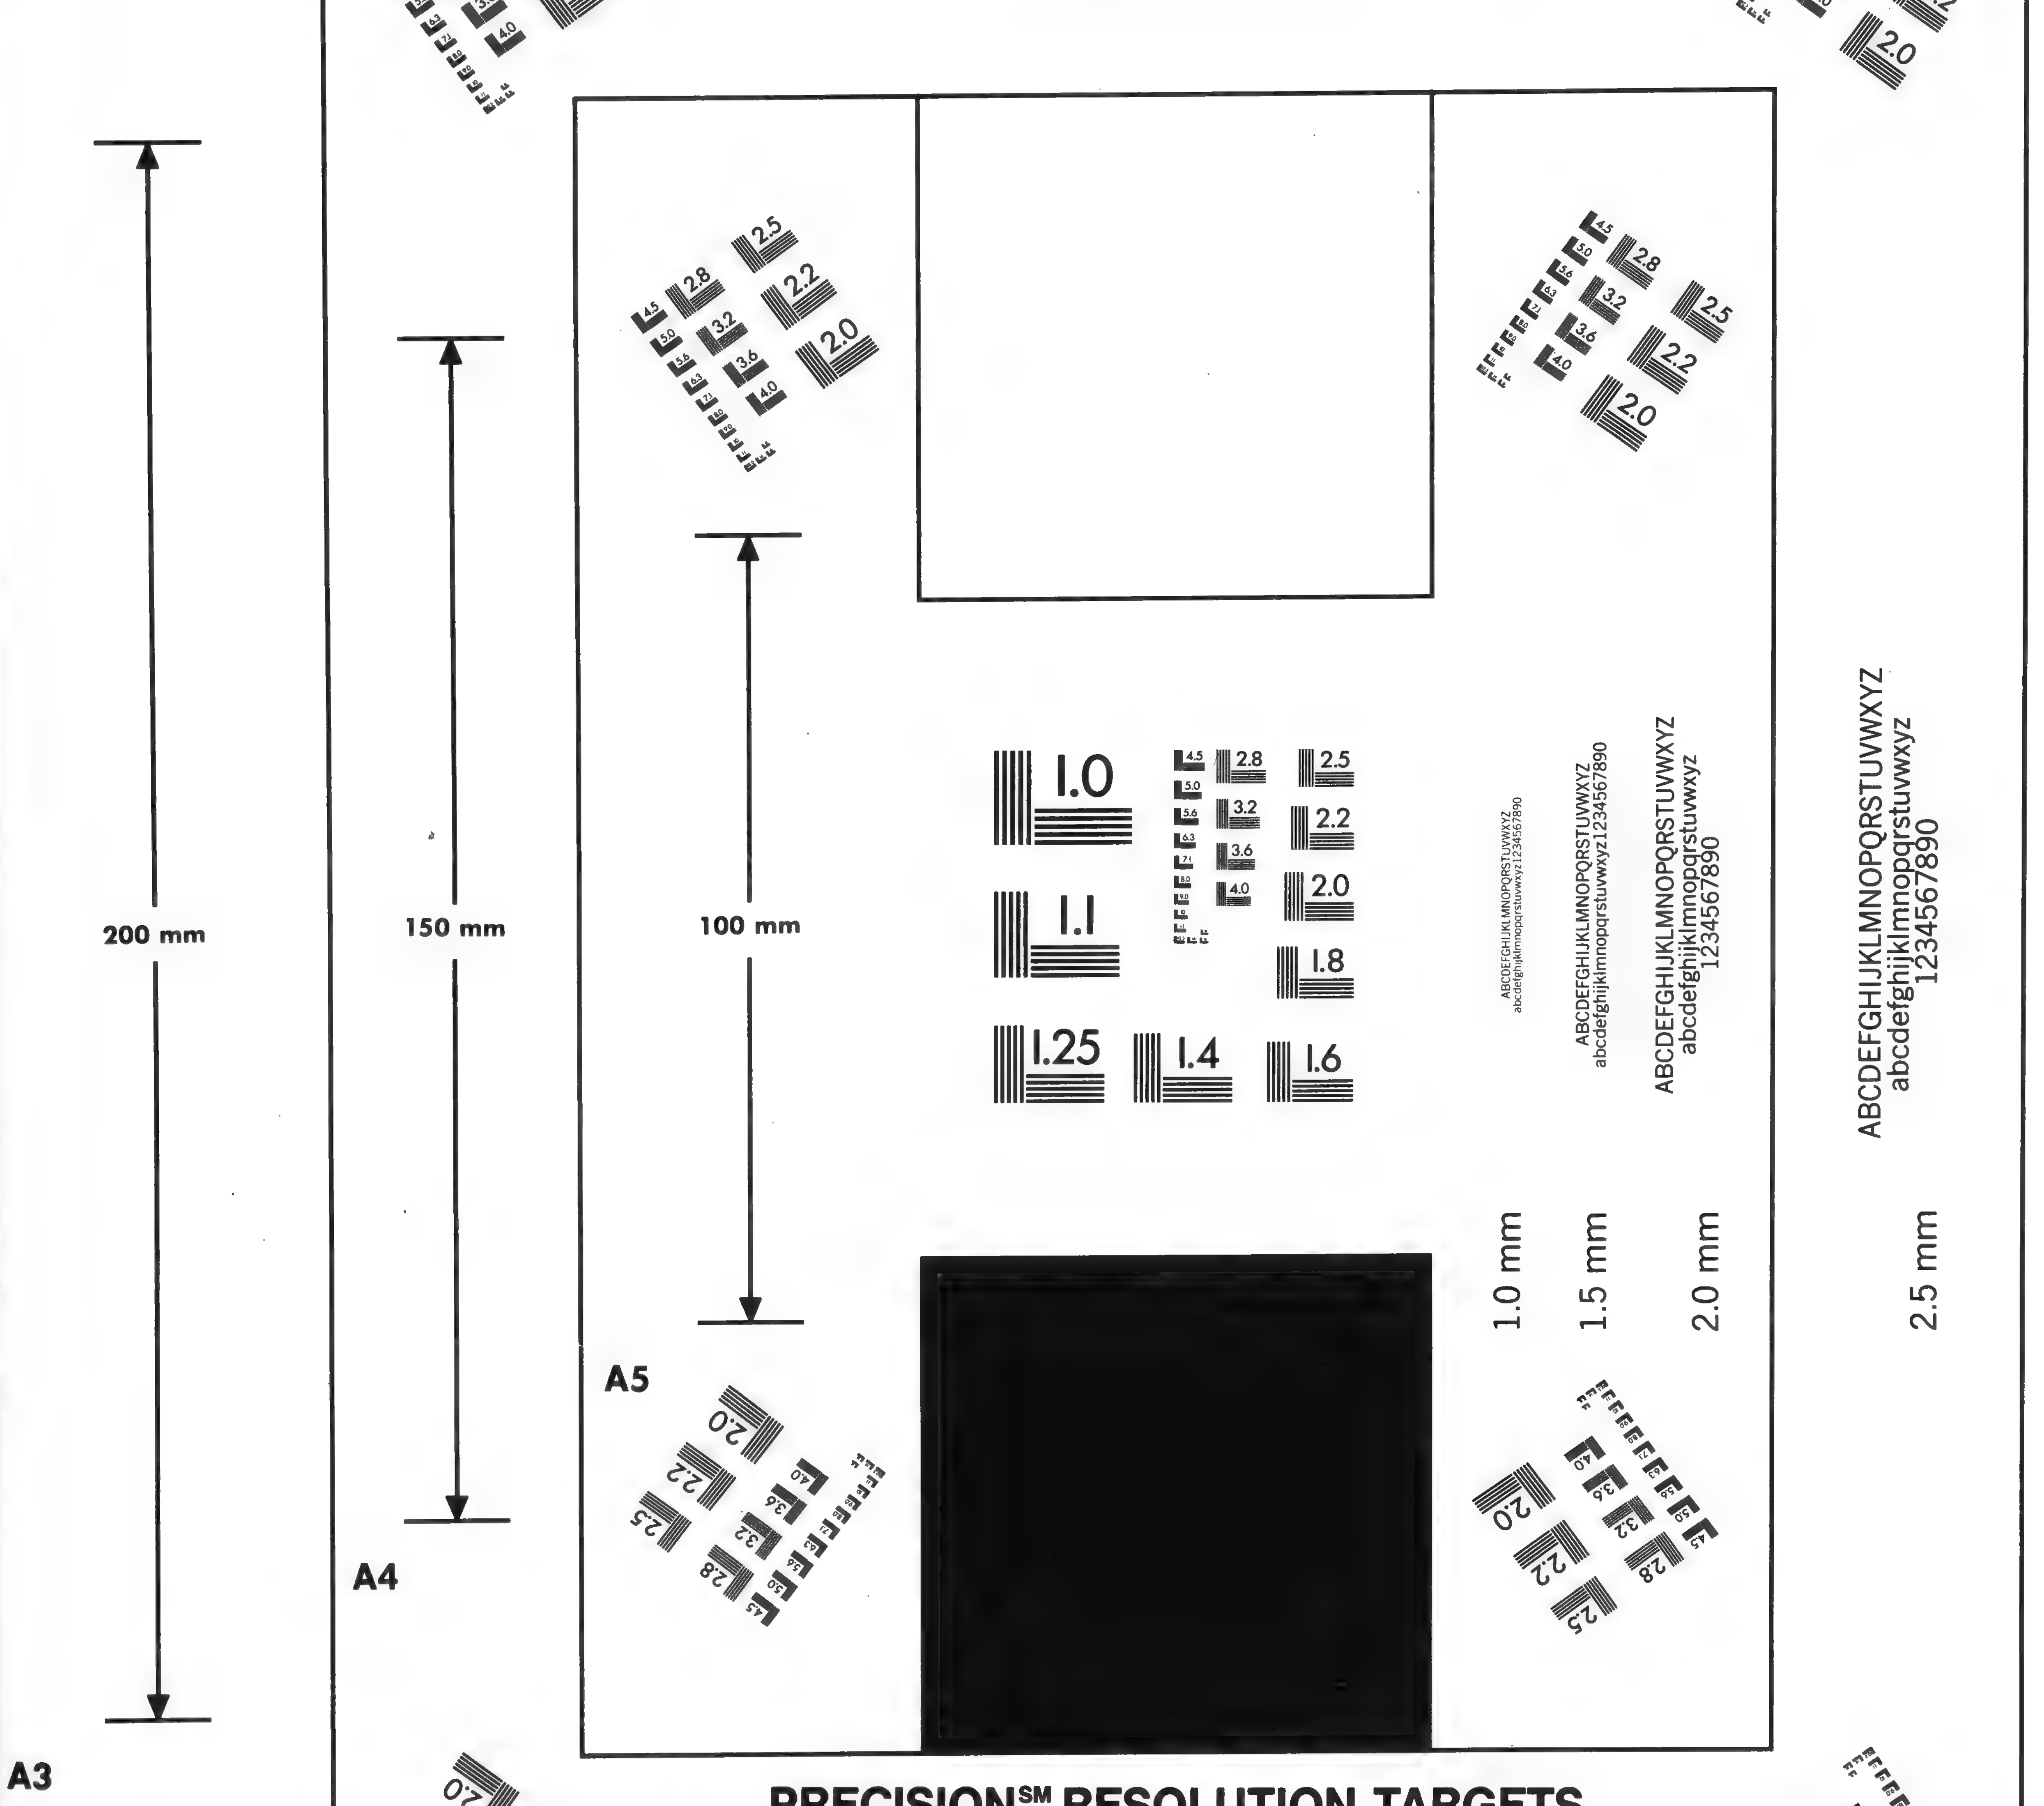
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
7.1
4.0
8.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

and alumni [illegible]
43

59

BERKSHIRE SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL

at "TANGLEWOOD"
(Between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Nine Concerts on Thurs. and Sat. Eves., and Sunday Afternoons

Series A: August 1, 3, 4

The First Symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann and Sibelius.

The C major Symphony of Schubert, the Second Symphony of Brahms, and the Third of Roy Harris.

Other works include Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony and Stravinsky's "Capriccio" (Soloist, J. M. Sanroma).

Series B: August 8, 10, 11

(Celebrating the 100th Anniversary of Tchaikovsky's birth)

The Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Symphonies.

The Violin Concerto (Soloist, Albert Spalding).

Other works to be announced.

Artur Rodzinski will conduct one of the three programmes.

Series C: August 15, 17, 18

The Third Symphony of Beethoven, the First of Brahms, and a Symphony of Haydn.

Other works include Wagner excerpts, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," arias by Dorothy Maynor and Bach's Mass in B minor with the Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center.

For Tickets Apply To
BERKSHIRE SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL
Stockbridge, Mass.

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Director
G. Wallace Woodworth, Assistant Director

JULY 8 - AUGUST 18, at "TANGLEWOOD"

The Berkshire Music Center will consist of an Institute for Advanced Study, with an orchestra and classes in conducting, composition, opera dramatics; and an Academy having no formal entrance requirements, with general sessions of singing, playing, lectures and concerts, and special classes in choral conducting and music in the schools. Enrollment will carry the privilege of attendance at Festival rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the nine concerts (August 1-18).

A catalogue for the Berkshire Music Center will be sent on application to Symphony Hall, Boston

---

The Up-Beat for Wednesday's Concert

Arthur Fiedler, as he will appear at Wednesday night's opening of the 'Pop' Concert season in Symphony Hall—a candid camera shot taken from the orchestra during actual performance.

THE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, MAY 2, 1940

Symphony Artists Don Cap and Bells for 'Silly' Ve

'Gone with the Woodwinds' Is Parody on Dance Bands

Hilarious Performance at Modern Art Institute Benefits Music School

By ALISON ARNOLD

Boston's Symphony Orchestra turned silly last evening. At least a group of its leading members did. And Boston likes them that way, judging by the cheers and applause that rang out from the throng of distinguished Symphony-goers. All this took place in the galleries of the Institute of Modern Art, where the first floor show to be given by members of the Symphony Orchestra was held for the benefit of the South End Music School. "Gone with the Woodwinds" was the title of the show, and with their tongues in their cheeks, the self-styled "Silly Symphonists" provided an evening of rare entertainment.

"Dick" Burgin was master of ceremonies and turned tables on dance bands, which have been adapting the classics for their own use, by showing what Symphony men can do with swing. And what that is, is most remarkable. "Choo Choo" San Roma proved himself a veritable wizard of the keyboard, and the various popular tunes to which Boston has been dancing all winter were "swung" with such rhythm that it was with difficulty that the members of the audience kept their seats.

Those who attend the Symphony concerts each week can hardly picture Einar Hansen, sedate violinist, alternately strutting a spirited cake walk, appropriately equipped with a top-hat and cane, and draping himself in a Spanish shawl to execute a fandango. That is exactly what he did, however, and simply brought down the house with his antics. Nor could Symphony audiences imagine Ludwig Juht impersonating an elephant with his bass viol, while "Choo Choo" San Roma took the part of a mosquito with a piccolo, and "Ziggy" Zighera, the Harpo Marx of the Boston Symphony, played the piano. Marcel Lafosse played the trumpet with one hand and his own accompaniment with the other, and also on the program was a mysterious new singer, Chloe Woodwind from the Windward Islands.

The audience sat about the gallery at small tables, cabaret style, and refreshments were served during the entertainment. Enjoying the fun hugely was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, who was accompanied by Mrs. Koussevitzky, in a gown of flowered chiffon. Sitting with them were Mrs. Gorham Brooks, a member of the entertainment committee, her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Curtis Prout, and the latter's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Prout.

Seated at a table together were Mrs. Allan Forbes and her sister, Mrs. Daniel A de Menocal, and the latter's daughter, Miss Esmee de Menocal, and son, Richard A. de Menocal. Mrs. Forbes was gowned in black chiffon and carried a striking black and silver fan, and Mrs. de Menocal topped with a silver fox cape her black gown with which she wore pearls and a sparkling diamond brooch. Miss Esmee wore a cotton frock fashioned of a quaint India print.

Down front were Mrs. George H. Monks and Mrs. Edward D. Brandegee, Mrs. Brandegee in black with a sable jacket. Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Taft applauded enthusiastically, Mrs. Taft wearing a bolero of glittering gold sequins with her black gown. Nearby were Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett Harwood, sequins glistening on the bodice of Mrs. Harwood's black frock. Sitting together were Mrs. William Stanley Parker and Miss Amelia Peabody.

In a flowered print with a tiny cluster of flowers in her hair was Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears. Mrs. Henry Kent White was escorted by Mr. White, and still others we glimpsed were Mr. George Foote, president of the South End Music School; Mrs. Henry McBurney Parker, Mrs. Wallace McI. Scudder, Mrs. William Ellery, Mr. and Mrs. James Jackson, Jr., Mrs. John T. Bottomley and her daughter, Miss Ellen Bottomley; Mrs. Wilbur Higgins, Miss Nancy Putnam Smith Mrs. Cushing Carleton, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dreyfus and Mrs. Arthur Beale.

Pop Concerts Give Benefits

Next Wednesday night Symphony Hall will appear in its gay summer garb, with tables covering the floor at which refreshments will be served, and the Pop Concerts will open their 55th season. Arthur Fiedler, for the 11th consecutive season will preside as the Pops conductor over a full-sized orchestra of Symphony players.

The first Sunday concert, May 12, has been taken over for Finnish relief, and will have a notable Finnish guest conductor in Tauno Hannikainen. Monday, May 13, will bring an annual Harvard night, with numbers by the Harvard Glee Club.

The George Junior Republic will be benefitted by the Pop Concert of Thursday, May 9, at which Peggy Stuart, conductor of the Junior League Orchestra, will play the piano part in the premiere of her own work for piano and orchestra, "Smoke Drift." On May 15, Elizabeth Travis will play the Chopin F minor Concerto as part of the benefit for the New England Deaconess Hospital.

The Malkin Conservatory is to have a benefit night at the Pops on Monday evening, June 3. As a gesture to the centennial year of the birth of Tchaikovsky, director Joseph Malkin has arranged with Arthur Fiedler for the performance of the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto with Leon Tumarkin as soloist with the Pops orchestra. Mr. Tumarkin is a member of the Malkin Conservatory faculty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HUDSON, MASS
MAYNARD NEWS
5/3/40

CONCERT FOR FINLAND AID

Maynard Residents Interested in Benefit Affair At Symphony Hall

Maynard — Many residents of Maynard are planning to attend the special symphonic concert to honor and to aid Finland, one of the most important musical events of the season, which will be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday evening, May 12, at 8:30 o'clock. The concert will be conducted by Tauno Hannikainen, who will direct the full Boston Pops Orchestra of 93 members.

Mr. Hannikainen came to this country on the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky early in January. ~~Proving~~ that conductors as well as composers are bred on Finnish soil, he has demonstrated his thorough musicianship on at least four occasions since his arrival, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra twice in Symphony Hall and twice in New York. Everywhere the noted Finnish conductor has been enthusiastically received by audiences paying homage to a great artist as well as to an heroic nation.

A leading member of Finnish musical circles, Mr. Hannikainen is the regular conductor of the Helsinki and Turku Symphony Orchestras and of the Finnish National Opera. He is a close friend of Jan Sibelius and will play several selections from the Finnish composer at the concert on May 12. The program will be divided between Sibelius and Brahms as follows: Finlandia, Elegy from "King Chistian II" Suite, Night Ride and Sunrise (Symphonic Poem, Op. 55), and Scherzo and Finale from Symphony No. 2 in D major, all by Sibelius; and following intermission, Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68, by Brahms.

Rev. and Mrs. George Koponen of Maynard are among the distinguished list of sponsors for the May 12 concert. Miss Martha Koski and Miss Vieno Koski of Fairfield Street, and Miss Ellen Haapala of Chandler Street, Maynard, are among the attractive group of ushers who will be dressed in the bright costumes of Finland. Miss Martho Koski is in charge of concert arrangements in Maynard. Proceeds of the concert will be devoted to Finnish relief and reconstruction. Tickets may be secured in advance at the Box Office, Symphony Hall, Boston.

Symphony Artists Don Cap and Bells for 'Silly' Venture in Swing

'Gone with the Woodwinds' Is Parody on Dance Bands

Hilarious Performance at Modern Art Institute Benefits Music School

By ALISON ARNOLD

Boston's Symphony Orchestra turned silly last evening. At least a group of its leading members did. And Boston likes them that way, judging by the cheers and applause that rang out from the throng of distinguished Symphony-goers. All this took place in the galleries of the Institute of Modern Art, where the first floor show to be given by members of the Symphony Orchestra was held for the benefit of the South End Music School. "Gone with the Woodwinds" was the title of the show, and with their tongues in their cheeks, the self-styled "Silly Symphonists" provided an evening of rare entertainment.

"Dick" Burgin was master of ceremonies and turned tables on dance bands, which have been adapting the classics for their own use, by showing what Symphony men can do with swing. And what that is, is most remarkable. "Choo Choo" San Roma proved himself a veritable wizard of the keyboard, and the various popular tunes to which Boston has been dancing all winter were "swung" with such rhythm that it was with difficulty that the members of the audience kept their seats.

Those who attend the Symphony concerts each week can hardly picture Einar Hansen, sedate violinist, alternately strutting a spirited cake walk, appropriately equipped with a top-hat and cane, and draping himself in a Spanish shawl to execute a fandango. That is exactly what he did, however, and simply brought down the house with his antics. Nor could Symphony audiences imagine Ludwig Juht impersonating an elephant with his bass viol, while "Choo Choo" San Roma took the part of a mosquito with a piccolo, and "Ziggy" Zighera, the Harpo Marx of the Boston Symphony, played the piano. Marcel Lafosse played the trumpet with one hand and his own accompaniment with the other, and also on the program was a mysterious new singer, Chloe Woodwind from the Windward Islands.

The audience sat about the gallery at small tables, cabaret style, and refreshments were served during the entertainment. Enjoying the fun hugely was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, who was accompanied by Mrs. Koussevitzky, in a gown of flowered chiffon. Sitting with them were Mrs. Gorham Brooks, a member of the entertainment committee, her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Curtis Prout, and the latter's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Prout.

Seated at a table together were Mrs. Allan Forbes and her sister, Mrs. Daniel A de Menocal, and the latter's daughter, Miss Esmee de Menocal, and son, Richard A. de Menocal. Mrs. Forbes was gowned in black chiffon and carried a striking black and silver fan, and Mrs. de Menocal topped with a silver fox cape her black gown with which she wore pearls and a sparkling diamond brooch. Miss Esmee wore a cotton frock fashioned of a quaint India print.

Down front were Mrs. George H. Monks and Mrs. Edward D. Brandegee, Mrs. Brandegee in black with a sable jacket. Mr and Mrs. Edward A. Taft applauded enthusiastically, Mrs. Taft wearing a bolero of glittering gold sequins with her black gown. Nearby were Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett Harwood, sequins glistening on the bodice of Mrs. Harwood's black frock. Sitting together were Mrs. William Stanley Parker and Miss Amelia Peabody.

In a flowered print with a tiny cluster of flowers in her hair was Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears. Mrs. Henry Kent White was escorted by Mr. White, and still others we glimpsed were Mr. George Foote, president of the South End Music School; Mrs. Henry McBurney Parker, Mrs. Wallace McI. Scudder, Mrs. William Ellery, Mr. and Mrs. James Jackson, Jr., Mrs. John T Bottomley and her daughter, Miss Ellen Bottomley; Mrs. Wilbur Higgins, Miss Nancy Putnam Smith Mrs. Cushing Carleton, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dreyfus and Mrs. Arthur Beale.

Pop Concerts Give Benefits

Next Wednesday night Symphony Hall will appear in its gay summer garb, with tables covering the floor at which refreshments will be served, and the Pop Concerts will open their 55th season. Arthur Fiedler, for the 11th consecutive season will preside as the Pops conductor over a full-sized orchestra of Symphony players.

The first Sunday concert, May 12, has been taken over for Finnish relief, and will have a notable Finnish guest conductor in Tauno Hannikainen. Monday, May 13, will bring an annual Harvard night, with numbers by the Harvard Glee Club.

The George Junior Republic will be benefitted by the Pop Concert of Thursday, May 9, at which Peggy Stuart, conductor of the Junior League Orchestra, will play the piano part in the premiere of her own work for piano and orchestra, "Smoke Drift." On May 15, Elizabeth Travis will play the Chopin F minor Concerto as part of the benefit for the New England Deaconess Hospital.

The Malkin Conservatory is to have a benefit night at the Pops on Monday evening, June 3. As a gesture to the centennial year of the birth of Tchaikovsky, director Joseph Malkin has arranged with Arthur Fiedler for the performance of the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto with Leon Tumarkin as soloist with the Pops orchestra. Mr. Tumarkin is a member of the Malkin Conservatory faculty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HUDSON, MASS
MAYNARD NEWS
5/3/40

CONCERT FOR FINLAND AID

Maynard Residents Interested in Benefit Affair At Symphony Hall

Maynard — Many residents of Maynard are planning to attend the special symphonic concert to honor and to aid Finland, one of the most important musical events of the season, which will be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday evening, May 12, at 8:30 o'clock. The concert will be conducted by Tauno Hannikainen, who will direct the full Boston Pops Orchestra of 93 members.

Mr. Hannikainen came to this country on the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky early in January. Proving that conductors as well as composers are bred on Finnish soil, he has demonstrated his thorough musicianship on at least four occasions since his arrival, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra twice in Symphony Hall and twice in New York. Everywhere the noted Finnish conductor has been enthusiastically received by audiences paying homage to a great artist as well as to an heroic nation.

A leading member of Finnish musical circles, Mr. Hannikainen is the regular conductor of the Helsinki and Turku Symphony Orchestras and of the Finnish National Opera. He is a close friend of Jan Sibelius and will play several selections from the Finnish composer at the concert on May 12. The program will be divided between Sibelius and Brahms as follows: Finlandia, Elegy from "King Chistian II" Suite, Night Ride and Sunrise (Symphonic Poem, Op. 55), and Scherzo and Finale from Symphony No. 2 in D major, all by Sibelius; and following intermission, Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68, by Brahms.

Rev. and Mrs. George Koponen of Maynard are among the distinguished list of sponsors for the May 12 concert. Miss Martha Koski and Miss Vieno Koski of Fairfield Street, and Miss Ellen Haapala of Chandler Street, Maynard, are among the attractive group of ushers who will be dressed in the bright costumes of Finland. Miss Martho Koski is in charge of concert arrangements in Maynard. Proceeds of the concert will be devoted to Finnish relief and reconstruction. Tickets may be secured in advance at the Box Office, Symphony Hall, Boston.

MPHONIC
L OOD" Lenox, Mass.)

N
CHESTRA
Conductor
d Sat. Eves., and ons

C FESTIVAL

C CENTER
KY, Director
istant Director

TANGLEWOOD" will consist of an with an orchestra position, opera having no formal special sessions of concerts, and spe music in ire Music Center lication to Boston

Wednesday's Concert

ppear at Wednesday night's opening n in Symphony Hall—a candid cam-chestra during actual performance.

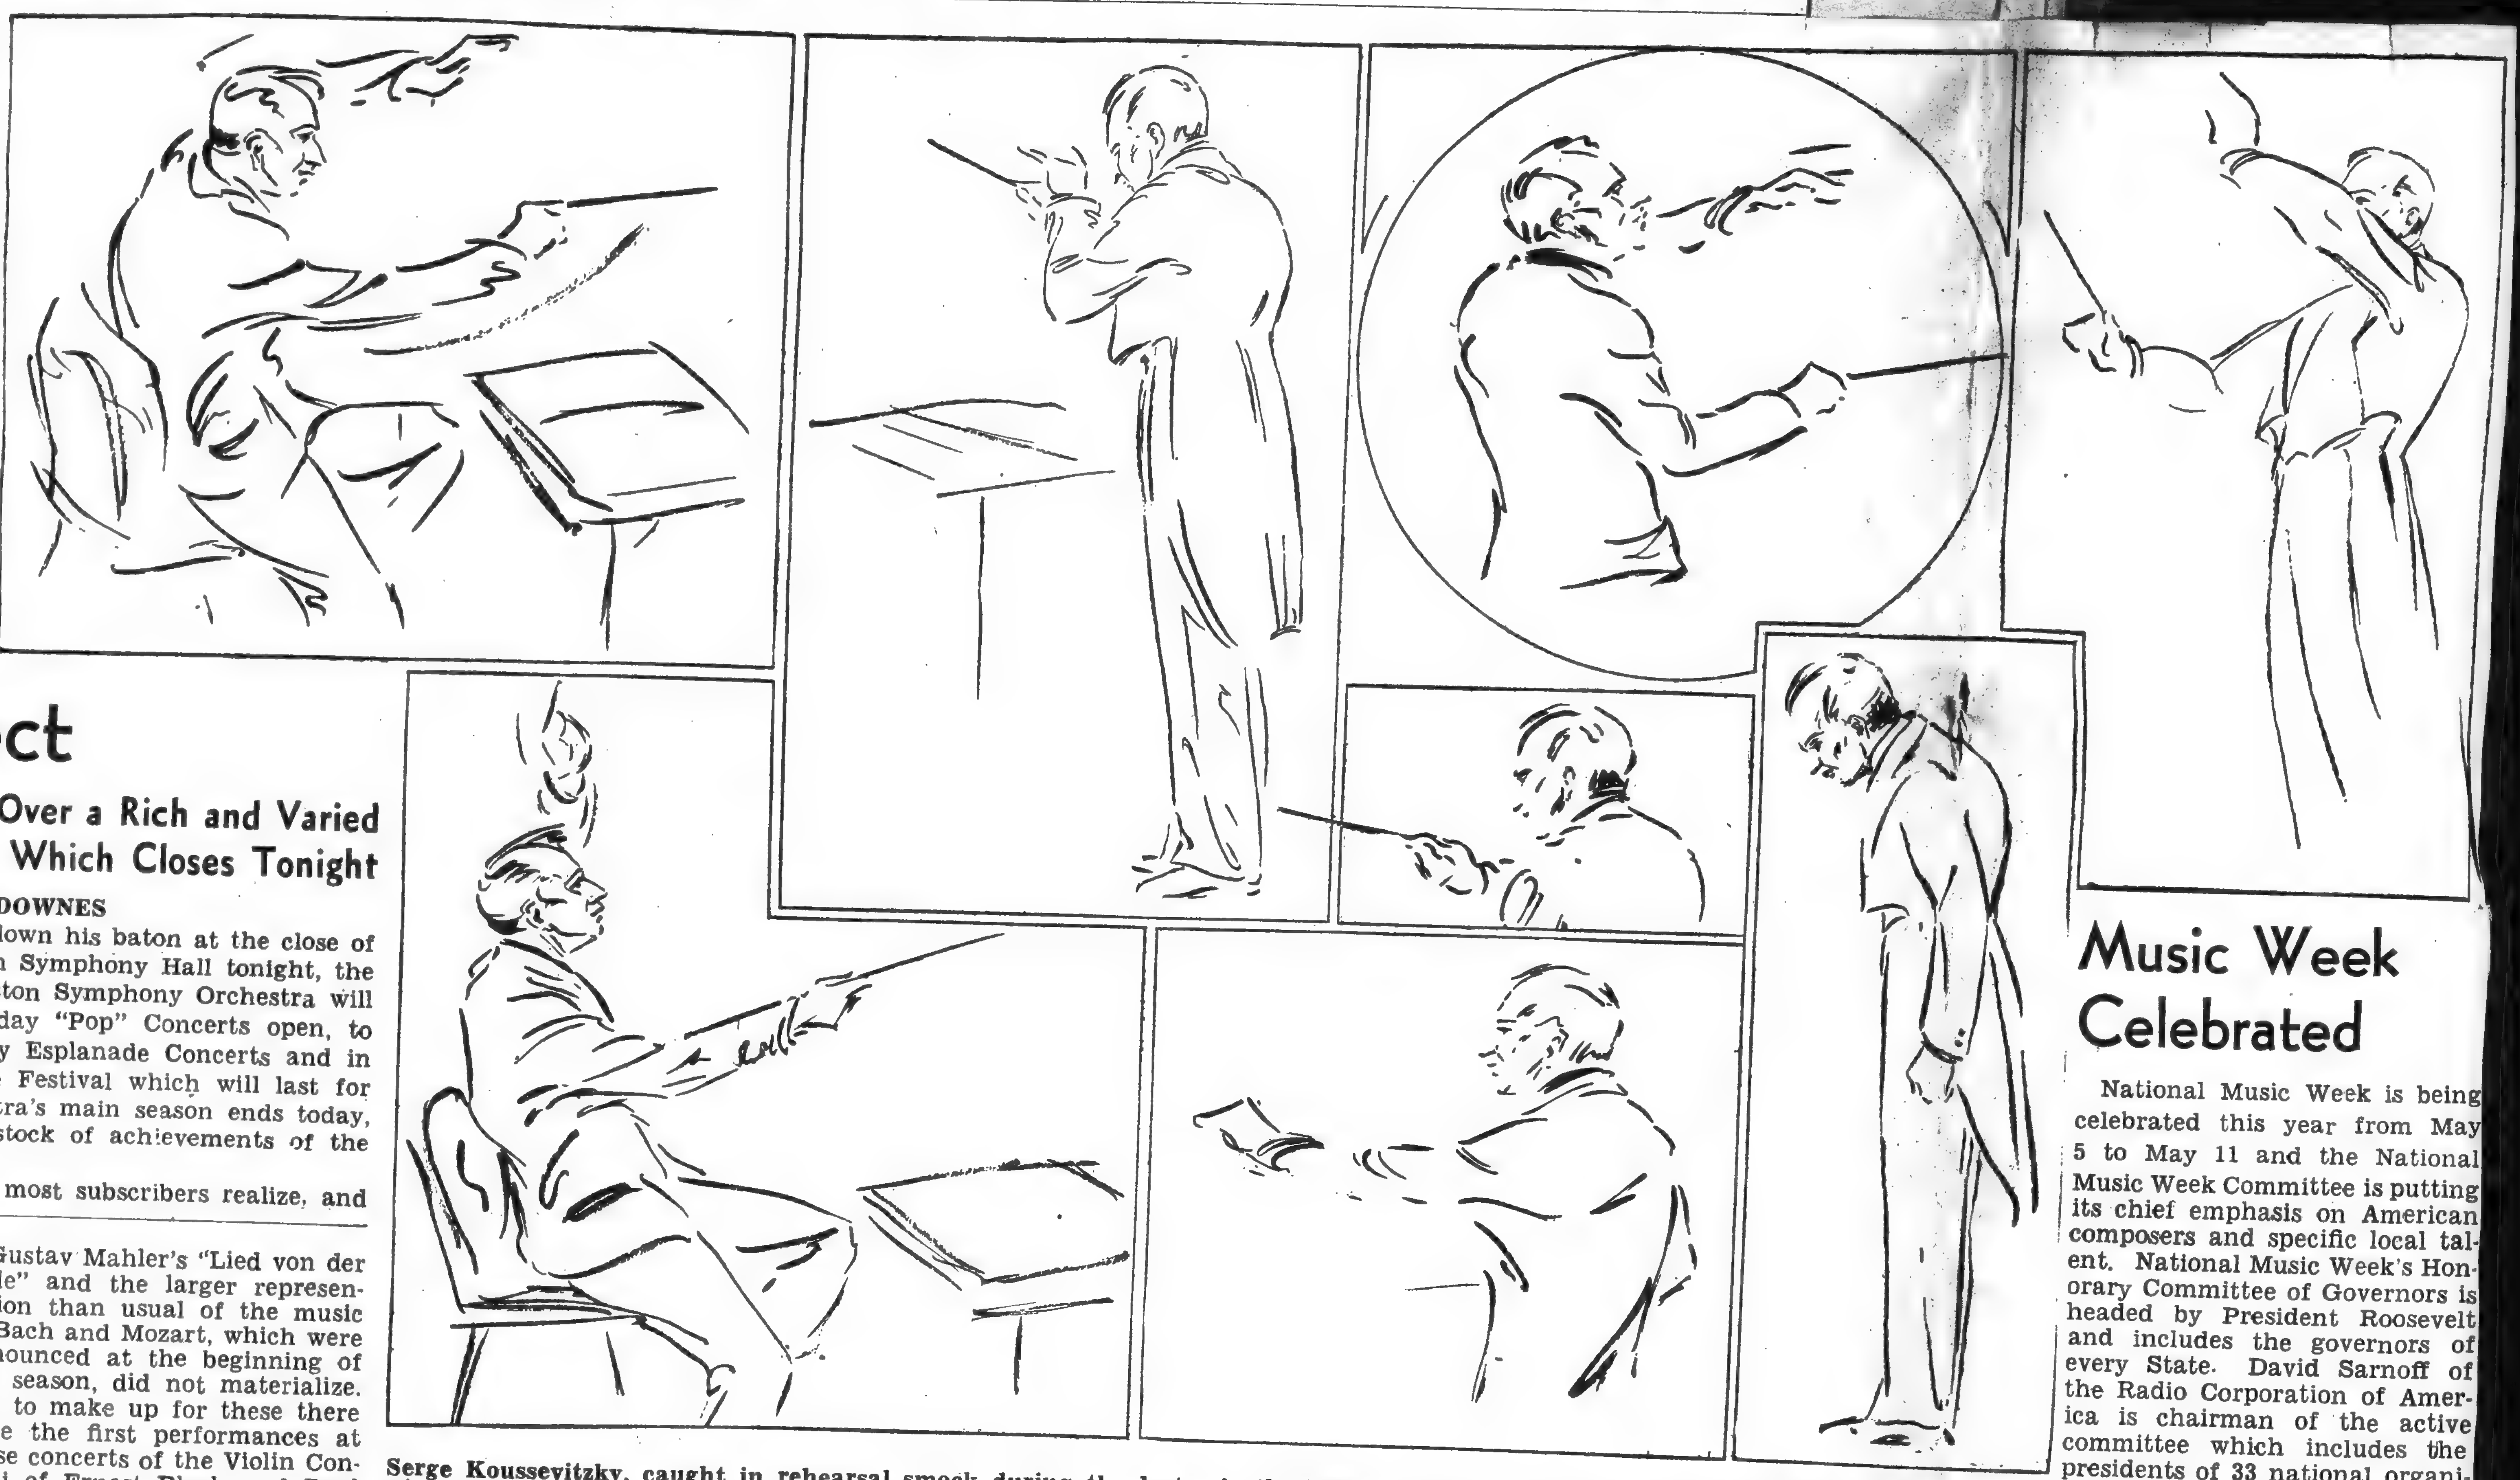
'POP' CONCERT SEASON OPENS WEDNESDAY;

Prof. Hill, Retiring, Honored with Concert

In honor of Professor Edward Burlingame Hill, who is retiring this spring from active service on the music staff of Harvard University, a concert will be given at the Harvard Music Building on Friday evening, May 10, with a program drawn entirely from Professor Hill's own compositions. It will include the premiere of his Second Concertino for Piano and Orchestra. He will become professor emeritus.

A limited number of free tickets to the concert are available on application by mail to the Harvard Music Department.



Serge Koussevitzky, caught in rehearsal smock during the last days of the season, and as he appears tonight to conduct the season's final concert. Two sketches on the left glimpse him in the heat of shaping an orchestral masterpiece. At the upper left we have him evoking that interpretation for a large audience. And just above these lines he takes leave of this year's subscription audience with his customary courtly bow.

In Retrospect

Backward Glance Over a Rich and Varied Orchestral Season Which Closes Tonight

By EDWARD DOWNES

When Serge Koussevitzky lays down his baton at the close of the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony in Symphony Hall tonight, the 59th subscription season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have become history. On Wednesday "Pop" Concerts open, to be followed later in the summer by Esplanade Concerts and in August there will be the Berkshire Festival which will last for three weeks. But since the orchestra's main season ends today, this is a convenient time to take stock of achievements of the past year.

It has been a busier year than most subscribers realize, and because of the European war, it has had probably more than its quota of derangement of carefully laid plans. Nevertheless, it is not generally realized that since the beginning of the season last October, the Boston Symphony has played an average of more than one concert every other day: 112 in all, if we have counted correctly. Thirty-six of these were given out of town, which involved a great deal of time spent on trains, and when you add to that the time spent in rehearsal and making records. It makes a staggering total.

If it does not equal the Philadelphia Orchestra's extraordinary number of 63 out of town concerts, nor the prodigious local schedule of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, the Boston Symphony nevertheless stands statistically near the top of American orchestras. Artistically it has hardly a peer and certainly no superior.

Living as we do, in town where we can hear Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony every week, two to four times, it is easy to become complacent and to take our brilliant orchestra for granted. In New York city, whose perspective in orchestral matters is sharpened by regular concert series of the three leading orchestras of the land, the Boston, Philadelphia and its own Philharmonic-Symphony, our orchestra is by no means taken for granted. Its series is by far the most popular of all three, a situation which has been, if anything, accentuated in the last few years.

Influence of the War

The casualties in the season's plans included the projected visits of the Russian composer Serge Prokofieff, who was to have played a piano concerto of his own, and the German pianist, Walter Gieseking, neither of whom found it possible to visit America. Presumably it was the war too, which made it impossible to obtain the soloists to perform the concert version of Tchaikovsky's opera, "Pique Dame" which we had been promised for the Tchaikovsky Festival, at the end of the season. Gustav Mahler's "Lied von der Erde" and the larger representation than usual of the music of Bach and Mozart, which were announced at the beginning of the season, did not materialize. But to make up for these there were the first performances at these concerts of the Violin Concerti of Ernest Bloch and Paul Hindemith, both of which promised to be important additions to violin concerto literature.

Several works were performed for the first time anywhere: Howard Hanson's Third Symphony (with the composer conducting), George Foote's Suite "In Praise of Winter," Lopatnikoff's Second Symphony and Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for String Orchestra. Of these, Professor Hill's Concertino seemed the happiest though it did not make the pretensions of the rather derivative Hanson Symphony.

Composed especially for the Boston Symphony's two pre-season American concerts, William Schuman's "American Festival Overture" made a strong impression of originality and vitality. Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart at last found their way into the repertory of the Boston Symphony, as did "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey" by Jan Sibelius and Stravinsky's amusing "Jeu de Cartes." Unaccountably, the riant overture to Rossini's "La Gazza Ladra" had never been played before by the Symphony and that error too was remedied to the gratification of everybody. In all, 18 works appeared for the first time on Boston Symphony programs.

The Human Equation

Among artists who had been engaged last year and who were almost prevented from appearing by the war was the gifted young Finnish conductor, Tauno Hannikainen. He was delayed, but he came and played for us while his home was being destroyed by Russian bombs and his son was at the front. That took an immense spiritual fortitude—a fortitude which he matched with his searching performances of works of his countryman, Sibelius. Mr. Hannakainen is still among us and will conduct a "Pop" Concert on Sunday night, May 12, to benefit the relief activities in his stricken country.

One of the pleasantest memories of the season is the debut of the colored soprano, Dorothy Maynor, privately at a reception for the Friends of the Boston Symphony and publicly at the first Pension Fund Concert where she was received with a warmth which must have been deeply moving to her and gratifying to Dr. Koussevitzky and those who have encouraged Miss Maynor's artistic development.

From Stuttgart came the sad news of the death on March 3 of Karl Muck, pre-war and wartime conductor of the Boston Symphony who, though he developed his orchestra to be the finest in the world, became a victim of American war hysteria and was interned during the war as an "alien enemy." After time had softened the memory of his imprisonment here, Muck often spoke of the years with the Boston Symphony as the happiest of his life. It would perhaps have consoled him to know that the man who now wields his baton and who conducted the Allegretto from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in his memory has restored the orchestra to its former commanding position in the world of music.

SYMPHONY'S FINALE

Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony men Acclaimed in Season's Final Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their final Friday matinee of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. At the beginning of the concert the musicians rose to applaud Dr. Koussevitzky as he approached the conductor's stand. At the close a grateful public stamped, cheered, shouted, thumped and clapped their approval of their brilliant orchestra and its distinguished leader. Perhaps a little of the applause was also for Tchaikovsky, whose Fifth Symphony concluded this program as part of the celebration of the Russian master's hundredth birthday.

As at two previous concerts of the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky had sagely chosen a Beethoven symphony as a foil for the garish colors, the vaulting rhythms, the extravagant emotionalism of the Tchaikovsky score. But lest it be thought that Beethoven's Second Symphony was put on the program only to set off the spicier wares of Tchaikovsky, we should say at once that it received one of the most exciting performances of the season.

The Allegro of the first movement, it is true, shot past the listener's ears in a disordinate hurry, but the introductory Adagio was exquisitely proportioned, and the classically restrained line of the slow movement was moulded with emotion as well as grace. A deeply satisfying balance underlay even the capricious Scherzo and in the last ement, really a second scher e were moments which equaled even by the Boston Symphony itself. From the fantastical orchestral somersault which introduces the finale the luminous timbre of the orchestra as a whole and the sensitive transparency of the choirs were perfectly integrated and responsive to Koussevitzky's baton.

Classic Versus Romantic

It is difficult to believe that this sunny music was produced at the time of Beethoven's despairing Heiligenstadt testament. But any thought of making a symphony out of his personal feelings would have been as foreign to the classical Beethoven as it had been to Mozart. Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, on the other hand, seems an intensely personal expression of the emotions of its author.

Curiously enough Tchaikovsky is said to have preferred his Fourth Symphony which, from the purely musical point of view, is surely inferior. However that may be, Koussevitzky read the Fifth yesterday afternoon as if nothing in the world were quite so great as this music. This is the way Tchaikovsky must be felt and performed. Unforgettable were the final pages, the superb gallantry of the theme transposed to the major key, the triumphant assurance, the heroic optimism which crowns so many pages of doubts and despair.

It was a magnificent close to a memorable series of orchestral concerts.

Music Week Celebrated

National Music Week is being celebrated this year from May 5 to May 11 and the National Music Week Committee is putting its chief emphasis on American composers and specific local talent. National Music Week's Honorary Committee of Governors is headed by President Roosevelt and includes the governors of every State. David Sarnoff of the Radio Corporation of America is chairman of the active committee which includes the presidents of 33 national organizations such as American Federation of Musicians, American Society of Composers and Camp Fire Girls.

In harmony with the general plan for the observance of national festival of m
Boston Public Librar nounced its National program beginning
5, at 3.30 P.M.,
Hall, with a co ton Music Sch chestra, Lin
conductor,
Symphon
Wagner
Beeth
T sp

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

MAY 4 - 1940

Barlow Cited As Interpreter Of Native Music

Koussevitzky and Buck Also Honored By Composers

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

Howard Barlow, conductor of the Columbia Broadcasting Company and of the Baltimore Symphony, was voted "the outstanding native interpreter of American music" by the National Association for American Composers and Conductors, last night at the association's annual reception at the Waldorf-Astoria, New York.

He received a certificate of merit and a similar award was made to Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony, who included many American works on his programs. The honor goes to him as the native composer's greatest friend among the alien conductors.

Buck, Harris Honored

Gene Buck, president of A.S.C.A.P., received the Henry Hadley medal "as having done most during the 1939-40 season to advance the cause of American music." Roy Harris was honored "as the most significant American composer of the season, "and New York's city's municipal radio station WNNC was commended for its attention to American music.

In limiting its awards to artists active east of the Hudson River the association was guilty of a characteristic error. Most of the nation lies west of that historic stream and out in this vast and unconsidered wilderness there are many conductors who have played more native music than even the patriotic native of Ohio, Howard Barlow.

Westerners Cited

There is Sevitzky, of the youthful Indianapolis Symphony, who will play no program of music that lacks a native composition, which is more than can be said of his uncle in Boston. There is Kroeger, of Kansas City, whose performances are less numerous but more important. There is Stock, of Chicago. Most important of all, there are the numerous and competent conductors of the fine Federal Music Project Symphonies where, according to Stokowski, "one finds the best symphonists."

Most of these orchestras are to be found in the great hinterland that these New Yorkers ignore. How they came to overlook the Federal Symphonies, particularly at this itme, is hard to understand; for next week is National Music Week and the Federal Symphonies and other music projects announce a thousand events, most of which will stress native music in one form or another.

First Hadley Performance

The National Association for American Composers and Conductors, founded by the late Henry Hadley, is performing a valued service. But it is a Federal Symphony out in Chicago that will stage the first performance of Hadley's piano concerto. The orchestra is the Illinois Symphony, the conductor, Izler Solomon, disciple of Eric DeLamarter, and the soloist a young virtuosa unknown to fame named Marie Zorn.

The Boston Symphony Season

By L. A. Sloper

Three programs commemorating the centenary of Tchaikovsky closed the fifty-ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will direct a more formal Tchaikovsky celebration at the Berkshire Symphony Symphonic Festival in August. For each of the final prorams of the regular season (April 6-27 and 29-30, May 3-4) he imply played one of the compos-r's last three symphonies, beginning with the Sixth and ending with the Fifth. For companion eces on these programs he chose ree "even" symphonies of Beeoven, the Eighth, the Fourth, nd the Second.

Thus comes to a conclusion another conspiculously successful oston Symphony season. Dr. ussevitzky continues at the top his powers as an interpreter.

The orchestra, with its personnel virtually unaffected by the war in Europe, remains unexcelled and in all probability now unequalled among symphonic organizations.

It was Beethoven's year rather than Tchaikovsky's in the number of their works performed—nine against five. Indeed Sibelius and Stravinsky were represented by six compositions each. But these two totals were reached partly as a result of the engagements as guest conductors of Tauno Hannikainen and Mr. Stravinsky himself.

* * *

Brahms thereby fell to a new low for recent years—only three performances. And it was the first time in five years that the season has not closed with the Brahms First. This devotion on the part of the conductor caused a wit to comment last year that it was fortunate Brahms wrote the Symphony in C minor; since if he had not, Dr. Koussevitzky would never be able to bring a season to a close. This apprehension has now been dissipated.

In accordance with what seems to have become a custom of late years, novelties of interest were few in number. (The custom no doubt is due to the scarcity of interesting novelties.) The most significant of them was Paul Hindemith's new Violin Concerto, which had its first American performances in Boston (April 19-20) about a week after its premiere in The Netherlands. This is a work of startling originality, with a slow movement of ineffable beauty. It was played with great virtuosity and loveliness of tone by Richard Burgin, concertmaster, who seemed to be inspired by it to reach new heights of interpretative insight.

Edward Burlingame Hill's new Concertino had the misfortune to be on the same program. If it could have been heard with less overwhelming competition, it would have appeared more clearly as the charming slight piece that it is.

* * *

Previously Dr. Koussevitzky had demonstrated again his powers as an interpreter in a performance of Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony which revealed its beauties as I at least had never perceived them before.

Igor Stravinsky, now resident at Harvard College as Norton Professor of Poetry, has been in evidence in several musical events this season. In March he conducted concerts of his chamber music in Boston and in Cambridge, nd later in the same month he eturned to Symphony Hall to direct a second pair of concerts devoted to his symphonic works. The principal item of this program was the "Oedipus Rex," which was preceded by "Apollon Musagète." The composer, who has improved as a conductor, obtained good performances, which did not, however, modify the reservations with which many of us have long regarded his later output.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAY 4 - 1940

Will Present Concert For Finnish Relief

Members of Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a concert under auspices of Finland Aid Committee at 7 o'clock tomorrow evening in Belmont Hall. Oskar Tokoi of Fitchburg, Finnish newspaperman, will be the principal speaker.

Ludwig Juht and Karl Lamb, 'cellists from the orchestra, will play. Also to be heard are Louise Wilson, 11, pianist, and Mrs. Sofia Stunberg, pianist. Vocalists will include Mrs. Juht, a soprano, and Albert Hommer, tenor, all of Boston.

Mr. and Mrs. John Martilla are in charge of the concert.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAY 5 - 1940

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR FINNISH AID

Finland Aid Committee will sponsor a concert by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at 7 in Belmont Hall. Oskari Tokoi of Fitchburg, Finnish newspaperman, will be the principal speaker.

Ludwig Juht and Karl Lamb, 'cellists, will play. Also to be heard are Louise Wilson, 11, and Mrs. Sofia Stunberg, pianists. Vocalists will include Mrs. Juht, a soprano, and Albert Hommer, tenor, all of Boston.

The committee: Mr. and Mrs. John Martilla, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Saaret, Mr. and Mrs. John Ilvoset, Mr. and Mrs. Nikolai Hallilat, Mr. and Mrs. John Hermanson, Mr. and Mrs. John Liukkoset, Mrs. Jennie Salmi, Mrs. Elna Ruostoja and Mr. and Mrs. K. E. Ylitalot.

Adv. May 5

Pops Open on Wednesday

THE Pop Concerts will open their 55th season at Symphony Hall on next Wednesday evening. Arthur Fiedler, for the 11th consecutive season, will preside as the Pops conductor over a full sized orchestra of Symphony players. Symphony Hall will appear in its gayer summer garb, with tables covering the floor at which refreshments will be served.

The first Sunday concert, May 12, has been taken over for Finnish relief, and will have the noted Finnish guest conductor, Tauno Hannikainen. Monday, May 13, will bring an annual Harvard night, with numbers by the Harvard Glee Club.

The openng programs:

Wednesday

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"	Rossini
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier"	Richard Strauss
Czardas from "Ritter Pasman"	Johann Strauss
Facade	Walton
Triana, frmo "Iberia"	Albeniz
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Mexican Rhapsody	McBride
Indian Summer	Herbert
Stars and Stripes Forever, March	Sousa

Thursday

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"	Berlioz
Overture to "Der Freischutz"	Weber
Fugue a la Gigue	Bach-Holst
Austrian Peasant Dances	Schonherr
Suite from "Carmen"	Bizet
Pavane for a Dead Infanta	Ravel
Finale, Fourth Symphony	Tchaikovsky
"Smoke Drift"	Peggy Stuart

Piano Soloist: Peggy Stuart

Entrance of the Little Fauns	Pierne
First Slavonic Dance	Dvorak

Friday

Coronation March from "The Prophet"	Meyerbeer
"The Moldau," Symphonic Poem	Smetana
"To a Wild Rose"	MacDowell
Waltz Scene from "Faust"	Gounod
Prelude to "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"	Suppe
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltzes	Strauss
Song of the Volga Bargemen	Arranged by Glazounov
Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar

SEASON ENDS FOR SYMPHONY

Tchaikovsky's Fifth Supplies Fitting Grandeur

Post May 4

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Beethoven-Tchaikovsky festival, designed to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the latter's birth, came to an end at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and with it the Friday matinees of this, the orchestra's 59th season. The two composers, paired for the third time within eight days, were represented by their Second and Fifth Symphonies, respectively.

To repeat what was said here a week ago, it would have been a more fitting tribute to Tchaikovsky to conclude these ceremonies with the symphony that more than ever seems indisputably his greatest, the "Pathetic," but it was more suitable in another and more practical sense to end the season with the din and excitement, the orotund proclamation of the obvious that make the close of the Fifth Symphony and which are reasonably certain to bring an audience cheering to its feet. In this respect, yesterday's audience did what was expected of it.

To hear the three last and most important Tchaikovsky symphonies in the order, Six, Four, Five (No. 4 was played at the Monday-Tuesday concerts) was to experience aesthetically a considerable drop and a partial rise. If the Fifth falls below the "Pathetic" at every point and in every respect, it is still a sounder and more substantial achievement than the sometimes effective but decidedly uneven Fourth. But whether you like this one or that one, or all of them or none of them, they are still cherished by the public as a whole and will be with us for a long time to come, perhaps—who knows?—when the Tchaikovsky bicentennial rolls around.

To say that Dr. Koussevitzky engineered a superb performance of the Fifth Symphony yesterday is merely to say that the looked-for occurred. Unfortunately, the performance of Beethoven's Second was not in the happiest vein. Mistakenly, as it seems to this observer, the conductor employed the full body of strings and was disposed to regard the work as an incipient "Eroica," rather than as an 18th century survival. This more discreet and piquant treatment would also have afforded better contrast to the sighs and storms of Tchaikovsky.

Upon the season as a whole, brilliant and uncommonly eventful, there will be more time and space for comment tomorrow. Suffice it to say now that at the Friday and Saturday concerts alone there were played 77 works, representing 41 composers, four of which were played for the first time anywhere, and 14 more for the first time at these concerts. Two composers of established popularity, whose total number of performances have often been high, Ravel and Wagner, were neglected, but they will have their innings at the Pops.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

MAY 5 - 1940

Benjamin Grosbayne will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its annual Harvard Night program on May 13.

Beethoven

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 24th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 36	Beethoven
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64	Tchaikovsky

Such familiar music as has occupied the last concerts of the Boston Symphony's 59th season need not detain the critic long. It is perhaps true that we are apt to forget the beauty of Beethoven's 2nd Symphony, but it has merely to be played again to enable us to remember what a remarkable and ingratiating work it is. Tchaikovsky's 5th certainly needs no advertisement. As was proved by the tumultuous applause yesterday, it remains one of the most popular works in the symphonic repertory.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra again gave us an exhibition of magnificent playing and interpretations ideally suited to these very different symphonies. There used to be a time—say a dozen years ago—when the merits of the various major orchestras were animatedly discussed. Fortunately for us those discussions today generally begin with an admission of the supremacy of the Boston Symphony.

It is to be hoped that we do not take this position or the fact of the orchestra's excellence too much for granted. It is only maintained by constant labor on the part of the players, by ceaseless vigilance on Mr. Koussevitzky's side. Even music as thoroughly known as the Tchaikovsky Symphony is attacked in rehearsal almost as if it were a new work, in order that it may sound fresh in performance. The word "stale" has been systematically banished from the Koussevitzky vocabulary, for he well knows how dangerously easy it can invade a world where professional competence is at a high level.

Yesterday's concert was, then, a high testimonial to the vitality of the Boston Symphony and its conductor. We are always sorry to see the end of another symphony season—Friday is never a normal day until the middle of October!—but if it must stop, it is well to be assured that it does so in the full tide of glorious achievement.

Although we have reviewed the season at some length in the Sunday Herald, it may not come amiss to make a few observations here as well. We heard a great deal of modern music, and you can limit that term in various ways and still emerge with a large total. Among the composers at either series were eight Americans; Stravinsky was honored at two concerts; and Sibelius was also given much attention. Even so Beethoven had the best of it, though oddly enough in the advance folder Mr. Koussevitsky had promised to devote himself more than usual to Bach and Mozart. Seldom has either composer been so scantily represented, if you except the extra Pension Fund concert of the B minor Mass.

We found the modern music to have been exceptionally interesting. Hindemith's Violin Concerto and his "Mathis der Maler" Symphony; Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," Symphony of Psalms, the "Jeu de Cartes" Suite and other pieces; Prokofieff's 2nd Violin Concerto; Bloch's Violin Concerto; Roy Harris's 3rd Symphony; Szymanowski's Symphonie Concertante; Piston's Concertino; Hill's Concertino; Ibert's Saxophone Concerto—these make an impressive and stimulating list. Add to that that we had several unusual older works, such as d'Indy's 2nd Symphony, Dubussy's "St. Sebastian" music, symphonies of Mahler and Bruckner, and the season looks far from conventional. With one notable exception, there was little music that we should not care to hear again. The exception? We refuse to let Dr. Hanson have the last word! Let it rather be for the enlightened enthusiasm and catholic taste of Serge Koussevitzky.

62

Tchaikovsky Close 59th Symphony Season

Members of Boston Society In Symphony Hall Audience

Works of Tchaikovsky and Beethoven Make up Last Program of 59th Season

By ALISON ARNOLD

From now on throughout the summer months, Boston hostesses will be free to make plans for Friday afternoons. During the winter season, nothing is allowed to interfere with attendance at the Friday afternoon symphony concerts, and all social engagements are carefully planned with this in mind. Yesterday, however, marked the last Friday afternoon concert until Oct. 11, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 60th season. And practically all Boston society made it a point to be present to swell the applause that caused Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the beloved conductor, to appear again and again. Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony in E minor served as a sort of celebration, as May 7 will be the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. Also in the program was Beethoven's second symphony in D major.

Flowers have literally gone to the heads of Boston ladies and we never saw so many flowered hats. A single red rose adorned the chic little sailor worn by Miss Betsy Chalifoux with her trim navy tailleur, and two full-blown pink roses trimmed Mrs. George Putnam's becoming hat. Mrs. James J. Minot wore with her black frock and silver fox cape a toque of white blossoms, and with her dove gray gown Mrs. William Dana Orcutt wore a turban of mayflower pink flowers. Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, who was accompanied by her granddaughter, Miss Genevra Hobbs, had sprays of lilies-of-the-valley on her navy blue hat, and blue hyacinths fashioned Miss Genevra's tiny bonnet.

Navy blue is definitely springtime's favorite. Wearing with her navy ensemble a chalk white hat was Mrs. Ralph Bradley, and also in navy were Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson, Miss Leslie Lindsey, Mrs. Howard Turner and her daughter, Mrs. William A. Dupee, Jr., Mrs. Otis Russell and Mrs. Edward Harding. With Mrs. Arthur Grannis was her daughter, Mrs. Robert Coit.

Mrs. Charles Goddard Weld arrived hatless, her snowy coiffure exquisitely arranged, and with her sister, Mrs. Horace H. Soule, and her daughter, Mrs. Sumner Pingree. Arriving together were Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller and Mrs. Fuller Halsey and her pretty daughter, Miss Hope Halsey. With Mrs. William B. Long, in a smart gray suit, was her daughter, Miss Polly Long. Mrs. Robert Treat Paine wore black accented with white by the ribbon on her hat, her gloves, and her gorgeous silver fox scarf.

Chatting together in the foyer during the intermission were Mrs. T. Barnet Plimpton and Mrs. Alvah R. Pierce. Mrs. Lawrence Lowell Reeve brightened her black frock with red epaulettes and a bag of life red. Her mother, Mrs. George H. Swift, was also present. Mrs. John E. Yerxa wore sables and a sailor of plaid taffeta with her tailored suit, and also impeccably tailored was Mrs. Alfred R. McIntyre, in gray, with sables.

Still others we glimpsed in the throng were Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Mrs. J. Brooks Fenno, Jr., Mrs. Irving Wright, Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Jr., Miss Barbara Bremer, Mrs. J. A. Lowell Blake, Mrs. Robert Cushman, Miss Cynthia Forbes, Miss Virginia Hoar, Mrs. Leon Little, Mrs. William Stanley Parker, Mrs. Paul Clark, Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears, Miss Mary Coolidge, Mrs. Edgar Pierce, Miss Katharine Ladd, Mrs. Walter Powers, Mr. and Mrs. Howard S. Hayward, Miss Ernestine Hills, Miss Jeannie Robinson, Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Mrs. Alexander Steinert and her daughter, Mrs. Samuel J. Newman, Mrs. Morgan H. Harris and Mrs. Harris J. Nelson.

Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The 59th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to an end with the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening. For the actual last number—and the culmination of the orchestra's commemoration of Tchaikovsky's 100th birthday—Serge Koussevitzky has chosen the Russian's Fifth Symphony, in E minor. Preceding this tonal memoir of neurotic strife, and completely different from it, is the Second Symphony of Beethoven.

Meetings after absence and leave-takings, too, have an emotional tension, as true of the first and last symphony concerts as of anything else. Thus the Friday audience was particularly responsive to music and performance yesterday afternoon. If they have begun to get away from the habit of rising when the conductor first appears for his seasonal farewell, at the end they still linger to applaud, stamp and cheer, especially after such a rousing finish as that of Tchaikovsky's E minor Symphony.

Since the Tchaikovsky performances have been of a commemorative nature it is just as well not to go far into the subject of that still debated composer. So far as the general public is concerned, and that is the most important part of the battle for any composer, Tchaikovsky is a classic of the last century, known and loved for perhaps half a dozen works in addition to the last three symphonies. Scholarly purists will tell you Tchaikovsky is not so much, while more broad-minded observers will point out his virtues and admit the faults from which he never became free.

It is regrettable that Mr. Koussevitzky could not have given us a little of the less familiar Tchaikovsky, such as the C major Serenade for strings or the "Rococo" Variations. These represent a lighter side of the composer. Even the "Nutcracker" Suite, at least as played by a virtuoso orchestra, wouldn't have done badly for this observance. There is too much gloom, grief and nervous shock in hearing the last three symphonies one after another, with nothing else of Tchaikovsky for variety.

However one may feel about the music itself—and that is entirely a matter of individual preference, neither to be challenged nor rationalized—on Mr. Koussevitzky's performances there can be little dissenting opinion. Just as he had made the "Pathetic" and the Fourth, the Fifth was a technical tour de force and an emotional intoxication, a prime example of the magic in the art of a great orchestral interpreter.

Beethoven, as Mr. Koussevitzky doubtless had intended, was airy, stimulating and conducive to high spirits, providing a perfect foil to Tchaikovsky. Mr. Koussevitzky is not one to over-refine early Beethoven, and that is probably to his credit. Yesterday's performance was neither Haydnesque nor suggestive of later Beethoven, but fittingly in between.

As the orchestra ends its 59th season Mr. Koussevitzky rounds out his 16th as conductor. Players and conductor are at the height of their powers, a fabulous instrument unrivaled today.—C. W. D.

Regis College Night At Pops May 11

Additions to the list of patrons and patronesses for Regis College night at the Pops, May 11, are Mr. and Mrs. John M. Broderick, Mr. and Mrs. Bernard O'Keeffe, Mr. and Mrs. James F. Graham, Mrs. Stephen Wickham, Mr. and Mrs. John R. McCourt, Mr. and Mrs. John W. Gahan, Miss Mary Kittredge, Mr. and Mrs. Robert L. Norton, Dr. and Mrs. Walter F. Mahoney, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Maloney, Mr. and Mrs. James H. Murphy, Miss May Guiney, Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Fitzpatrick, Mr. and Mrs. Frank P. Scully and Mr. and Mrs. James H Carney.

Subscribing and planning to bring guests are Mr. and Mrs. Leo A MacDonald. Mrs Elizabeth Averill O'Brien, Mrs. William DaCoste, Mrs. Joseph L. Powers, Mrs. Thomas Kelly, Mrs. Walter Falvey, Mrs. Walter Cheever and Mrs. Edward P. Croft. Mrs. Joseph V. Carroll, chairman of the Guild, and Mrs. Edmund McGreenery of the alumnae have charge of the distribution of tickets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAY 5 - 1940

Boston's Best Musical Minds Bothered Over Balloting on Leading Composers

By JOHN TEBBEL

UP Boston way, where the solving of great intellectual problems is an everyday thing, the best musical minds in the city are only now emerging from a brisk workout with one of the season's better dilemmas.

It was a case of inexorable opinion pitted against the unyielding laws of mathematics. Boston wanted 70 musicians, concert patrons and music writers to vote and pick out the greatest composers of all time. The names, it was promised, would be chiseled on the frieze of the new Edward Hatch Memorial Shell, now under construction as a permanent home for the summer Esplanade concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Architect Passes the Buck

Richard Shaw, architect of the shell, passed the buck to the trustees of the Maria Hatch Bequest. Mr. Shaw said he didn't care whether Beethoven or Irving Berlin's name appeared on the stone dome of his shell, but he did want to make it plain that the total of letters from all the names must not exceed 550. No more room, he added.

People took an immediate interest in the idea. The new shell, costing more than $200,000, will be probably the finest in the country, offering patrons the most perfect acoustics enjoyed by any summer concerts audience. Consequently, the patrons' representatives felt responsible for any handiwork engraved upon its magnificent surface.

The trustees passed the buck on up to Arthur Fiedler, founder and conductor of the concerts, and to Serge Koussevitzky himself.

Nominated 97 Composers

After an unspecified period of mental agony, the two maestros offered a ballot to decide the question. It bore the names of 97 composers, ranging from J. des Pres, born in 1445, to George Gershwin. In a commendable effort to avoid any more controversy than necessary, no living composers were included. On the other hand, Gershwin was tossed in to compete with Beethoven on his own merits.

The ballot had seven divisions, some of them rather arbitrary: pre-classical, classical, romantic, modern, operatic, American and popular. Pre-classical, for instance, listed Bach, Buxtehude, Byrd, Corelli, Gabrielli, Handel, Lasso, Palestrina, des Pres, Purcell, Scarlatti, Vittoria and Vivaldi. The voters were allowed to check no more than five of these names.

Similarly, limits were set in the other divisions: no more than 5 in classical, 15 in romantic, 5 in modern, 8 in operatic, 6 in American, 5 in popular.

The "popular" section, for purposes of the record, listed Albeniz, Auber, Delibes, Granados, Grieg, Offenbach, Pierne, Rubinstein, Saint-Saens, Strauss, Sullivan, von Suppe and Thomas.

67 Ballots Cast

Sixty-seven of the 70 invited voters responded. When the ballots were totalled by a method resembling the count in proportional representation voting, the entrepreneurs found some to-be-expected results, others less than unorthodox. Named for undying perpetuation on the new shell's granite dome was a list of composers which is likely to precipitate enough controversy to last out the summer.

All 67 tabulators voted for Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, Brahms, Debussy and Wagner.

All but one voted for Schubert and Schumann.

All but two listed Handel.

All but three were in favor of Mendelssohn and MacDowell.

Sixteen other composers got 50 or more votes: Palestrina, Chopin, Franck, Tschaikovsky, Berlioz, Verdi, Strauss, Liszt, Rimsky-Korsakov, Ravel, Bizet, Moussorgsky, Grieg, Gluck, Saint-Saens, Sullivan.

Just inside the company of the elect were a dozen more who got less than 50 but more than 35 votes: Dvorak, Rameau, Weber, Foote, Offenbach, Purcell, Monteverdi, Puccini, Rossini, Chadwick, Foster and Gounod.

Hair-Splitting Problem

Here the nominating committee fell into a problem of hair-splitting. For instance, Wolf got one more vote than Sousa and thus won a place on the list, although it might be argued that Esplanade fans would rather see Sousa's name on the frieze.

Another argument came up. How about living composers who could be presumed to have completed a major part of their work, like Sibelius and Stravinsky? And if you included them, how about a man like Prokofieff whose work is likely far from completed but nevertheless has already won a permanent place for himself?

These questions and others now plague the gentlemen entrusted with compiling a list for Architect Shaw. On the matter of arithmetic, there is considerable margin. Counting only those names chosen by ballot, not the others in question, there are 189 spaces left. The margin doesn't have to be filled; it's there if needed. At the moment, it looks like a tight squeeze but a good fit.

Agree on Three Points

Now that the worst of the struggle is over, everyone involved is willing to agree on at least three points:

That the list will certainly be representative, if nothing else;

That the results of the voting prove nothing in particular except that, discounting the old masters, people like composers whose music is programmatic in character;

That, in the last vulgar analysis, the frieze of the new shell will be the greatest non-political chisel in Boston's history.

It also proves something else, to us at least: That a harmless way of going mad and driving your friends to desperation is to sit down with a group of people and let them try to pick out the names of the composers most worth saving in a wicked world—meanwhile limiting the total to 550 letters of the alphabet.

If our keeper lets us out, we'll meet you at the new Esplanade Shell.

SUMMARY OF SYMPHONY SEASON

War Played Part in Boston Orchestra's Past Year

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

BECAUSE of the 25th anniversary of the founding of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, the Symphony season of 1939-40 began with considerable emphasis on the native composer. And because Tchaikovsky was born on May 7, 1840, three of his symphonies were heard in the final concerts. Since Dr. Koussevitzky coupled a Beethoven symphony with each of Tchaikovsky's, there was a little more Beethoven than usual: nine works, all told, including six symphonies, plus the Allegretto of No. 7, played in memory of Dr. Muck. And finally, thanks to Igor Stravinsky's temporary residence in Cambridge, two pairs of concerts were given over to his music, with him as conductor.

The war played its part, though a small one, in shaping the season's course. No one of the players was permanently detained in Europe, though some were late in arriving. Prokofieff, who was to have appeared as soloist in one of his concertos, was not permitted to leave Russia. It is not likely that the war had anything to do with Dr. Koussevitzy's failure to perform Mahler's "Song of the Earth," though it probably did prevent, indirectly, the originally announced concert performance of Tchaikovsky's opera, "Pique Dame."

* * * *

Of the new works, easily the most important was Hindemith's Violin Concerto, superbly played by Richard Burgin. Walter Piston's Concertino for Piano (Mr. Sanroma), new to the Symphony Concerts, if not to Boston, pleased mightily. Less successful in this reviewer's opinion were the Violin Concerto of Bloch (Mr. Szigeti), the Symphonie Concertante of Szymanowski (Mr. Smeterlin), the 'Cello Concerto of Prokofieff (Mr. Piatigorsky).

Pleasant, if not of great import, were Hill's Concerto for Strings, Ibert's chamber concertino for saxophone, (Sigurd Rascher), George Foote's Suite, "In Praise of Winter," the "Overture Joyeuse" of Poot and Toch's overture "Pinocchio." Hanson's Third Symphony, conducted first by the composer and then by Dr. Koussevitzky, proved uncomfortably Sibelian. William Schuman's "American Festival" overture had vitality, if no great distinction. Stravinsky's "Card Game" might be described as aggressively innocuous. Hardly worth the trouble of playing were Koutzen's Concerto for five solo instruments and string orchestra and Lopatnikoff's Second Symphony.

Certain established composers were represented by pieces new to the symphony concerts, namely, Rossini's overture to "La Gazza Ladra," Reger's Variations on a Theme of Mozart, Sibelius' "Lemminkainen's Homeward Journey." All were good to hear. Incidentally, we owed these three works to the season's guest conductors, Nikolai Malko and Tauno Hannikainen, whose appearances were in every way successful.

Not only was the season rich in incident, as the above tabulation suggests, but the level of performance was extraordinarily high, the range of repertory as wide as might be. Already we can look forward to the orchestra's 60th season and its 17th under the brilliant leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. In the meantime, the Pops are directly before us. On Wednesday evening Arthur Fiedler will open their 55th season, and his own 11th as their conductor, with a representative programme that appears elsewhere in these columns.

THIS WEEK AT THE POPS

WEDNESDAY EVENING
Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"	Rossini
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier"	Richard Strauss
Csardas from "Ritter Pasman"	Johann Strauss
Facade	Walton
Triana, from "Iberia"	Albeniz
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Mexican Rhapsody	McBride
Indian Summer	Herbert
Stars and Stripes Forever, March	Sousa
THURSDAY EVENING
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"	Berlioz
Overture to "Der Freischutz"	Weber
Fugue a la Gigue	Bach-Holst
Austrian Peasant Dances	Schonherr
Suite from "Carmen"	Bizet
Pavane for a Dead Infanta	Ravel
Finale, Fourth Symphony	Tchaikovsky
"Smoke Drift"	Peggy Stuart
Piano Soloist, Peggy Stuart
Entrance of the Little Fauns	Pierne
First Slavonic Dance	Dvorak
FRIDAY EVENING
Coronation March from "The Prophet"	Meyerbeer
"The Moldau," Symphonic Poem	Smetana
"To a Wild Rose"	MacDowell
Waltz Scene from "Faust"	Gounod
Prelude to "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"	Suppe
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes	Strauss
Song of the Volga Bargemen	Arranged by Glazounov
Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar
SATURDAY EVENING
"Semper Fidelis," March	Sousa
Overture to "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Hymn to St. Cecilia	Gounod
"Samson and Delilah," Fantasia	Saint-Saens
Concertstuck	Weber
Soloist, Leo Litwin
"Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree," Variations	Weinberger
Songs by the Regis College Glee Club:
Gypsy Song from "Carmen"	Bizet
"Jeanie With the Light Brown Hair"	Foster
"Voices of Spring," Waltzes	Strauss
Dance of the Buffoons, from "Snow maiden"	Rimsky-Korsakoff

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

MAY 5 - 1940

63

HOW FARE THE LIVING

Season's Record of American Works Played By Our Major Orchestras

By OLIN DOWNES

THE lists of performances of American symphonic compositions which appear on the page opposite should be of interest. The American composer has often complained that his opportunities for a hearing are limited. The writer cannot assume authority to answer him in the affirmative or negative, although his impression has been that orchestras and other instrumentalities earnestly seek rather than sedulously avoid the opportunity to reveal to their audiences native music of value.

It is also to be remembered that symphony concerts alone are not the only places where American music is performed. Choral societies, chamber music organizations, singers, instrumentalists also perform American music, while in the field of "popular" and entertainment music the American composer, at least in his own land, is supreme.

But the complaint is usually that our symphony orchestras of highest rank, led in almost every instance by European conductors, show very little interest in composers of the land where they spend at least the major part of their time and activities, and that these same conductors, being of a necessity European in their viewpoint, have neither the patriotic desire to encourage American composition nor a point of view sympathetic to the American spirit.

THE TIMES has endeavored to secure some ascertainable facts of the situation. Seventeen leading American orchestras were requested to supply us with detailed lists of the names and numbers of American compositions by living American and living European composers which they have performed in the orchestral season just closed. With the exception of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra all have responded.

* * *

IT must be remembered that American symphonic composition, on any broad or significant scale, has of necessity been comparatively a recent thing in the cultural development of this nation. The number of American composers of this generation with the technic and the training to write effectively for orchestra is legion compared to the number of such composers who could adequately express themselves in this medium prior to 1900. Nor does any one pretend that we have yet developed masters of composition to compare, for example, with the still living Richard Strauss or Stravinsky, or the younger Hindemith of Germany, or Sibelius of Finland, or Vaughan Williams of England, whose works figure in the appended list and have inevitably become staples of the symphonic repertory. A comparison of any justness between the number of American and the number of European works by contemporaries offered by our principal orchestras should actually consist in the number of works by the younger generation of foreign and native composers, which rule may be modified or not by the reader, but has been followed in the succeeding comments.

On this basis the findings are highly instructive. Thus the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York, conducted by John Barbirolli, has performed this season nine works by living Americans. Two of these were given first performances anywhere, and a third a first performance in its entirety; two were played for the first time by this orchestra. The other performances of native works were repetitions. Against this one puts a "world première" of one European composition and performances of three American compositions for the first time in America. If we discount the names of Sibelius, Stravinsky, Vaughan Williams, Rachmaninoff, Dohnanyi, de Falla and Prokofieff, we have a total of eleven performances of works by the younger generation of living Europeans.

The NBC Symphony Orchestra, led by Arturo Toscanini, Désiré Defauw, Bruno Walter and Bernardino Molinari, has offered three works by living Americans, one of them presented for the first time, while, with the omission of Stravinsky, Prokofieff and de Falla, the works of contemporaneous Europeans numbered four.

* * *

THE Philadelphia Orchestra, conducted by Eugene Ormandy and Leopold Stokowski, has offered six scores by living Americans and, omitting the names of Bartók, Enesco, Glière, Prokofieff, Rachmaninoff, Sibelius, Strauss and Stravinsky, three by Europeans, including a first American performance of the violin concerto of Alexander Tansman.

The Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, has given three "first times" of American works, two "first performances in Boston," and, barring the violin concerto of Ernest Bloch, who is an American citizen but of the older generation, and of Lopatnikoff's Second symphony, the work of an American only recently naturalized, twelve American compositions in all. Of European composers there was a first performance of Paul Hindemith's violin concerto, a first performance of Prokofieff's 'cello concerto, a first performance of Ibert—three European novelties.

The Chicago Symphony, under Frederick Stock, has given eight first performances in Chicago and two other presentations of American music, including Mr. Stock's 'cello concerto, he being of the older generation of Americans. Of European works there were seven first performances. Outside of Bax, Glière, Kodály, et al., there were three performances of living European composers and twenty in all.

The Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, led by Artur Rodzinski, gave one American work, Arthur Shephard's symphony, for the first time anywhere; nine first performances in Cleveland, and a total of thirteen works by North Americans and one by the distinguished South American Villa-Lobos. Of European works, exclusive of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," eight first performances in Cleveland were given, aside from those of the established Europeans already mentioned. In all thirteen living European composers were represented.

The Cincinnati Symphony, under Eugene Goossens, played seven works by living Americans and thirteen by living Europeans.

* * *

THE Rochester Symphony Orchestra has not only its regular subscription series, of which José Iturbi is the principal conductor, but also its special series of concerts to encourage American compositions, given under the wing and usually under the baton of Dr. Howard Hanson, himself a leading American composer. The Rochester Symphony gave more than forty performances of American works, eight of these being "first times."

The National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D. C., under Hans Kindler, gave one "world première" of Spier's "Symphonic Visions" and six first performances in Washington—a total of eight American works, and, omitting Alfven as well as Strauss, Sibelius, de Falla, five scores by contemporaneous composers of Europe.

The Indianapolis Orchestra, which, under Fabien Sevitsky, gives an American work on every program, gave seven "world premières" of American music and a total of twenty-six performances of native compositions. Of living Europeans, two were performed for the first time in Indianapolis.

The Detroit Symphony, under Franco Ghione, has one "world première" of an American composition and six performances of native works in all, as against four first performances in Detroit of music by living Europeans.

The Minneapolis Symphony, under Dimitri Mitropoulos, had two world premières of American works and two first times in Minneapolis, and one world première and four first Minneapolis performances of European works, including Weinberger's "Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree," the work of a mature European, well established years ago in Europe, which went the round of "first times" with most of the American orchestras and has been included in these calculations.

St. Louis, under Vladimir Golschmann, had four first times in St. Louis of American works, and, omitting the long-established Europeans, one novelty from abroad, a Fanfare by Darius Milhaud.

The Los Angeles Symphony, under various guest conductors, had three world premières for American composers, and one first time in Los Angeles. It had one European novelty, by the conductor and composer Alfred Coates, his "Guinevere" symphony.

* * *

THE American composer, it seems, has not done so badly this season, in the symphonic field alone. This excludes symphonies and operatic works composed for radio performances by order of the radio organization themselves, the immense encouragement given the American composer by the American Federation of Music Clubs and a host of other organizations

The writer adds that in recent weeks he listened devotedly—and sometimes to the exclusion of concerts which would have offered higher technical standards and, as it developed, considerably more important music—to concerts devoted especially to native music. Certainly there is better American music than most of the works that he heard on these occasions. But it must be said that the opportunities given American composers at these concerts were superior to the advantages taken of them.

That is all right, and as it should be. The native composer should be given all possible opportunity and careful attention in his development. On the basis of first fragmentary findings of this inquiry, it is submitted that he is given encouragement fully commensurate with his showing up to date, and that his principal task, as has been remarked more than once in these columns, is to measure up to his opportunities.

MONDAY, MAY 6, 1940

AMUSEMENTS

'Pops' Open Wednesday

Next Wednesday night, the Pop Concerts will open their 55th season at Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler, for the 11th consecutive season, will preside as the Pops conductor over a full sized orchestra of symphony players. Symphony Hall will appear in its gayer summer garb, with tables covering the floor at which refreshments will be served.

The first Sunday concert, May 12 has been taken over for Finnish relief, and will have a notable Finnish guest conductor in Tauno Hannikainen. Monday, May 13, will bring an annual Harvard Night, with numbers by the Harvard Glee Club.

The opening programme will be as follows:

Wednesday, May 8

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Overture to 'La Gazza Ladra"	Rossini
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier"	Richard Strauss
Czardas from "Ritter Pasman"	Johann Strauss
Facade	Walton
Triana, from "Iberia"	Albeniz
Marche Slave (In commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of the composer, May 7, 1840)	Tchaikovsky
Mexican Rhapsody	McBride
Indian Summer	Herbert
Stars and Stripes Forever, March	Sousa

POPULAR CONDUCTOR is Arthur Fiedler who will lead the Pops opening Wednesday night at Symphony Hall.

FINNISH CONCERT

Going outside the realm of Finnish music for the first time since his arrival in Boston in January, Tauno Hannikainen, foremost Finnish conductor, will direct the full Boston Pops Orchestra in a program of music by Brahms as well as Sibelius next Sunday evening May 12, at Symphony Hall. This is a special symphonic concert to aid Finland, given on one of the evenings of the Pops series by courtesy of the trustees of Symphony Hall.

One of the features of the concert will be the performance of the last two movements of the Second Symphony of Sibelius, the most finished of all the Sibellian symphonies in the opinion of Mr. Hannikainen, a personal friend of the Finnish composer. The second half of the program will be devoted to Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C Minor.

Proceeds of the concert will be devoted to Finnish relief and reconstruction. Tickets may be secured at the box office, Symphony Hall.

Globe May 5

By CYRUS W. DURGIN

"SPRING" SYMPHONY—Victor Album M-655, $8. Completely appropriate is Victor's featured release for May, the "Spring" Symphony of Robert Schumann, performed by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here is genuine music of Spring, having that warmth, radiance and high spirits associated with the present time of the year. Incidentally it is also a great masterpiece of 19th century German romantic composition.

As a rule superlatives are best avoided in estimates of musical performance. One is willing, however, to say that to him the Koussevitzky reading of the "Spring" Symphony could hardly be improved. First, the tone quality is that which Bostonians find at Symphony Hall during the orchestral season. Secondly, the performance is at once clear, balanced, cohesive yet "Romantic" through and through. As always with Koussevitzky, one immediately perceives that touch of personal distinction which sets apart a great performance from a merely good one.

An elder German would probably slow down some of the tempi and give us a sense of beery ease. That is quite foreign to the temperament of Mr. Koussvitzky, but conversely his Slavic intensity does not carry him beyond the bounds of good style. Where Koussevitzky excels is his sculptural molding of phrases, his romantic ardor and his infinite patience with small details, down to a split second's time for a sustained chord or a conspicuous rest.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Pops Begin Wednesday Evening

Another two months of Pop Concerts will begin at Symphony Hall Wednesday evening. When Arthur Fiedler steps to the conductor's stand to start the famous March from "Tannhauser" he will open the 55th season of these unique concerts, and his 11th year as leader of the Pops Orchestra of Symphony men.

As usual, Symphony Hall will be done over in the familiar Summer decorations of green and gold, the big chandelier suspended over the orchestra, and there will be tables covering the floor. At the tables smoking is permitted, and refreshments are served.

Mr. Fiedler's programs will follow his custom of recent seasons, assembling familiar favorites of long standing and recent novelties suitable to presentation by a large symphonic orchestra. One of the latter will be heard on opening night, the "Mexican Rhapsody" by the American composer Robert McBride. There will be Sunday evening concerts during May.

The first Sunday concert, May 12, will benefit Finnish relief and reconstruction, and will bring Tauno Hannikainen as guest conductor. The program will consist of music by Sibelius and Brahms. Monday evening, May 13, will be Harvard Night, at which there will be numbers by the Harvard Glee Club. The Pops begin at 8:30.

Pops Conductor

ARTHUR FIEDLER

He will enter his 11th year as conductor of the Symphony Hall Pops when the 55th season of those unique concerts begins Wednesday evening.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAY 6 - 1940

350 Attend Concert For Finnish Aid

Three hundred and fifty attended the concert by a group of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Belmont Hall, sponsored by the Finland Aid Committee. Oskari Tokoi of Fitchburg, Finnish newspaperman, was the principal speaker. A sum of $262.23 was received for Finnish relief.

Ludwig Juht and Karl Lamb, 'cellists, played. Also heard was Louis Wilson, 11, and Mrs. Sofia Stunberg, pianists. Vocalists included Mrs. Juht, soprano, and Albert Hommer, tenor, of Boston.

The committee: Mr. and Mrs. John Martilla, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Saaret, Mr. and Mrs. John Illvoset, Mr. and Mrs. Nikolai Hallilat, Mr. and Mrs. John Hermanson, Mr. and Mrs. John Liukkoset, Mrs. Jennie Salmi, Mrs. Elna Ruostoja and Mr. and Mrs. K. E. Ylitalot.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Morning
Wall St. Journal

MAY 7 - 1940

"Farewell Symphony"

The presentation of Jan Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" at Boston's Symphony Hall by Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra, dressed in the costumes of Haydn's period, recalls the Austrian musician's motive for its composition.

It was while Haydn was conductor of Prince Esterhazy's orchestra that he composed this beautiful orchestral work. A short time before its preparation Haydn asked for an extended vacation; but the Prince, expecting some important visitors, urged the conductor to cancel his plans temporarily. Haydn, undiscouraged, ingeniously repeated his request in musical form by so arranging the instrumentation of the last movement of the symphony that one by one the musicians in the orchestra would stop, pick up their instruments, blow out the candles on their stands, and walk out of the room, leaving but two musicians to play the last bar of the movement.

Needless to say, the "Farewell Symphony" gained the desired leave of absence for Jan Haydn.

The Nation's Principal Orchestras' Record of Modern Works

Times May 5

Most of America's major orchestras have completed or are completing their seasons, and the time has come for summaries. Since the question of how the American composer fares as compared with his European contemporary is debated at all times, we have undertaken a survey to obtain the facts. Here they are, in the season's record for sixteen of the nation's principal ensembles.—Ed.

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Sanders ....Little Symphony in G
Barber ....Adagio for Strings (First time by orchestra)
Powell ...."Set of Three" Suite (First complete American performance)
Kurthy ...."Puszta"
Noble ....Introduction and Passacaglia in G minor
Taylor ....From "Ramuntcho" (First time by orchestra)
Stoessel ...."Garrick" Suite
Herrmann ......"Moby Dick" (First performance)
Fuleihan ......Sinfonia Concertante (First performance)

By Europeans

Weinberger ..."Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree" (World Première)
From "Schwanda"
Walton ...."Portsmouth Point" Overture (First time by orchestra)
Castelnuovo-Tedesco ......Concerto for piano (First time in America)
"Twelfth Night" Overture (First time in America)
Ibert ....Chamber Concertino for saxophone (First time in New York)
Bliss ...."Checkmate" Suite (First public performance in New York)
Concerto for two pianos (First time in New York)
Sibelius ...."Finlandia"
Symphony No. 3
"Pohjola's Daughter" (First time by orchestra)
Symphony No. 2
Symphony No. 1
Stravinsky ...."Apollon Musagètes" Suite (First time by orchestra)
"Petrushka" Suite
"Jeu de Cartes" Suite (First time by orchestra)
"The Firebird" Suite
"Le Chant du Rossignol"
"Le Sacre du Printemps"
Dohnanyi ......"The Veil of the Pierrette" Suite (First time by orchestra)
Symphonische Minuten (First time in New York)
Shostakovich..."L'Age d'Or" Suite (First time in New York in concert performance)
Prokofieff ......Symphonie Classique
Zador ....Rondo (First time in New York)
Weiner ....Divertimento, No. 2 (First time in America)
Williams ......"A London Symphony"
Rachmaninoff.Concerto in D minor
Britten ....Concerto in D minor for violin
de Falla ....From "The Three-Cornered Hat"

NATIONAL BROADCASTING COMPANY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Strong ...."Night," Symphonic Suite (First time in America)
Taylor ...."Through the Looking Glass" Suite
Harris ....Symphony No. 3

By Europeans

Prokofieff ....."Classical" Symphony
Poot ....Ouverture Joyeuse
Stravinsky ...."Petrushka" Suite
Pizzetti ....Concerto dell' Estate de Falla ....From "La Vida Breve" Rossellini ......"Canto di Palude"
Castelnuovo-Tedesco ......"The Taming of the Shrew" Overture

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Davis ...."The Last Knight," Symphonic Poem
Hill ....Sinfonietta for string orchestra
McCollin ...."Heavenly Children at Play," Scherzo for strings
McDonald ....."San Juan Capistrano"; "Santa Fe" Suite; "The Arkansas Traveler"
Thompson .....Symphony No. 2
Vardell ....Symphony No. 1; Cantata, "The Inimitable Lovers"

By Europeans

Bartók ....Deux Images pour Orchestre
Enesco ....Rumanian Rhapsody
Glière ....Symphony No. 3
Prokofieff ....."Lieutenant Kije" Suite; "Peter and the Wolf"; "Classical" Symphony
Rachmaninoff.Symphony No. 2; Symphony No. 3; "The Bells" Symphony; Concertos, Nos. 1, 2 and 3; Rhapsody on a Theme of Paginini; "The Island of the Dead"
Sibelius ....Symphony No. 7; "En Saga"; "Oceanides"; "Return of Lemminkainen"; "Finlandia"; "The Swan of Tuonela"
Strauss ...."Don Quixote" "Death and Transfiguration"; "Rosenkavalier" Waltzes
Stravinsky ...."The Firebird" Suite"
Tansman ......Concerto for viola (First time in America)
Weiner ....Divertimento for strings
Zador ...."The Machine Man" Suite

BOSTON SYMPHONY

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Bloch ....Violin Concerto (First time in Boston)
Carpenter ....."Skyscrapers"
George Foote.."In Praise of Winter" Suite (First performance)
Hanson ....Symphony No. 3 (First performance)
Harris ....Symphony No. 3
Hill ....Violin Concerto
Koutzen ....Concerto for five solo instruments and strings (First time in Boston)
Lopatnikoff ...Symphony No. 2 (First performance)
McDonald ....."San Juan Capistrano" (First performance)
Piston ....Piano Concertino
Schuman ......"American Festival" Overture
Thompson .....Symphony No. 2

By Europeans

Hindemith ...."Mathis der Maler"; Violin Concerto (First performance)
Ibert ....Concertino for saxophone (First performance in America)
Poot ...."Joyeuse" Overture
Prokofieff .....'Cello concerto (First American performance); "Classical" Symphony; Violin Concerto No. 2
Stravinsky ....Two programs of his own works, conducted by composer
Shostakovich ..Symphony No. 1
Szymanowski..Symphonie Concertante for piano and orchestra (First time in Boston)
Sibelius ....Symphonies and other works

CHICAGO SYMPHONY

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Barber ...."The School for Scandal" Overture (First time in Chicago)
Bloch ...."Evocations," Symphonic Suite (First time in Chicago)
Borowski ......"Ecce Homo" (First time in Chicago)
Fuleihan ......Concerto for piano and orchestra (First time in Chicago)
Harris ....Symphony No. 3
Hill ...."Lilacs," Poem for orchestra (First time in Chicago)
Miller ...."Appalachian Mountains," American Folk Rhapsody (First time in Chicago)
Schuman ......"American Festival" Overture (First time in Chicago)
Stock ....Concerto for 'cello and orchestra
White ...."A Pagan Festival" Overture (First time in Chicago)

By Europeans

Babin ....Concerto for two pianos and orchestra (First time in Chicago)
Bax ...."November Woods," Symphonic Poem
Brusselmans ..Suite after the Caprices by Paganini (First time in Chicago)
Gliere ....Symphony No. 3
Kodály ...."Hary Janos" Suite
Muradeli ......Symphony No. 1 (First time in Chicago)
Prokofieff ....."Peter and the Wolf" (First time in Chicago)
Rachmaninoff.Symphony No. 2; Concerto for piano, No. 3
Sibelius ....Symphony No. 3; Symphony No. 4
Strauss ...."Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Tone Poem; From "Salome"; Serenade for wind instruments; Finale from "Salome"; Three songs with orchestra (First time in Chicago)
Stravinsky ...."Petrushka" Suite; Ballet, "Jeu de Cartes" (First time in Chicago)
Weinberger ..."Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree" (First time in Chicago)

CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Hanson ....Symphony No. 3 (First time in Cleveland)
Harris ....Symphony No. 3 (First time in Cleveland)
Levant ...."Dirge," in memory of George Gershwin (First time in Cleveland)
Piston ....Concerto for orchestra (First time in Cleveland)
Shepherd ......Symphony No. 2 (World premiere)
Still ....Symphony (First time in Cleveland)
Van Vactor....Symphony (First time in Cleveland)
Villa-Lobos ....Choros, No. 10 (First time in Cleveland)
Grofé ....From "Grand Canyon" Suite
McDonald .....From "Festival of the Workers" (First time in Cleveland); From "Rhumba" Symphony
Powell ...."In Old Virginia" Overture
Skilton ....From "Suite Primeval"
Stix ...."Spielerei" (First time in Cleveland)
Stoessel ...."Nodding Mandarins" (First time in Cleveland)

By Europeans

Brusselmans ..Suite after the Caprices of Paganini (First time in Cleveland)
Enesco ....Rumanian Rhapsody, No. 1
Poulenc ....Concerto for two pianos and orchestra (First time in Cleveland)
Prokofieff .....Overture on Jewish Themes (First time in Cleveland); "Peter and the Wolf" (First time in Cleveland)
Tansman ......Sonatine Transatlantique (First time in Cleveland)
Walton ....Concerto for violin and orchestra (World premiere)
Weinberger ...."Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree" (First time in Cleveland)
Wiechowicz ..."Chmiel" (First time in Cleveland)
Rachmaninoff.Concerto for piano (First time in Cleveland in revised form); Five Picture Studies (First time in Cleveland); Symphony No. 2
Sibelius ....Symphony Nos. 2 and 5; "Finlandia"; "Valse Triste"
Strauss ...."Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; "Sinfonia Domestica" (First time in Cleveland); "Ein Heldenleben" Stravinsky ...."Fire-Bird Suite"
Turina ....Procession of the Dew

CINCINNATI SYMPHONY

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Rodgers ...."Ghost Town"
Mason ...."A Lincoln Symphony"
Whithorne ...."New York Days and Nights"
Kelley ...."The Pit and the Pendulum"
Rogers ...."The Song of the Nightingale"
Sowerby ....Concerto for organ and orchestra
Bilotti ....Concerto for piano and orchestra

By Europeans

Toch ...."Pinocchio" Overture de Falla ...."Nights in the Gardens of Spain"
Dohnanyi ......Suite
Strauss ...."Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"
Zador ....Dance Symphony
Stravinsky ...."The Fire-Bird" Suite
Brusselmans ..Suite on the Caprices of Paganini
Sibelius ....Symphony No. 5
Casadesus .....Concerto for two pianos and orchestra (First time in America)
Ireland ....Concertino Pastorale
Bliss ....Concerto for two pianos and orchestra
Goossens ......"Tam O'Shanter's Ride"; Symphony (World première)

ROCHESTER PHILHARMONIC

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Rudin ...."Legende"
White ...."Lake Spray"

By Europeans

Amfitheatrof..."Panorama Americain"
Sibelius ....Symphony No. 1; "Finlandia," Symphony No. 2
Bax ...."The Garden of Fand"
Strauss ...."Rosenkavalier" Waltzes
Grignon ...."Andalusia"
Turina ...."Orgia"
de Falla ....From "El Amor Brujo"; "Sombrero" Pittaluga ......"La Romeria de los Cornudos"
Font y Anta..."Jota de Alcaniz"
Navarro ...."Danza Castellana"

ROCHESTER AMERICAN COMPOSERS SERIES

Works by de Filippi, Maynard, Young, Wagner, Bergsma, Prydatkevytch, Inch, Phillips, Howard, Howe, Mourant, Wood, Gould, Koehler, von Bomhard, Beckhelm, Rogers, Hier, Hitchcock, Britain, Mason, Braine, Read, Smith, Hill, White, Wayne, Barlow, Keller, Carpenter, Hanson, Haines, Johnson, Kennan, Diamond, Donovan, Jacobi, Copland, Harris, Woltmann, Piston, Skilton.

NATIONAL SYMPHONY, WASHINGTON

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Carpenter .....Concertino (First time in Washington)
Grainger ......Fanfare (First time in Washington)
Spier ....Symphonic Visions (World première)
Sowerby ...."Comes Autumn Time" (First time in Washington)
Creston ...."Choric Dances" (First time in Washington)
Hanson ....Symphony No. 2 (First time in Washington)
Howe ...."Castellana"
Villa-Lobos ...."Momo Precoce" (First time in this country)

By Europeans

Strauss ...."Aus Italien" (First time in Washington); Finale, from "Salome" (First time in Washington)
Rathaus ...."Uriel Acosta" (First performance in America)
Messiaen ......"Les Offrandes Oubliées" (First time in Washington)
Alfven ...."Midsommervaka" (First time in Washington)
Sibelius ....Symphony No. 2, and other works de Falla.........Dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat" (First time in Washington)
Weinberger ....From "Schwanda"
Stravinsky ...."The Fire-Bird" Suite
Malipiero ......Quatro Vecchie Canzoni (World première)
Pizzetti ...."Epithalamium" (World première)

KANSAS CITY PHILHARMONIC

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Busch ...."My Old Kentucky Home" (Arr. for strings)
Weaver ...."The Squirrel," Tone Poem
Skilton ....Overture
Mason ....Five Songs, "Russians"
Sowerby ....Overture, "Comes Autumn Time"
Thompson .....Symphony No. 2
De Lamarter...Overture, "They Too Went t' Town"; Symphony, "After Walt Whitman"
Busch ....Omaha Indian Love Song
Villa-Lobos ...Choros No. 10

By Europeans

Strauss ...."Der Rosenkavalier" Waltzes; "Don Juan"; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"
Sibelius ...."Finlandia"; Canzonetta for Strings; Symphony No. 2; "The Swan of Tuonela"
Glière ....Overture, "Gulsara" (First time in America)
Williams ......"A London" Symphony; Fantasy on Christmas Carols
Prokofieff ....."Peter and the Wolf"
Poulenc ....Concerto for two pianos and orchestra
Stravinsky ...."The Fire-Bird" Suite
Dohnanyi ......Variations on a Nursery Tune
Enesco ....Rumanian Rhapsody No. 1

SEATTLE SYMPHONY

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Thompson .....Symphony No. 2
Powell ...."Natchez-on-the-Hill"

By Europeans

Works taken from the standard repertoire

INDIANAPOLIS SYMPHONY

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Barber ....Overture, "The School for Scandal"
Bloch ...."In the Night"
Brown ...."The Three Dragons"
Cadman ...."Dark Dancers of the Mardi Gras" Cesana ...."Negro Heaven"
Converse ......"California"; Rhapsody for Clarinet (World première)
Cowell ...."Early American Country Set" (World première)
Dubensky ....."Fanfare"; Fantasie "Tchaikovsky's Country" (World première); "Italian" Overture; Fugue for 18 violins
Fuleihan ......"Fiesta" (World première)
Hadley ...."San Francisco" Suite
Hanson ...."Romantic" Symphony
LaForge ...."Into the Light"
Lessner ...."Sunrise" (World première)
Lewis ...."Ant Reporter Interviews the Bees"
Lundquist .....Symphony No. 1 (1st movement) (World première)
Moore ...."Pageant of P. T. Barnum"
McCollin ......Scherzo
McDonald ....."San Juan Capistrano"
McKay ...."To a Liberator" (World première)
Sanders ....Little Symphony
Tuthill ...."Bethlehem"
White ...."Five Miniatures"

By Europeans

Stravinsky ...."The Fire-Bird" Suite
Weinberger ...."Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree" (First time in Indianapolis)
Sibelius ....Symphony No. 2; "Finlandia"
Zador ...."Czardas" Rhapsody (First time in Indianapolis)
Strauss ....Serenade for Thirteen Wind Instruments
Mascagni ......"Cavalleria Rusticana," in concert form

DETROIT SYMPHONY

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Reddick ...."Armistice Day" (World première)
Paul White ....From "Five Miniatures"
Kelley ....Cantata, "Wedding of Beauty and the Beast" (First performance)
Skilton ....From "Suite Primeval"
Grofé ....From "Mississippi Suite"
Kolar ....From "Americana" Suite

By Europeans

Prokofieff ......"Peter and the Wolf" (First performance); "Classical" Symphony
Sibelius ....Symphony No. 2; "The Swan of Tuonela"; "Finlandia" Enesco ....First Rumanian Rhapsody
Honegger ......"Pacific 231"
Templeton ....."Improvisations"
Novak ....From the "Slovakian Suite"
Gretchaninoff..Theme and Variations (First performance)
Rachmaninoff..Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, for piano and orchestra (First performance)
Zandonai ......"Romeo and Juliet," Symphonic Suite
Weinberger ...."Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree" (First performance)

MINNEAPOLIS SYMPHONY

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Copland ...."El Salon Mexico" (First time in Minneapolis)
Sanders ....Little Symphony (First time in Minneapolis)
Verrall ....Symphony No. 1 (World première)
Woltmann ....."The Coliseum at Night" (World première)

By Europeans

Castagnone ....Prelude Giocoso (First time in Minneapolis)
Cece ....Passacaglia (World première)
Prokofieff ....."Classical" Symphony; "Peter and the Wolf" (First time in Minneapolis)
Rachmaninoff..Symphony No. 3 (First time in Minneapolis)
Sibelius ....Symphony No. 5; "Finlandia"
Strauss ...."Death and Transfiguration"; "Thus Spake Zarathustra"
Stravinsky ...."The Fire-Bird" Suite
Weinberger ....From "Schwanda"; "Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree" (First time in Minneapolis)
Wolf-Ferrari ..Overture, "The Secret of Suzanne"

ST. LOUIS SYMPHONY

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Barber ....Adagio for Strings (First time in St. Louis)
Carpenter ....."Sea Drift" (First time in St. Louis)
Copland ...."El Salon Mexico" (First time in St. Louis)
Hill ....Sinfonietta for string orchestra (First time in St. Louis)

By Europeans

de Falla ....From "The Three-Cornered Hat"
Milhaud ...."Fanfare" (First performance)
Prokofieff ....."Peter and the Wolf"
Ravel ...."Alborada del Gracioso"; "La Valse"
Rosenthal ....."Jeanne d'Arc"
Sibelius ....Symphony No. 2; Symphony No. 7; "Finlandia"; "Valse Triste"
Strauss ...."Thus Spake Zarathustra"; "Don Juan"; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; "Der Rosenkavalier" Waltzes
Stravinsky ....Capri-cio for piano and orchestra; "The Fire-Bird" Suite; "Pulcinella"
Weinberger ....Polka and Fugue

LOS ANGELES PHILHARMONIC

ORIGINAL WORKS

By Americans

Cadman ....Symphony No. 1 (World première)
Warren ....Symphonic Poem, "The Passing of King Arthur" (World première)
Willson ....Symphony No. 2 (World première)
McDonald ....."San Juan Capistrano" (First time in Los Angeles)

By Europeans

Coates ...."Guinevere" Symphony (First American performance)
And other works taken from the standard repertoire

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, TUESDAY, MAY 7, 1940

John B. Sanromá

Getting the Pops Scores Ready

Joseph Mann, trumpet player and copyist, prepares for the season which opens tomorrow night in Symphony Hall. At this work table, behind which are cached the encore announcement cards, he patches torn music and restores measures damaged by wear of many performances.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMES, IA.
TRIBUNE-TIMES

MAY 8 - 1940

Today's Profile

By UNITED PRESS

In the study of his suburban home stands a bass viol and Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky, once Europe's greatest ~~virtuoso, is~~ unable to play it.

With tears in his eyes the conductor of the Botson symphony orchestra explains that he has been so busy for the past five years that he scarcely touches the instrument.

Generally conceded to be the country's leading symphonic conductor, Koussevitzky has trained his 110 players until they came to be known as the nation's finest orchestra. He joined the orchestra in 1924 and raised it from the musical doldrums with sharp, quick criticisms that brought fine playing as a response.

Born in Russia 76 years ago, Koussevitzky went to Moscow when a boy and won a scholarship for instruction on the bass viol. After becoming a virtuoso, he serenaded Natalya Konstantinova on the instrument. He later married her and she helped finance an orchestra for him to conduct. Until 1920 Koussevitzky stayed in Russia. Then he came to America because he was out of sympathy with the bolsheviks.

The prelimianry work of the Boston symphony is done by Koussevitzky in his study. Music litters the room, standing in stacks on the piano, tables and bureau. Diplomas and citations cover the walls.

Koussevitzky sits in an easy chair before a music stand to study the score of forthcoming concerts. However well he knows the music he is going to conduct, he always rehearses at home before he rehearses the orchestra.

At actual performances the haughty, gray-haired Russian is distinguished in appearance in his dress clothes. At rehearsals, however, he becomes a tyrant hunching over in an old sweater, shouting, singing and waving frantically with his baton.

"You must zing," he shouts, "you must blay." His word is law because he can discharge members at will.

One legend says that Koussevitzky became disgusted with the sour notes one musician played. "You are fired. Ged out. Ged out!" the exasperated conductor shouted.

After the rehearsal the musician opened Koussevitzky's dressing room door and bellowed, "Nuts to you, Koussevitzky."

The conductor turned his head slowly and then snapped, "Ged out. It's too late to abologize."

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAY 8 - 1940

Boogie Woogie Quartet With Boston Symphony

Meade Lux Lewis, Albert Ammons and Pete Johnson, boogie-woogie pianists, and Joe Turner, vocalist, in the same classification, are slated to appear in a concert with the Boston Symph June 17 at Boston Symphony Hall.

Program is all-American, including Stephen Foster and George Gershwin in addition to the b.w. Lewis is now at the Famous Door, N. Y., while the other three are at Cafe Society, in Greenwich Village.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

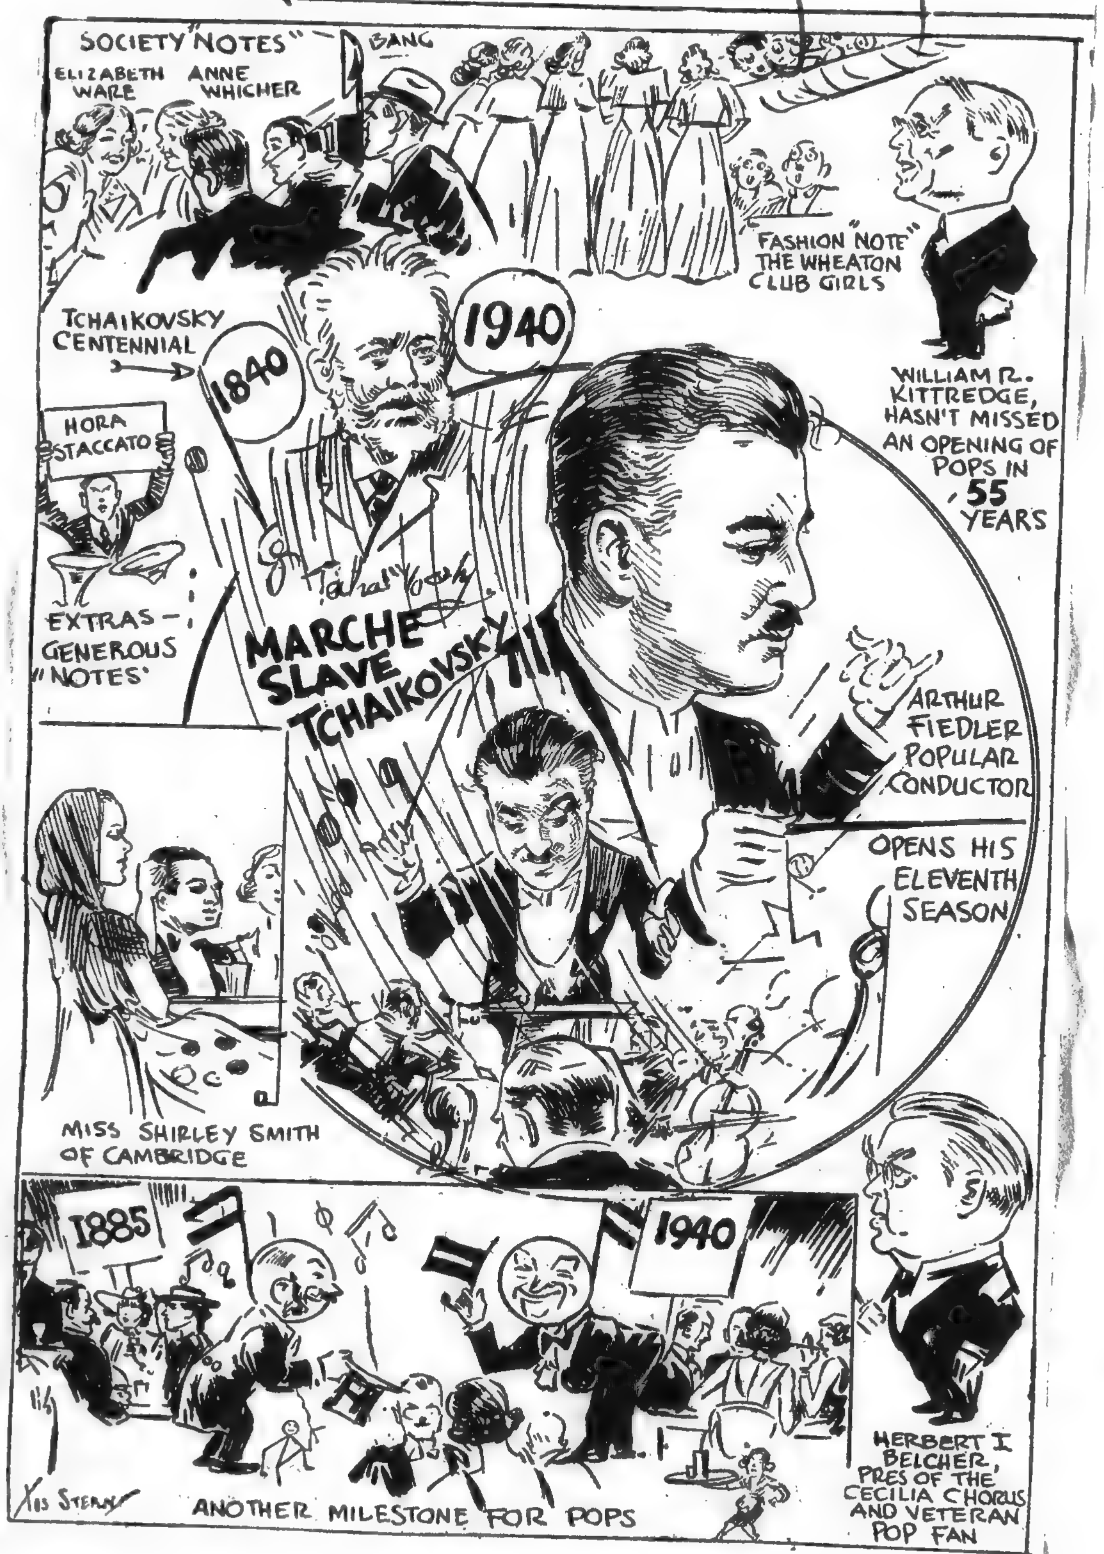
MAY 8 - 1940

Pops Season Opens Tonight At Symphony Hall

The 55th season of the Pops will open at Symphony Hall, Boston, tonight with Arthur Fiedler conducting 85 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There will be another concert tomorrow night and Friday and Saturday with Mr. Fiedler while the Sunday concert will be conducted by Tauno Hannikainen of Turku, Finland.

Herald May 9



SOCIETY "NOTES"
BANG
ELIZABETH WARE
ANNE WHICHER
FASHION "NOTE" THE WHEATON CLUB GIRLS
TCHAIKOVSKY CENTENNIAL
1840
1940
HORA STACCATO EXTRAS - GENEROUS "NOTES"
MARCHE SLAVE TCHAIKOVSKY
WILLIAM R. KITTREDGE, HASN'T MISSED AN OPENING OF POPS IN 55 YEARS
ARTHUR FIEDLER POPULAR CONDUCTOR
OPENS HIS ELEVENTH SEASON
MISS SHIRLEY SMITH OF CAMBRIDGE
1885
1940
HERBERT I. BELCHER, PRES OF THE CECILIA CHORUS AND VETERAN POP FAN
Vic Sterns

ANOTHER MILESTONE FOR POPS

MUSIC

Pop Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 55th season of the Pops concerts was opened last night in Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler for his 11th year conducted the members of the Boston Symphony. The program was as follows:

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"	Rossini
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier"	Richard Strauss
"Antar," 3d Movement	Rimsky-Korsakov
Facade	Walton
Triana, from "Iberia"	Albeniz-Arbos
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Mexican Rhapsody	McBride
Indian Summer	Herbert
"Stars and Stripes Forever," March	Sousa

Mr. Fiedler's 11 years' tenure of the Pops have brought that institution to extraordinary heights of popularity. As has often been pointed out, they are an unique series, for they are not as serious as the celebrated pop concerts of Queen's Hall, London, nor as frivolous as a German beer-garden. Somewhere in between is the province that they—under Mr. Fiedler's shrewd regency—govern.

The sociologist would note few obvious changes; indeed the only revolution in that respect occurred when prohibition was repealed—equally, perhaps, when it was established. One piece of music, however, might have detained the smart sociologist a little. That was an encore (itself encored), Alec Templeton's parody, "Mozart Matriculates." There were real and understanding laughs when the purity of the Mozartian melody drooped into the familiar grooves of jazz. The fact that this entertaining piece is scored for wood-wind and brass only adds to the wit and one's pleasure in it.

William Walton's "Facade" Suite served as novelty, though four of its numbers are fairly well known. The music was composed for a function that dates. In 1926 an "entertainment for reciting voice and instruments" was given at the Chenil Galleries in London. A large face was painted on a curtain; and located in the mouth of it was a megaphone, through which Edith Sitwell spoke a series of her poems. Walton had composed the music, which has lived; and we leave to literary experts the fate of Miss Sitwell's verse.

The music itself is very amusing and wears well. We have progressed far, so the scholars of "swing" tell us, since the 1920s. Still, Mr. Walton's music, being of the substance of real wit, has managed to live longer than the subject upon which that wit was exercised. It needs, possibly, a little closer attention than that which the Pops audience is willing to bestow upon it.

Another welcome addition to the Pops repertoire, if we are not mistaken, is the Overture to Rossini's "La Gazza Ladra." ("The Thieving Magpie"). There must be many of these overtures of this period that would stand revival, though not all of them have the same opportunity for orchestral brilliance as those by Rossini. Tchaikovsky's 100th birthday was honored—if that is the word—with a performance of his "Marche Slave." The Pops, in short, are continuing successfully inthe traditional pattern that has been so empirically worked out.

Pops

55th Season Gets Under Way in Happy Fashion

Conductor Fiedler Given Warm Greeting; Program Pleasingly Diversified

The 55th season of Pop concerts began at Symphony Hall last night against the pleasant ostinato of clinking glasses and popping corks. With the stage done over in the familiar decorations of green and gold, and with an infinite variety of colors from the gay Spring costumes of the women in the audience, the hall was as cheerful to the eye as was the music to the ear.

Arthur Fiedler, now in his 11th season as conductor of these concerts, was heartily greeted when first he appeared, and through the evening was recipient of continuing applause. No exaggeration is it to say that he has been one of the best liked of all Pops conductors—perhaps the most popular. Certainly the Pops have attained under his leadership a new peak of prosperity.

Program Aptly Chosen

His programs have retained favorite pieces which the public wants to hear season after season, and at the same time have been freshened by novelties. His opening number last evening was appropriately in the best Pops tradition, the "Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg" from Wagner's opera "Tannhaeuser," followed by Rossini's Overture to "The Thieving Magpie," the "Der Rosenkavalier" waltzes by Richard Strauss, and as a rarity, the third movement from the "Antar" Symphony of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Of the eight miniatures from the "Facade" suites by the English composer William Walton, four were new to Boston, "Fanfare," "Scotch Rhapsody," Noche Espagnola" and "Popular Song." Walton's "Facade" is intentionally humorous music, in which he captures the spirit or essence of some subject, at the same time making delicate fun of it in a polished, harmonically dissonant way.

Mr. Fiedler paid his respects to the Tchaikovsky centennial with the Russian composer's "Marche Slave." For the rest there were the "Triana" from Albeniz' "Iberia" as arranged for orchestra by Arbos; Robert McBride's "Mexican Rhapsody," the "Indian Summer" of Herbert and the Sousa march, "Stars and Stripes Forever."

Distinctly Part of Boston

Perhaps a historian of the 22d Century will devote a sizable chapter to the Symphony Hall Pops when the story of Boston's long civilization comes to be written.

"The Pops were like no other entertainment," he may say. "They were given during the months of May and June at a brick temple dedicated to music and called Symphony Hall. For many years they were eagerly attended both for music and for the spirit of gayety which audiences found there; a gayety intensified by the serving of solid and liquid refreshments, and by the fact that at the small tables put on the floor of the temple, people were allowed to smoke rolls of tobacco which they called cigars and cigarettes.

"The orchestra was a large number of men from the great musical instrument called the Boston Symphony, which, in the fourth decade of the 20th Century, was acknowledged to have no peer. Turning from the heavier repertory of the Fall and Winter season, the Pops orchestra offered lighter fare suitable to the warmer weather. By common consent, the worthy citizens of Boston regarded Spring to have come when once the Pops began."—C. W. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN,
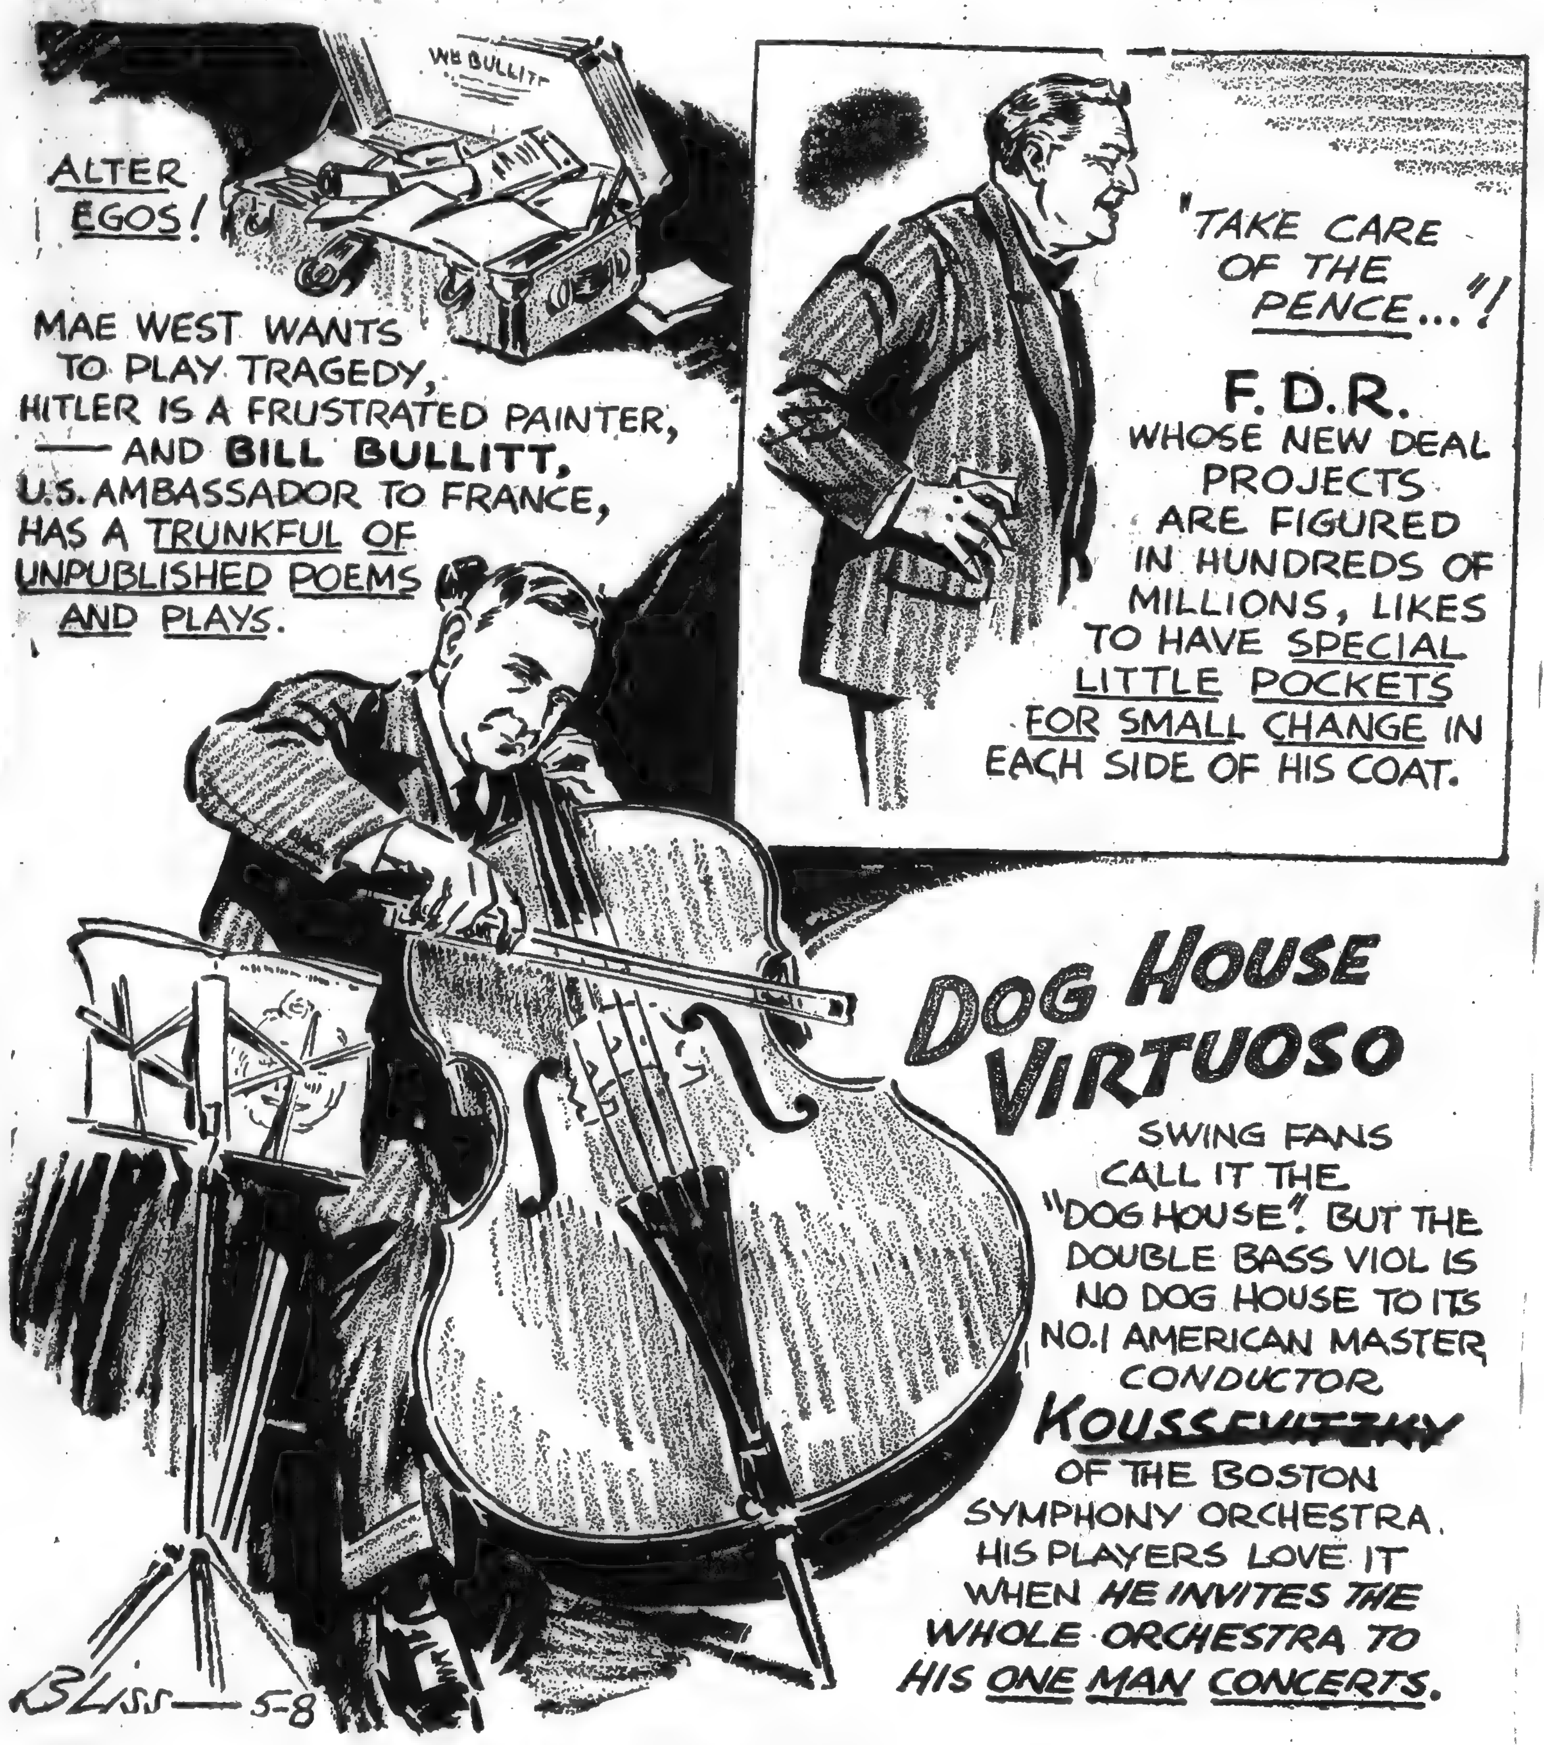
TIMES-STAR

MAY 8 - 1940

Private Lives

By Edwin Cox



WB BULLITT
ALTER EGOS!
MAE WEST WANTS TO PLAY TRAGEDY, HITLER IS A FRUSTRATED PAINTER, — AND BILL BULLITT, U.S. AMBASSADOR TO FRANCE, HAS A TRUNKFUL OF UNPUBLISHED POEMS AND PLAYS.
"TAKE CARE OF THE PENCE..."!
F.D.R. WHOSE NEW DEAL PROJECTS ARE FIGURED IN HUNDREDS OF MILLIONS, LIKES TO HAVE SPECIAL LITTLE POCKETS FOR SMALL CHANGE IN EACH SIDE OF HIS COAT.
DOG HOUSE VIRTUOSO
SWING FANS CALL IT THE "DOG HOUSE". BUT THE DOUBLE BASS VIOL IS NO DOG HOUSE TO ITS NO.1 AMERICAN MASTER CONDUCTOR KOUSSEVITZKY OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. HIS PLAYERS LOVE IT WHEN HE INVITES THE WHOLE ORCHESTRA TO HIS ONE MAN CONCERTS.
BLISS — 5-8

WASHINGTON, D.C
POST
5/8/40

THIS CLIPPING FROM FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAVENPORT, IA.
TIMES

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

THIS CLIPPING FROM WICHITA, KAN.
BEACON

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, ILL.
STATE JOURNAL

THIS CLIPPING FROM SIOUX CITY, IA.
TRIBUNE

THIS CLIPPING FROM MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

This Clipping From BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

This Clipping From MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD

THIS CLIPPING FROM TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES

THIS CLIPPING FROM MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURGH, PA
PRESS
5/8/40

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
TIMES-UNION

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

MAY 10 1940

Koussevitzky's Purchase Stamped For $18,000

The deed has been recorded conveying from the Art Institute of Chicago to Serge and Natalie Koussevitzky Bald Head, the former Kate S. Buckingham property in Lenox. The deed is stamped for $18,000 covering the real estate and $2000 for the personal property.

Post May 9

POPS SEASON OPENS

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With something less than the usual glitter and gusto the Pop Concerts began their 55th season at Symphony Hall last evening, with Arthur Fiedler again as conductor. If those who missed this opening programme have any repinings they can console themselves with the thought that any of the concerts to come will prove just as amusing, while many of them will be more stimulating and exciting.

Plainly, Mr. Fiedler would impart to these inaugural proceedings an air of sophistication, but it is questionable whether sophistication and the Pops really go together. The principal item of the second group, and hence the featured number of the programme, was Walton's "Facade," and of the eight parodies which comprised this work, four, according to the programme, were played here for the first time. Intended as a distillation, the English composer's "Scotch Rhapsody," "Noche Espagnola," "Tango-Passodoble," Valse, Polka and the others are less than a dilution of their originals. A few measures of Smetana, Johann Strauss or Falla would have blown these traversities to the winds. And to this work Mr. Fiedler added, as encore, that flattest of Alec Templeton's conceits "Mozart Matriculates."

For more honest music making the programme offered the March from "Tannhaeuser," Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra," the "Rosenkavalier" Waltzes of Richard Strauss, a movement from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Antar" Symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave," Albeniz' "Triana," the "Mexican Rhapsody" of McBride and numbers by Herbert and Sousa. The McBride Rhapsody proved a rather pale affair beside Copland's "El Salon Mexico" of a couple of Symphony seasons ago. Somehow, this music seemed to belong north, rather than south of the Rio Grande.

Only in part did the hall wear last evening its accustomed spring decorations. Though the stage went again to green and gold, the side walls retained their winter red. Many of the tables last evening were taken by the May School, the Boston Wheaton Club and the Deaconess Hospital School of Nursing.

THE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, MAY 9, 19

Society's Charity Spring Song In Opening of Pop Concerts

By ALISON ARNOLD

Boston gave its annual salute to spring last evening with the opening of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. Each year, just as the tulip beds in the Public Garden burst into a mass of bloom and the magnolia trees along Commonwealth avenue unfold their pink and white petals, these concerts blossom forth to add their gaiety and color to the season.

Never successfully imitated in any other American city, the concerts are a favorite means of raising money for pet charities, and last evening the May School Alumnae Association, the Boston Wheaton Club and tahe Deaconess Hospital School of Nursing reserved groups of tables.

Symphony Hall was in its summer dress with the familiar green and gold lattice as a background for the orchestra. The front of the stage was festively banked with slender stalks of pale apricot gladioli. Small tables filled the floor, and the pleasant hum of conversation was punctuated by the popping of corks.

Street clothes seemed to be preferred, although many wore formal attire. Photographer's bulbs flashed brightly, and faces peered eagerly over the balconies to watch the festivity below. The cynosure of all eyes was Miss Shirley Smith, who draped about her head the brilliant red hood of the jacket she wore with her white gown.

All ages were present, from distinguished white-haired dowagers to youngsters of six or seven, allowed as a special treat to stay up late. There were pretty debutantes, about to step into the whirlpool of society, and young matrons, a bit tired of it all and thinking wearily of getting the children off to school early in the morning. Also in the audience, and just as enthusiastic as ever, was Mr. William R. Kittredge, who hasn't missed a Pops opening in 55 years.

When Mr. Arthur Fiedler appeared, he received a tremendous ovation, and, as the concert progressed, there was cheering stamping from the cor fito the topmost seats in the second balc
The program opened with selecl from "Tannhauser," and the lil waltzes from "Der Rosenkava were a reminder of the ope night of the opera not long
In commemoration of the 100th niversary of Tchaikovsky on Ma
1840, his Marche Slave was pla and Alec Templeton's "Mozart triculates." which was offered as encore, fairly brought down house. The concert ended with stirring Sousa march, "Stars Stripes Forever."

Naturally, before such an oc sion, there were many dinner p ties, the hostesses taking th guests on to the concert afterwa Miss Mary Favorite, daughter of and Mrs. Calvin F. Favorite Brookline and a debutante of new season, gave a dinner in ho of Miss Joan Tozzer, national fig skating champion, who is leaving latter part of the month for Ho lulu, where she will be married
Mr. Philip Spalding Jr., in J
Among the guests at the dinner w
Miss Mary O'Day, president of senior class at the Brimmer-M School; Miss Elise Burkard, M
Mary Louise Collier, Miss Jane N
ton, Miss Louise Barr, Miss Doro
Chase and Miss Carol Grant.

Miss Barbara Cole, daughter
Prof. and Mrs. Arthur H. Cole
Cambridge, entertained at din and among her guests was I Elizabeth Lowell (Sister) Ware, was ticket chairman for May al
nae. She topped her printed fr with a chartreuse bolero on wh was pinned an orchid corsage.

Miss Jean Evatt, chairman of committee arranging the May Sch Alumnae benefit, had among guests Miss Jean Clark, who top her gray-blue frock with a jacket, Mr. Frank Fahey, Jr., I
William Jarvis and Mr. Jan
Shand, 3rd. Sitting nearby was M
Ernestine Hills, who wore a wh blouse with her full red and wh candy-striped skirt.

Strolling about the foyer duri the intermissions were Miss Joan
S. Hoyt, most attractive in a print frock with which she wore a silv fox cape. Miss Dorothy O'Day fa tened a nenormous orchid to th

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

MAY 10 1940

Procopes Leaving Today for Boston

To Attend Finnish Benefit Concert

The Minister of Finland and Mme. Procope will leave tonight for Boston to attend a concert to be given Sunday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the Finnish Relief Fund. The conductor will be Tauno Hannikainen, famous Finnish director who came to this country to conduct several concerts for the benefit of Finnish relief.

The Minister will be guest of honor and speaker at a luncheon to be given by the Boston Chamber of Commerce tomorrow. With Mme. Procope he will be a week-end guest of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, of East Walpole, Mass.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
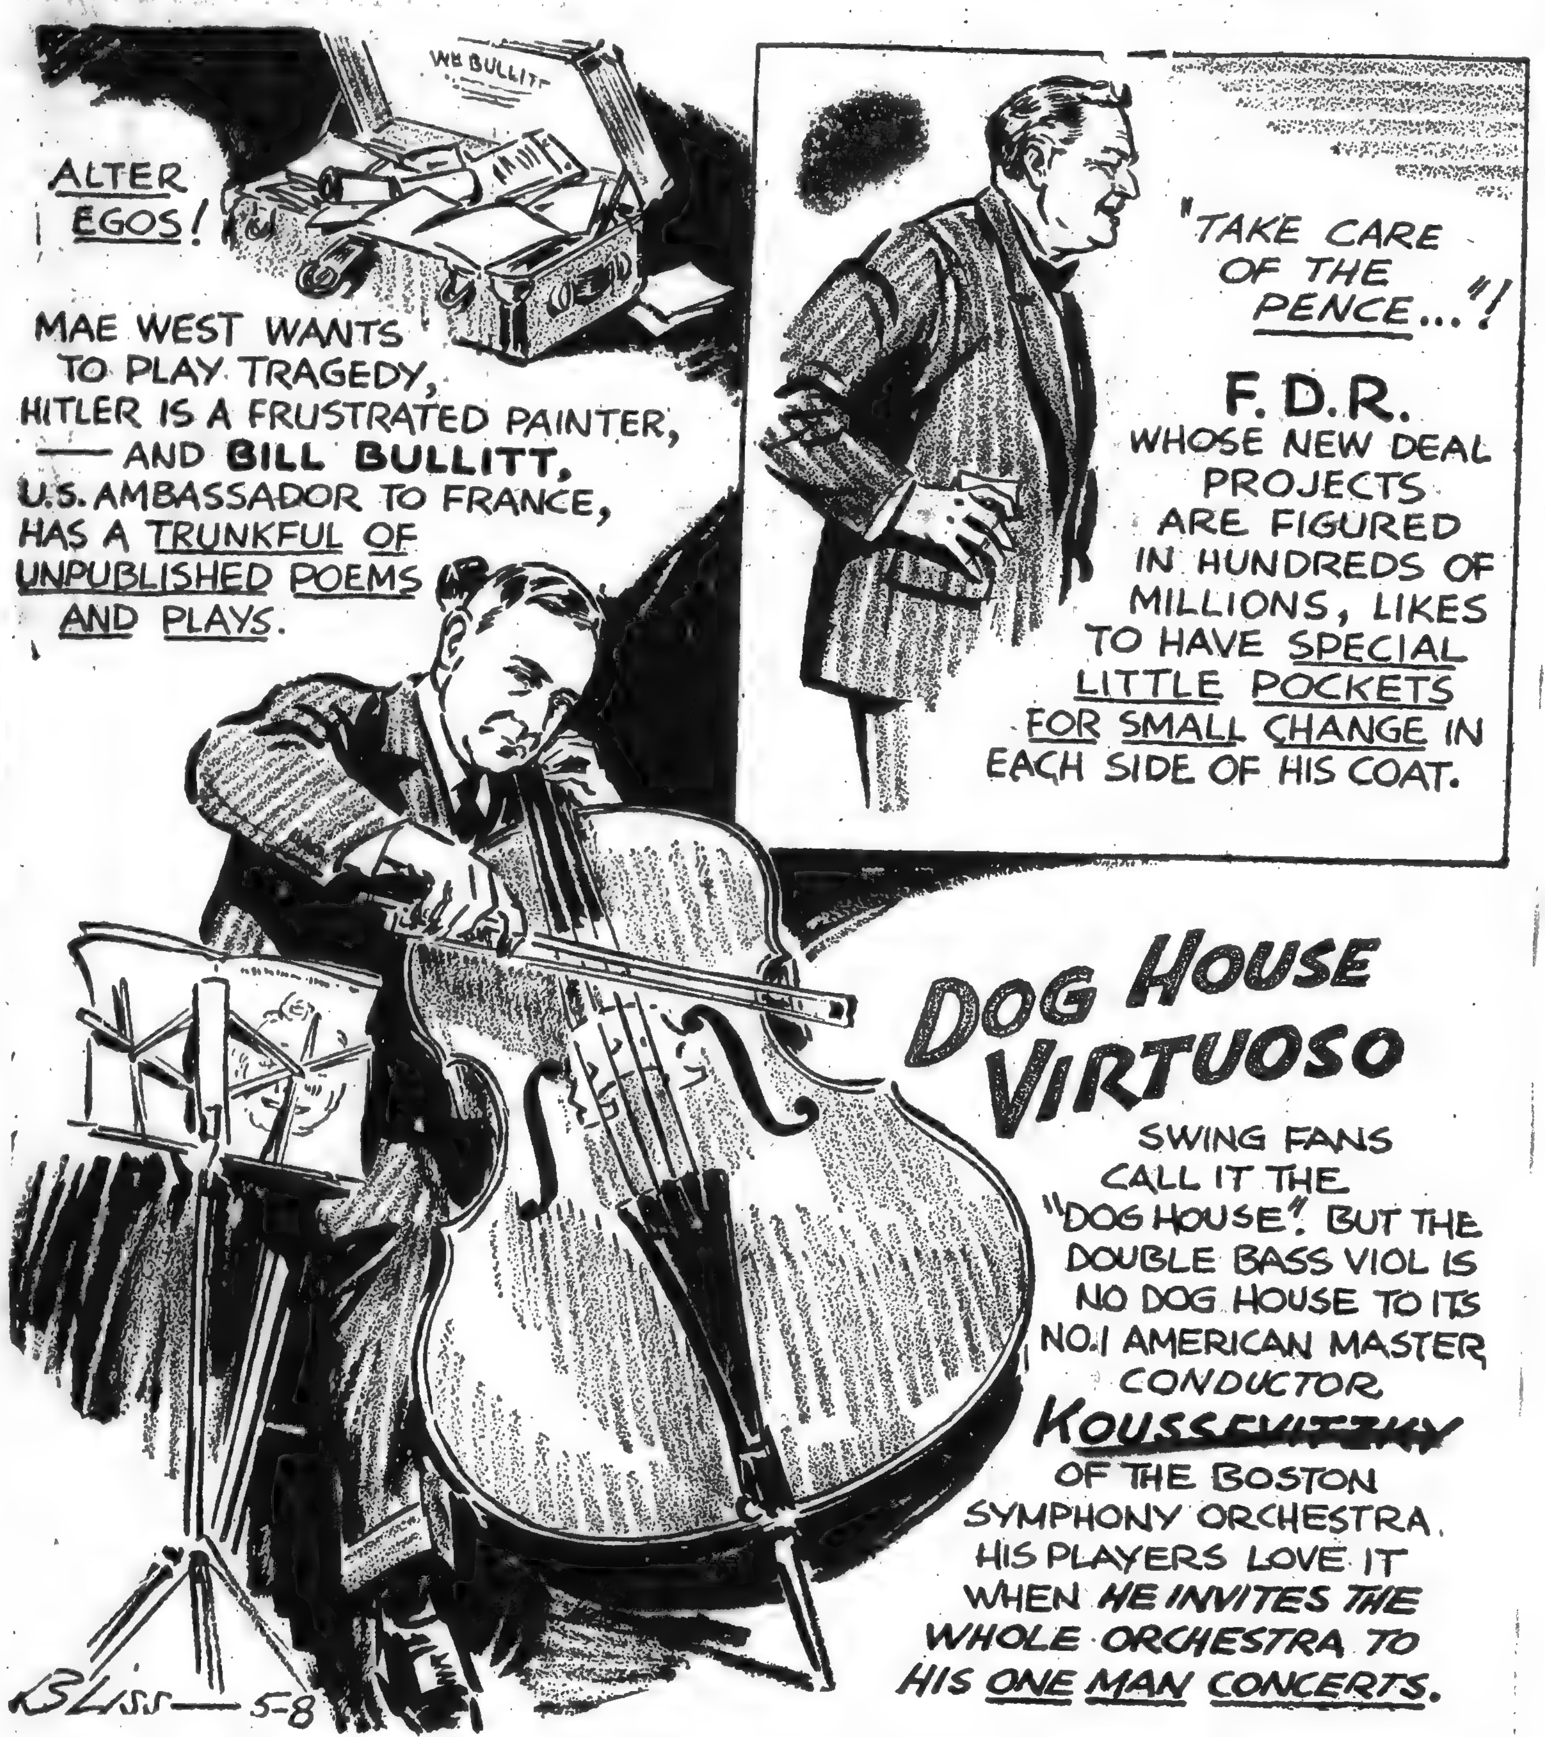
TIMES-STAR

MAY 8 - 1940

Private Lives

By Edwin Cox



WB BULLITT
ALTER EGOS!
MAE WEST WANTS TO PLAY TRAGEDY, HITLER IS A FRUSTRATED PAINTER, — AND BILL BULLITT, U.S. AMBASSADOR TO FRANCE, HAS A TRUNKFUL OF UNPUBLISHED POEMS AND PLAYS.
"TAKE CARE OF THE PENCE..."!
F.D.R. WHOSE NEW DEAL PROJECTS ARE FIGURED IN HUNDREDS OF MILLIONS, LIKES TO HAVE SPECIAL LITTLE POCKETS FOR SMALL CHANGE IN EACH SIDE OF HIS COAT.
DOG HOUSE VIRTUOSO
SWING FANS CALL IT THE "DOG HOUSE". BUT THE DOUBLE BASS VIOL IS NO DOG HOUSE TO ITS NO.1 AMERICAN MASTER CONDUCTOR KOUSSEVITZKY OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. HIS PLAYERS LOVE IT WHEN HE INVITES THE WHOLE ORCHESTRA TO HIS ONE MAN CONCERTS.
BLISS — 5-8

WASHINGTON, D.C
POST
5/8/40

THIS CLIPPING FROM FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAVENPORT, IA.
TIMES

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

THIS CLIPPING FROM WICHITA, KAN.
BEACON

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, ILL.
STATE JOURNAL

THIS CLIPPING FROM SIOUX CITY, IA.
TRIBUNE

THIS CLIPPING FROM MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

This Clipping From BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

This Clipping From MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD

THIS CLIPPING FROM TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES

THIS CLIPPING FROM MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURGH, PA
PRESS
5/8/40

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
TIMES-UNION

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat-Chronicle

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

MAY 10 1940

Koussevitzky's Purchase Stamped For $18,000

The deed has been recorded conveying from the Art Institute of Chicago to Serge and Natalie Koussevitzky Bald Head, the former Kate S. Buckingham property in Lenox. The deed is stamped for $18,000 covering the real estate and $2000 for the personal property.

66

Post May 9

POPS SEASON OPENS

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With something less than the usual glitter and gusto the Pop Concerts began their 55th season at Symphony Hall last evening, with Arthur Fiedler again as conductor. If those who missed this opening programme have any repinings they can console themselves with the thought that any of the concerts to come will prove just as amusing, while many of them will be more stimulating and exciting.

Plainly, Mr. Fiedler would impart to these inaugural proceedings an air of sophistication, but it is questionable whether sophistication and the Pops really go together. The principal item of the second group, and hence the featured number of the programme, was Walton's "Facade," and of the eight parodies which comprised this work, four, according to the programme, were played here for the first time. Intended as a distillation, the English composer's "Scotch Rhapsody," "Noche Espagnola," "Tango-Passodoble," Valse, Polka and the others are less than a dilution of their originals. A few measures of Smetana, Johann Strauss or Falla would have blown these traversities to the winds. And to this work Mr. Fiedler added, as encore, that flattest of Alec Templeton's conceits "Mozart Matriculates."

For more honest music making the programme offered the March from "Tannhaeuser," Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra," the "Rosenkavalier" Waltzes of Richard Strauss, a movement from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Antar" Symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave," Albeniz' "Triana," the "Mexican Rhapsody" of McBride and numbers by Herbert and Sousa. The McBride Rhapsody proved a rather pale affair beside Copland's "El Salon Mexico" of a couple of Symphony seasons ago. Somehow, this music seemed to belong north, rather than south of the Rio Grande.

Only in part did the hall wear last evening its accustomed spring decorations. Though the stage went again to green and gold, the side walls retained their winter red. Many of the tables last evening were taken by the May School, the Boston Wheaton Club and the Deaconess Hospital School of Nursing.

THE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, MAY 9, 19

Society's Charity Spring Song In Opening of Pop Concerts

By ALISON ARNOLD

Boston gave its annual salute to spring last evening with the opening of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. Each year, just as the tulip beds in the Public Garden burst into a mass of bloom and the magnolia trees along Commonwealth avenue unfold their pink and white petals, these concerts blossom forth to add their gaiety and color to the season.

Never successfully imitated in any other American city, the concerts are a favorite means of raising money for pet charities, and last evening the May School Alumnae Association, the Boston Wheaton Club and tahe Deaconess Hospital School of Nursing reserved groups of tables.

Symphony Hall was in its summer dress with the familiar green and gold lattice as a background for the orchestra. The front of the stage was festively banked with slender stalks of pale apricot gladioli. Small tables filled the floor, and the pleasant hum of conversation was punctuated by the popping of corks.

Street clothes seemed to be preferred, although many wore formal attire. Photographer's bulbs flashed brightly, and faces peered eagerly over the balconies to watch the festivity below. The cynosure of all eyes was Miss Shirley Smith, who draped about her head the brilliant red hood of the jacket she wore with her white gown.

All ages were present, from distinguished white-haired dowagers to youngsters of six or seven, allowed as a special treat to stay up late. There were pretty debutantes, about to step into the whirlpool of society, and young matrons, a bit tired of it all and thinking wearily of getting the children off to school early in the morning. Also in the audience, and just as enthusiastic as ever, was Mr. William R. Kittredge, who hasn't missed a Pops opening in 55 years.

When Mr. Arthur Fiedler appeared, he received a tremendous ovation, and, as the concert progressed, there was cheering stamping from the cor fito the topmost seats in the second balc The program opened with selec from "Tannhauser," and the lil waltzes from "Der Rosenkava were a reminder of the ope night of the opera not long In commemoration of the 100th niversary of Tchaikovsky on Ma 1840, his Marche Slave was pla and Alec Templeton's "Mozart triculates," which was offered as encore, fairly brought down house. The concert ended with stirring Sousa march, "Stars Stripes Forever."

Naturally, before such an oc sion, there were many dinner p ties, the hostesses taking th guests on to the concert afterwa Miss Mary Favorite, daughter of and Mrs. Calvin F. Favorite Brookline and a debutante of new season, gave a dinner in ho of Miss Joan Tozzer, national fig skating champion, who is leaving latter part of the month for Ho lulu, where she will be married Mr. Philip Spalding Jr., in J Among the guests at the dinner w Miss Mary O'Day, president of senior class at the Brimmer-M School: Miss Elise Burkard, M Mary Louise Collier, Miss Jane N ton, Miss Louise Barr, Miss Doro Chase and Miss Carol Grant.

Miss Barbara Cole, daughter Prof. and Mrs. Arthur H. Cole Cambridge, entertained at din and among her guests was I Elizabeth Lowell (Sister) Ware, was ticket chairman for May al nae. She topped her printed fr with a chartreuse bolero on wh was pinned an orchid corsage.

Miss Jean Evatt, chairman of committee arranging the May Sch Alumnae benefit, had among guests Miss Jean Clark, who top her gray-blue frock with a jacket, Mr. Frank Fahey, Jr., I William Jarvis and Mr. Jan Shand, 3rd. Sitting nearby was M Ernestine Hills, who wore a wh blouse with her full red and wh candy-striped skirt.

Strolling about the foyer duri the intermissions were Miss Joan S. Hoyt, most attractive in a print frock with which she wore a silv fox cape. Miss Dorothy O'Day fa tened a nenormous orchid to th lapel of her white evening wra and her mother, Mrs. John O'Da was smart in a gown of rust cre diagonally striped with white. An still others in the throng were Mr H. Nickerson Sears, Miss Nancy Ny Mr. and Mrs. Gordon McKissoc (Bettie Scudder), Miss Sally Scud der, Miss Anne Whicher, Miss Lydi Walker and Miss Beatrice William

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

MAY 10 1940

Procopes Leaving Today for Boston

To Attend Finnish Benefit Concert

The Minister of Finland and Mme. Procope will leave tonight for Boston to attend a concert to be given Sunday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the Finnish Relief Fund. The conductor will be Tauno Hannikainen, famous Finnish director who came to this country to conduct several concerts for the benefit of Finnish relief.

The Minister will be guest of honor and speaker at a luncheon to be given by the Boston Chamber of Commerce tomorrow. With Mme. Procope he will be a week-end guest of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, of East Walpole, Mass.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, MAY 9, 1940

Fifty-fifth Season of Pops Inaugurated-

Symphony Hall in Spring Garb; Fiedler Honors Tchaikovsky

Spring came to Symphony Hall last night with the inauguration of the fifty-fifth season of Pops. The stage wore its familiar seasonal dress of lattice work, and the ornamental chandelier was again in place. New this year were a pair of pedestals to the right and left of the stage, upon which were gilded urns filled with sprays of forsythia and greenery. Before the conductor's stand as usual, was the huge bouquet of gladiolas, rhododendrons, and ferns. Yes, spring had come and the orchestra, comprised of players from the Boston Symphony, once more under the baton of Arthur Fiedler, seemed in expansive mood.

* * *

For the opening concert Mr. Fiedler had arranged a pleasantly miscellaneous program. The Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhäuser" was followed by the tuneful Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" by Rossini. The waltzer from "Rosenkavalier" brought the customary response from the audience and a Rimsky-Korsakoff item also received close attention.

A Pops audience is really interested in the music, and quick to respond when the music pleases. William Walton's "Façade" evidently fell into that classification last night. To lend additional interest, Mr. Fiedler offered first performances in Boston of several numbers in this suite: "Fanfare," (extremely short), "Scotch Rhapsody" which lived up to its name), "Noche Espagnola" (which no one could mistake), and a naïve "Popular Song" which one member of the audience aptly labeled "1890." The remaining items of the suite were familiar.

* * *

Commemorating the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Tchaikovsky, Mr. Fiedler played the Marche Slave in stirring manner and received great applause.

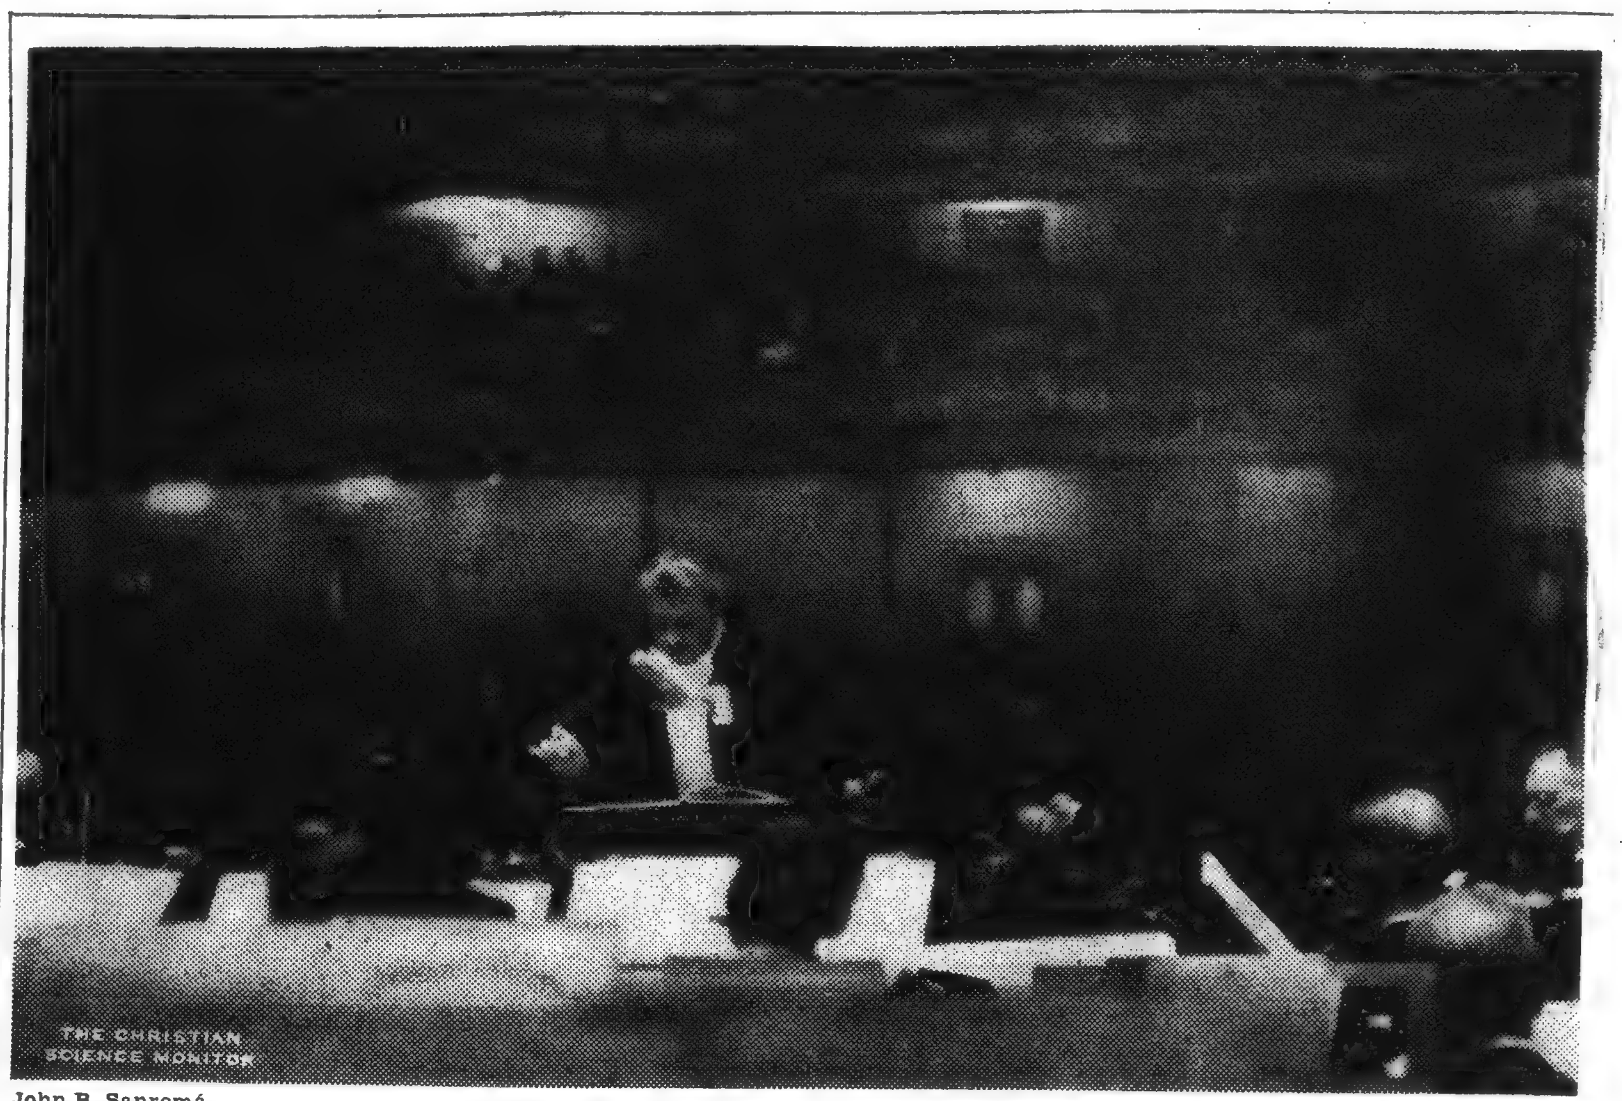
The Mexican Rhapsody by McBride, its authentic flavor intensified by the use of Mexican tunes easily recognizable by those familiar with Mexican music, (such as the Mexican Hat Dance and "La Cucuracha") appeared to give a maximum of enjoyment. If Mr. McBride had confined himself to folk tunes, so-called, instead of making quite so generous a potpourri of musical themes from other sources, the work might have been still more impressive.

* * *

Victor Herbert was represented by "Indian Summer" with Mr. Speyer taking a bow for an excellent English horn solo. The Albeniz-Arbos "Triana" from "Ibéria" received its customary sympathetic reading. It is probable that John Philip Sousa would have heartily approved the vigorous performance of his "Stars and Stripes Forever."

Of the additional numbers, the most amusing was Alec Templeton's "Mozart Matriculates" and the most popular, doubtless, the little item from "Pinocchio."

G. M. S.



John B. Sanromá

As the Pops Season Is Inaugurated

Arthur Fiedler begins his eleventh year as conductor of the spring concerts at Symphony Hall, on a flower-bedecked platform.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SEATTLE, WASH.
Post Intelligencer
MAY 12 1940

Maestro 'Sneaks In,' Aids Benefit

BOSTON, May 11.—Though it was advertised that only a small group of Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians would appear with Lily Pons in a benefit concert for four French war societies, the entire 110-man orchestra answered the curtain—plus an extra man. He was Pop Concert Conductor Arthur Fiedler, former orchestra member, who said he "sneaked in to do my bit on the viola."

MUSIC---DANCE

Musical Maying

Symphony Hall in Summer Garb for Gay Opening of Pop Concert Season

By EDWARD DOWNES

With the agreeable assistance of Arthur Fiedler, the Boston Symphony has gone a-maying. Only four days after its serious winter season closed, the Boston Symphony Orchestra reappeared last night in a gaily bedizened Symphony Hall, for the opening of its more light-hearted summer season of Pop Concerts. The "Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg" from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" greeted the festive music-lovers who crowded the tables on the floor of Symphony Hall and the seats of both balconies. If this audience was not as colorfully dressed as Wagner's medieval guests on the Wartburg, still there were more black ties and feminine frills to be seen than at most evening concerts of the winter season.

The wines, punches, beers, soft drinks and edibles that were the order of the evening prevented no one from enjoying the variegated program, which included the first performance in Boston of the first four numbers of William Walton's suite, "Facade." These four pieces, "Fanfare," "Scotch Rhapsody," "Noche Espagnola," and "Popular Song," witty, dexterous items of an allusive nature, were admirably performed under Mr. Fiedler. He gave them their meed of gusto and humor and his baton had the requisite punch. They were followed by four familiar numbers of the same suite: "Tango-Pasodoble," "Swiss Yodelling Song," "Valse," and "Polka."

Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave" was given a dynamic interpretation in memory of the composer's 100th birthday, last Tuesday, May 7. In every way a contrast to Tchaikovsky, Rossini, in his day, was a famous cook (even among Parisians) and the distinguished epicurian flippancies of the Overture to his "Gazra Ladra" went excellently with good wine or even with cakes and ale. There were also Strauss waltzes, but they were by Richard from his opera, "Der Rosenkavalier."

Another exciting performance was the "Triana" from Albeniz's "Iberia," orchestrated by Fernandos Arbos. The third movement from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar," McBride's "Mexican Rhapsody," Herbert's "Indian Summer" and John Philip Sousas immortal march, "Stars and Stripes Forever," completed the printed program, but there were many encores.

The evening belonged to Mr. Fiedler whose pleasant reign was greeted with obvious pleasure by an enthusiastic audience.

Music Notes

Tonight: Pop concert, Arthur Fielder, conductor, Peggy Stuart, pianist. Symphony Hall, 8:30.

Converse Club Concert, Stanley Hassel, conductor, Dorothy Rosenberg, violinist, Evelyn M. Duncanson, soprano, Olivia Hall, harpist, Jordan Hall, 8:30.

Apollo Club, Thompson Stone, conductor, Aino Saari, diseuse, Earl Weidner, accompanist, Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library, 8:00.

Tomorrow: Pop Concert, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, Symphony Hall, 8:30.

Elizabeth Travis, pianist, Recital Hall, New England Conservatory, 8:15.

Jewel Chamberlain, pianist, Little Theater, 25 Blagden street, 8:15.

WPA String Symphony, Peter Bodge, conductor, Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library, 8:00.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL
MAY 10 1940

Soprano and Discoverer

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left, and Dorothy Maynor.

An audition before Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, paved the way to fame for Dorothy Maynor, sensational young Negro soprano, who is to appear in concert at 3 p.m. Sunday at Memorial Auditorium.

Miss Maynor had traveled to Boston to hear his orchestra, and a friend arranged for the conductor to hear her, despite the fact that he was wearied by rehearsals. After her first number, Koussevitzky declared that the world must hear her voice. He asked her to sing for his orchestra at its annual party the next day. This was but a short time ago. Since then she has won national acclaim.

Tickets for Miss Maynor's appearance are $1.10 for general admission and $1.65 for reserved seats. Tickets may be obtained at the Memorial Auditorium boxoffice. Her appearance is being sponsored by the Zeta Phi Beta Sorority for the benefit of its scholarship fund.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT. SATURDAY, MAY 11, 1940

IN CONCERT, AT FESTIVALS AN

Arthur Fiedler, currently wielding the scepter of the Pops Concerts at Symphony Hall; Elizabeth Travis, piano soloist on Wednesday evening, May 15; and Mr. Fiedler again. Miss Travis, who has just returned from a tour of South America, makes her first appearance here since 1936, playing the Chopin F-minor Concerto for the benefit of the Deaconess Hospital.

HANNIKAINEN TO CONDUCT THE POPS

Finnish Leader Will Direct Orchestra Tonight

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

IN THE summary of the 1939-40 Symphony season, which appeared in this place last Sunday, one newsy item of the man-bites-dog type was omitted. There was no performance of the First Symphony of Brahms. In the preceding 15 seasons under Dr. Koussevitzky this now and most popular of all symphonies was heard at 13 Saturday evening and 12 Friday afternoon concerts. Generally, its place has been the final number on the final programme.

However, those for whom no concert season is complete without a hearing of the Brahms C. minor will have their chance this evening when Tauno Hannikainen, as guest conductor, directs a performance of it at the Pops. Statistics of the seasons under Dr. Koussevitzky, not investigated in this particular issue, might reveal that the next most popular symphony had been the Second of Sibelius, a piece dismissed at its first hearing here in 1904 as enigmatical The Scherzo and Finale of this Symphony have place on Mr. Hannikainen's programme, together with the Finnish master's "Finlandia," "Night Ride and Sunrise" and Elegy from the Suite "King Christian II." This will be the second appearance at the Pops Concerts of Mr. Hannikainen, who made his first appearance as guest-conductor at the regular Symphony Concerts last February. Proceeds of this evening's Pop Concert will be devoted to Finnish relief and reconstruction.

* * * *

Certain vital statistics from the Boston Symphony season just past were quoted in the New York Times last Sunday by the music editor of that paper, Olin Downes, who set out to prove that the American composer was not being neglected by our major symphony orchestras. Seventeen of these organizations were requested to submit facts and figures and all but one, the orchestra of San Francisco, supplied them. The total impression to be gleaned was that the living American composer received nearly as many performances as all the living Europeans put together. But as is apt to be the case in such tabulations, certain figures were misleading. Some of the orchestras mentioned Richard Strauss. Others, including our own, did not, although Dr. Koussevitzky programmed "Don Quixote" and "Till Eulenspiegel" and Mr. Burgin offered "Don Juan." The answer probably is that Strauss has become so much a classic that he is already considered to be quite as dead as Beethoven or Brahms.

And then there is that of question of: who is an American composer, anyway? Among the "Americans" performed by the Boston Symphony, in the Times' synopsis, was Nicolai Lopatnikoff, who arrived in this country, with the idea of becoming a permanent resident, a year ago last month. If only Strauss and Sibelius would make such a move, and if Stravinsky and Hindemith, already over here, would take out their first papers, the "American composer" would indeed be going places.

* * * *

Do the Swiss, one wonders, claim Ernest Bloch as one of their own? At any rate, we do, even though he came here after his European reputation had been well established, and we also claim, with more reason in this reviewer's opinion, the aged Templeton Strong, who has lived in Switzerland for half a century. The Times duly took note of Mr. Toscanini's performance last autumn of Strong's Symphonic Suite, "Night," as one of the three American works performed by the orchestra of the National Broadcasting Company.

Among the conductors programing American compositions, Fabien Sevitzky, of the Indianapolis Symphony, was again away in the lead in this respect. Twenty-two Americans, some of them foreign-born, to be sure, were represented on Mr. Sevitzky's programmes, as against six living Europeans. Of these six Jaromir Weinberger is now in this country, along with Igor Stravinsky, and pretty soon we will be adopting him, too. With Europe busily blowing itself to bits, the United States is becoming in more ways than one the music center of the world.

The indefatigable Sevitzky, by the way, is projecting a three-day all-American Festival of Music in Indianapolis, in connection with the Arthur Jordan Conservatory of Music. Over 30 native composers will be represented and there will be several world premieres.

* * * *

To come nearer home, an American conductor of considerable recent European experience, Benjamin Grosbayne, Harvard, 1917, will be guest conductor at the Pops tomorrow night, the annual Harvard night.

An interesting concert of liturgical music will be given at Jordan Hall this evening by the vested choir of men and boys from the Church of the Immaculate Conception, under the direction of Leonard S. Whalen. Pietro Yon, one of the most distinguished of American organists, honorary organist of the Vatican and music director of St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York, as well as composer of ecclesiastical music, will appear both as soloist and accompanist. The programme traverses music of the Roman Catholic Church from the ealier centuries to the present day.

Two Conservatory societies will sponsor concerts open to the public without charge. On Monday evening George Brown Hall Alpha Chapter of Kappa Gamma Psi Fraternity will give a concert of chamber music. On Tuesday evening at Jordan Hall Iota Chapter of the Honorary Society of Pi Kappa Lamda will offer a programme of compositions by its members.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

MAY 12 1940

MUSIC

• • •

Berkshire Music Center Opens Season July 8

The 55th season of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, continues nightly through June. In July, the season of free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade will be given. The new Berkshire Music Center at "Tanglewood", (between Stockbridge and Lenox) will begin its season July 8. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the school, will conduct at Tanglewood concurrently with the last three weeks of its six weeks session (Aug. 1-18), the Berkshire Symphonic festival.

After a six weeks holiday for the complete orchestra, the 60th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will open in Symphony Hall Oct. 11-12.

Ends 59th Season.

Serge Koussevitzky brought to a close, with memorable performances of Beethoven's Second, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphonies, the 59th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the 16th under his famed direction.

Dr. Koussevitzky included in the last three programs of the season the final three symphonies of Tchaikovsky, in observance of the centennial of the composer's birth. After the last chords of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony had resounded in Symphony hall, the audiences responded with prolonged demonstrations. A reviewer thus summed up the season which had ended:

"Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra again gave us an exhibition of magnificent playing and interpretations ideally suited to these very different symphonies. There used to be a time—say a dozen years ago—when the merits of the various major orchestras were animatedly discussed. Fortunately for us those discussions today generally begin with an admission of the supremacy of the Boston Symphony. . .Yesterday's concert was, then, a high testimonial to the vitality of the Boston Symphony and its conductor. We are always sorry to see the end of another symphony season—Friday is never a normal day until the middle of October! —but if it must stop, it is well to be assured that it does so in the full tide of glorious achievement." (Alexander Williams, Boston Herald).

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
NEWS

MAY 11 1940

Roy Harris Wins Awards For Symphony

Former San Franciscan Given Two Prizes as 'Most Significant Composer'

Although New York claims him now, Roy Harris was once a San Francisco resident. This past week he was the recipient of two awards—a cash prize of $500 from the National Committee for Music Appreciation in Washington, D. C., for his latest work, "Folk Song Symphony," and a certificate of merit from the National Association of American Composers & Conductors as "the most significant composer of the year." The symphony, completed in February, is in seven movements—five choral movements and two orchestral interludes. It was planned "to serve high school and college choruses in cultural relations with professional symphony orchestras."

The symphony, which requires 54 minutes to perform, is unusual in structure. Each movement consists of a symphonic treatment of a complete folk song with its several verses and the content of the verses determined the form of the composition.

In recognition of his effort to advance the cause of American music during the past season, Gene Buck, president of the American Society of Composers, Authors & Publishers, received the Henry Hadley medal of the National Association of American Composers & Conductors. The award was presented by Dr. Sigmund Spaeth, president of the association, at the annual reception of that organization at the Waldorf-Astoria.

Dr. Spaeth told Mr. Buck the award was "well merited" and was the "answer of America's creative musicians to the absurd and unwarranted attacks upon the American Society of Composers, Authors & Publishers, which has done so much in behalf of the American composer, and is today his only refuge in defense of his constitutional rights under the Federal copyright law."

Certificates of merit were also awarded to Howard Barlow, conductor of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra and of the Columbia Broadcasting System; to Radio Station WNYC and Francis D. Perkins, music critic of The New York Herald Tribune. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received a certificate in absentia.—M. M. F.

Pop Concert Calendar for Next Week

All Pop Concerts begin at 8.30 at Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler conducts unless otherwise noted.

Tonight

"Semper Fidelis," March	Sousa
Overture to "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Hymn to St. Cecelia	Gounod
"Samson and Delilah," Fantasia	Saint-Saens
Concertstuck	Weber
Soloist: Leo Litwin
"Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree"	Weinberger
Regis College Glee Club:
Gypsy Song from "Carmen"	Bizet
"Jeanie with the Light Brown Hair"	Foster
"Voices of Spring," Waltzes	Strauss
Dance from "Snowmaiden"	Rimsky-Korsakov

Tomorrow

Tauno Hannikainen, guest conductor.

"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem
Elegy from "King Christian II"
"Night Ride and Sunrise"
Scherzo and Finale from Symphony No. 2	All by Sibelius
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68	Brahms

Monday

HARVARD NIGHT

Guest conductor, Benjamin Grosbayne, '17
Overture to "Die Fledermaus"	Strauss
Scherzo Capriccioso	Dvorak
Overture to "Rienzi"	Wagner
Guest conductor, G. Wallace Woodward, '24
Two Choruses from "The Mikado"	Sullivan
Tarantella	Randall Thompson, '20
Jazz Studies	Edward B. Hill, '94
Carnival Song	Walter Piston, '24
Casey Jones	American Folk Song
(Arranged by Edward B. Lawton, '34)
Harvard to the Harvard Team	Norman Fay, '69
The Harvard Glee Club
Guest conductor, Malcolm Holmes, '28
"Voices of Spring," Waltzes	Strauss
Variations on "Mary Had a Little Lamb"	Edward Ballantine, '07
Harvard Sketches	Leroy Anderson, '29
Prayer of Thanksgiving	Valerius-Kremser

Tuesday

Marche Militaire	Schubert
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"	Mozart
Praeludium	Jarnefelt
"Romeo and Juliet"	Tchaikovsky
"Danse Macabre"	Saint-Saens
Ave Maria	Schubert-Wilhelmj
Bolero	Ravel
"Vienna Woods," Waltzes	Strauss
"Bumble Bee"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Sixth Hungarian Dance	Brahms

Wednesday

"Rakoczy" March	Berlioz
Ballet Suite	Rameau-Motti
Scherzo from Octet	Mendelssohn
Prelude "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
Piano Concerto No. 2	Chopin
Soloist: Elizabeth Travis
"Show Boat," Selection	Kern
Fugato on a Well-Known Theme	McBride
"Thunder and Lightning," Polka	Strauss

Thursday

March "Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
Overture "William Tell"	Rossini
Liebesfreud	Kreisler
"Finlandia"	Sibelius
Piano Concerto No. 2	Liszt
Soloist: Palmyra da Camara
Framingham Teachers College Glee Club
"Espana" Waltzes	Waldteufel
Polka from "Ritter Pasman"	Strauss
Farandole "L,Arlesienne"	Bizet

Friday

Introduction Act III, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Overture "Oberon"	Weber
Allegretto, Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Procession of Bacchus from "Sylvia"	Delibes
Soviet Iron Works	Mossolov
Mexican Rhapsody	McBride
Orphean Club of Lasell Junior College
"Roses from the South"	Strauss
Pavane	Gould
Strike Up the Band	Gershwin

Saturday, May 18

March, "El Capitan"	Sousa
Overture to "Mignon"	Thomas
"Molly on the Shore"	Grainger
"Espana" Rhapsody	Chabrier
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"	Tchaikovsky
Andante Cantabile for Strings	Tchaikovsky
Third Movement Symphony No. 6	Tchaikovsky
Fantasy on Gershwin Melodies
Mozart Matriculates	Alec Templeton
Prelude to "Carmen"	Bizet

Sunday, May 19

Overture, "Donna Diana"	Reznicek
"Military" Symphony	Haydn
Prelude in E major	Bach-Caillet
Piano Concerto A minor	Paderewski
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"Blue Danube"	Strauss
Londonderry Air	Arranged by Grainger
"Ride of the Valkyries"	Wagner

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
MAY 12 1940

109

Kaufmann & Fabry

Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Orchestra, who will direct Philharmonic-Symphony in Schelling memorial program

AMERICAN RECORD

Further Reflections on Performances of Native Works This Season

By OLIN DOWNES

A LIST of symphonic works by living American and European composers, performed during the season now ending by sixteen leading American orchestras, was published in these pages last Sunday. This was apropos of an inquiry as to whether native composers receive representation on American symphonic programs proportionate to that accorded their colleagues from overseas.

Incidentally, this inquiry offered an answer to the frequent complaint of the American composer that, since most of the conductors of American symphony orchestras are foreign-born and foreign-bred in music, they cannot be expected to examine the works of native sons from a point of view sympathetic to the American musical product or the American spirit.

In assessing the returns, the writer remarked that among living European composers there are such seniors and fixtures of the modern orchestral repertory as Richard Strauss (76 years old), Jean Sibelius (75), Sergei Rachmaninoff (67), Vaughan Williams (68), de Falla (64), Dohnanyi (63), Pizzetti (60), Enesco (59), Stravinsky (58) and somewhat younger men, such as Prokofieff (49), Hindemith (45) and others of like position.

It was further remarked that no one pretended America had as yet composers fit to rank in the quality of their offering and their weight with the public with the men just mentioned; that "the number of American composers of this generation with the technic and the training to write effectively for orchestra is legion compared with the number of native composers who could adequately express themselves prior to 1900"; therefore, that "a comparison of any justness between the number of American and the number of European works by contemporaries offered by our principal symphony orchestras should consist actually in the number of works by the younger generation of foreign and native composers, which rule may be modified or not by the reader, but has been followed in these columns."

* * *

TO these remarks Harrison Kerr, executive secretary of the American Music Center, makes rejoinder that the list of contemporary works performed and the manner of its analysis by the present commentator constituted "an ingenious argument" designed to prove that American composers receive their full due at the hands of our orchestras. He is not wholly satisfied with this analysis. He asks for "the exact percentages of American works in proportion to the total played." He also feels that in order to judge the attitude of the conductors of American orchestras toward our native composers, as compared with the attitude of European conductors toward their nationals, we would have to know whether the European leaders favored the native composers of their countries more than the conductors in America favor ours; and he suggests that THE TIMES secure statistics on the point.

Such statistics, if securable at this time—which they are not under the present circumstances of war-torn Europe—would be of interest, but they would beg the point. The point considered was whether the American composer is or is not fairly treated on American orchestral programs, most of them arranged by foreign-born conductors. As to Mr. Kerr's further argument that "the relative lengths" of the compositions performed should count in the estimate, that is certainly beside the mark. Is Sibelius's "Saga," which lasts perhaps eighteen minutes, less important because of that fact than a symphony three-quarters of an hour long by an American? Length has little or nothing to do with the case.

* * *

NOR are we concerned with whether French, German, Italian, English or other conductors emphasize the national element in their programs more than orchestral leaders do here—except for one important consideration; this being that if foreign conductors are more emphatic than we of national musical interests, and more negligible of foreign music of merit, they offer an example which conductors in America certainly should not follow. Nothing is more fatal to musical progress than mere chauvinism. The effect of such provincialism and mutual admiration by national cliques overseas is all too apparent in foreign musical production. It would be a most unfortunate thing if a similar tendency developed here.

Let us go back to the original contention, Mr. Kerr may feel that no special allowance should be made for the prevailing youthfulness of the American school of composition when comparing its products and showing on orchestral programs with the sum total of works by living Europeans. Let us, then, pass over the fact that Strauss the German, Sibelius the Finn, Vaughan Williams the Englishman, Stravinsky the Russian, de Falla the Spaniard, and so on, are masters of composition whose works are acknowledged the world over, and are necessary to have on orchestral programs in order to interest the public—a thing true of very few American compositions of any period thus far. Suppose we count the number of performances given works by contemporaneous Americans as compared, country by country, with the representation of composers of any other one nation. Then what do we find?

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony presented, in all, nine compositions by Americans, as [illegible] Czech, Weinberger; four Englishmen, Walton, Bliss, Williams and Britten; one Italian, Castelnuovo-Tedesco; one Frenchman, Ibert; one Finn, Sibelius; four Russians, Stravinsky, Shostakovich, Prokofieff, Rachmaninoff; three Hungarians, Dohnanyi, Zador, Weiner; one Spaniard, de Falla.

* * *

NINE European nations were represented as against America alone. Sixteen Europeans were played and nine Americans. There were two Stravinsky programs, directed by the composer, so that Stravinsky, under special circumstances, had six compositions performed. Sibelius, one of the most popular and widely recognized composers of this day, had five compositions to his credit. Castelnuovo-Tedesco, Bliss and Dohnanyi had two each; all the others one. A total of twenty-eight European works by contemporaries of nine nations, against nine compositions by as many Americans. The nearest competitor to America was Russia, with four composers, of whom one, Shostakovich, represents the younger generation, and three are long and internationally established—a total of nine Russian compositions as against the same number of American works, most of them by composers under 40 years of age. Finland, in the person of Sibelius, had five, against America's nine. England had five, by four composers; Italy and Hungary had each two. Nor were the Philharmonic-Symphony programs by any means the heaviest laden with American music.

The Boston Symphony presented twelve living Americans, as against six contemporary foreigners—one German, one Frenchman, one Dutchman, three Russians, one Pole and one Finn. The Philadelphia Orchestra played six Americans, as against seven foreigners—two Hungarians, one Rumanian, four Russians, one Finn, one German, one Pole, one Austrian. The Cleveland Symphony Orchestra played thirteen works by Americans, and one work by a South American. Thirteen foreign nations were represented—Belgium by one composer; Rumania by one; France by one; Russia by three; Poland by one; Finland, one; Germany, one; Spain, one. The Chicago Symphony played ten Americans and nine foreigners—Russian, four; English, one; Belgian, one; Finnish, one; German, one; Czecho-Slovak, one.

* * *

THE Rochester Symphony played two American works in its subscription series and forty-two at its special series of American programs—a total of forty-four American works in one season, as against six compositions by Spaniards, and one each by Russian, Finnish, English and German composers. Remember that "Finnish" means one man—Sibelius. "German" usually means Richard Strauss. "Spanish," in most cases, de Falla, etc.

The Indianapolis Symphony played twenty-two scores by living Americans, as against six—one each by Russian, Czech, Finnish, Hungarian, German and Italian composers, the Italian composition being Pietro Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" in concert form.

These data take no account of the epochal significance of the two entire programs of American music with which Dr. Koussevitzky opened his New York series of Boston Symphony concerts last Fall an event which had a very far-reaching influence upon the interests of native composers. Nor is Dr. Koussevitzky's record of this season the only aspect of his immense service to American music—a total of 126 American compositions, of which he has directed 203 performances as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nor do they tell the proportions of the same service done by Frederick Stock of Chicago, of Rodzinsky of Cleveland, or the immense number of manuscript scores played under the direction of Howard Hanson at his Annual Festivals of American Music at Rochester. The Rochester Symphony has played in the course of fifteen years of subscription concerts and ten annual festivals over 600 works by Americans.

Incidentally, it was stated last week that all the great American orchestras but one, the Symphony Orchestra of San Francisco, had responded to THE TIMES's request for lists of the music by contemporaries that they had performed this season. There was another exception, due to an oversight of the management of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, which has now sent in its list. It reveals the performance of eight works by living Americans against eleven by eight foreigners, six of these being such established masters as Dohnanyi, Prokofieff, Rachmaninoff, Sibelius, Strauss, and Stravinsky, who had four works to his credit, and the others one each.

As for the thousands of American works played in a single year by the WPA orchestras, the composers' forums and attendant organizations, that is another story, though one not unrelated to our subject.

The time is here for an immense development in American composition. It is a subject which must command always more attention from the American reviewer or student of music. By every indication this country is in a position to take the lead in music, in creative as well as interpretive fields, in the century before us. But we should not be guilty of self-deception or chauvinism in this critical period. Self-criticism should figure strongly in the situation. We repeat: The more performances the American composer receives, the better. The more imperative is also the realization that he has no one but himself to blame if he does not succeed in his undertakings.

Globe MUSIC May 12

The Boston Symphony's 59th Season

Although the 59th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was ended with the concerts of May 3 and 4, a review of the season has for reasons of space been postponed to this morning.

The artistic health of the Boston Symphony is what it has been for a number of years—phenomenally good. Mr. Koussevitzky is still at his peak as an interpreter of broad tastes, imagination and feeling. He maintains his forces at the keenest technical precision.

Without going into the dreary business of exact figures and elaborate tabulations, let it be said that we have had a well-balanced diet of new music. Two compositions—and only two—stand out as apparent masterpieces, and should be heard until the local public has had opportunity to become familiar with them. Oddly enough they are both violin concertos—the Hindemith and the Bloch—a branch of composition in which little substantial achievement has been recorded for a long time.

Other of the new pieces were of lesser stature yet likable for certain qualities, such as Prof. E. B. Hills' Concertino for strings, George Foote's "In Praise of Winter," the "Joyous" Overture by Belgian Marcel Poot, William Schuman's "American Festival Overture," which gave promise of excellent things to come from him, and the cheery "Pinocchio" Overture by Ernst Toch.

Several works which had been given here previous to this season, proved distinctly worth hearing again — Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," the Third Symphony by Roy Harris, Walter Piston's Piano Concertino, the G minor Violin Concerto of Prokofieff and Randall Thompson's E minor Symphony.

Highlights were the extraordinarily fine performance of the Bach B minor Mass at the Spring pension fund concert, and another hearing of Mahler's Fifth Symphony. We enjoyed Beethoven and a good deal of Sibelius, mostly the tone poems. There was also a good deal of Stravinsky, the composer conducting two programs of his own music.

While Mr. Koussevitzky promised more than usual of Bach and Mozart, the Friday and Saturday audiences heard just one Bach composition and two of Mozart; in the Monday and Tuesday series Mozart was only twice represented and Bach not at all.

No great, full-fledged talent was revealed among the new soloists except Siguard Rascher, who proved both a musician and a virtuoso of the saxophone. But a remarkable talent not yet fully developed was shown when the Negro soprano, Dorothy Maynor, sang first at the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony, and again at the February pension fund concert. Both of the guest conductors, Nicolai Malko and Tauno Hannikainen are musicians of exceptional capabilities, though the former was more intent on polish than vitality.

Second Week of Pops Begins With Finnish Concert

The second week of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall begins tonight with the first of the Sunday programs. Tonight's concert will benefit Finnish relief and reconstruction, and Tauno Hannikainen, the noted Finnish musician who directed some Boston Symphony concerts last Winter, will be guest conductor. He will divide his program between Sibelius and Brahms, as detailed below.

Tomorrow will be the annual Harvard night, at which the Harvard Glee Club will sing, and with three guest conductors. Notable composers of Harvard will be represented.

Soloists of the week will be Elizabeth Travis, piano, Wednesday evening; Palmyra da Camara, piano, Thursday evening, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, piano, at the second Sunday concert, May 19.

Arthur Fiedler, regular conductor of the Pops, will direct the concerts from Tuesday evening on. The Pops begin at 8:30. Programs of the week:

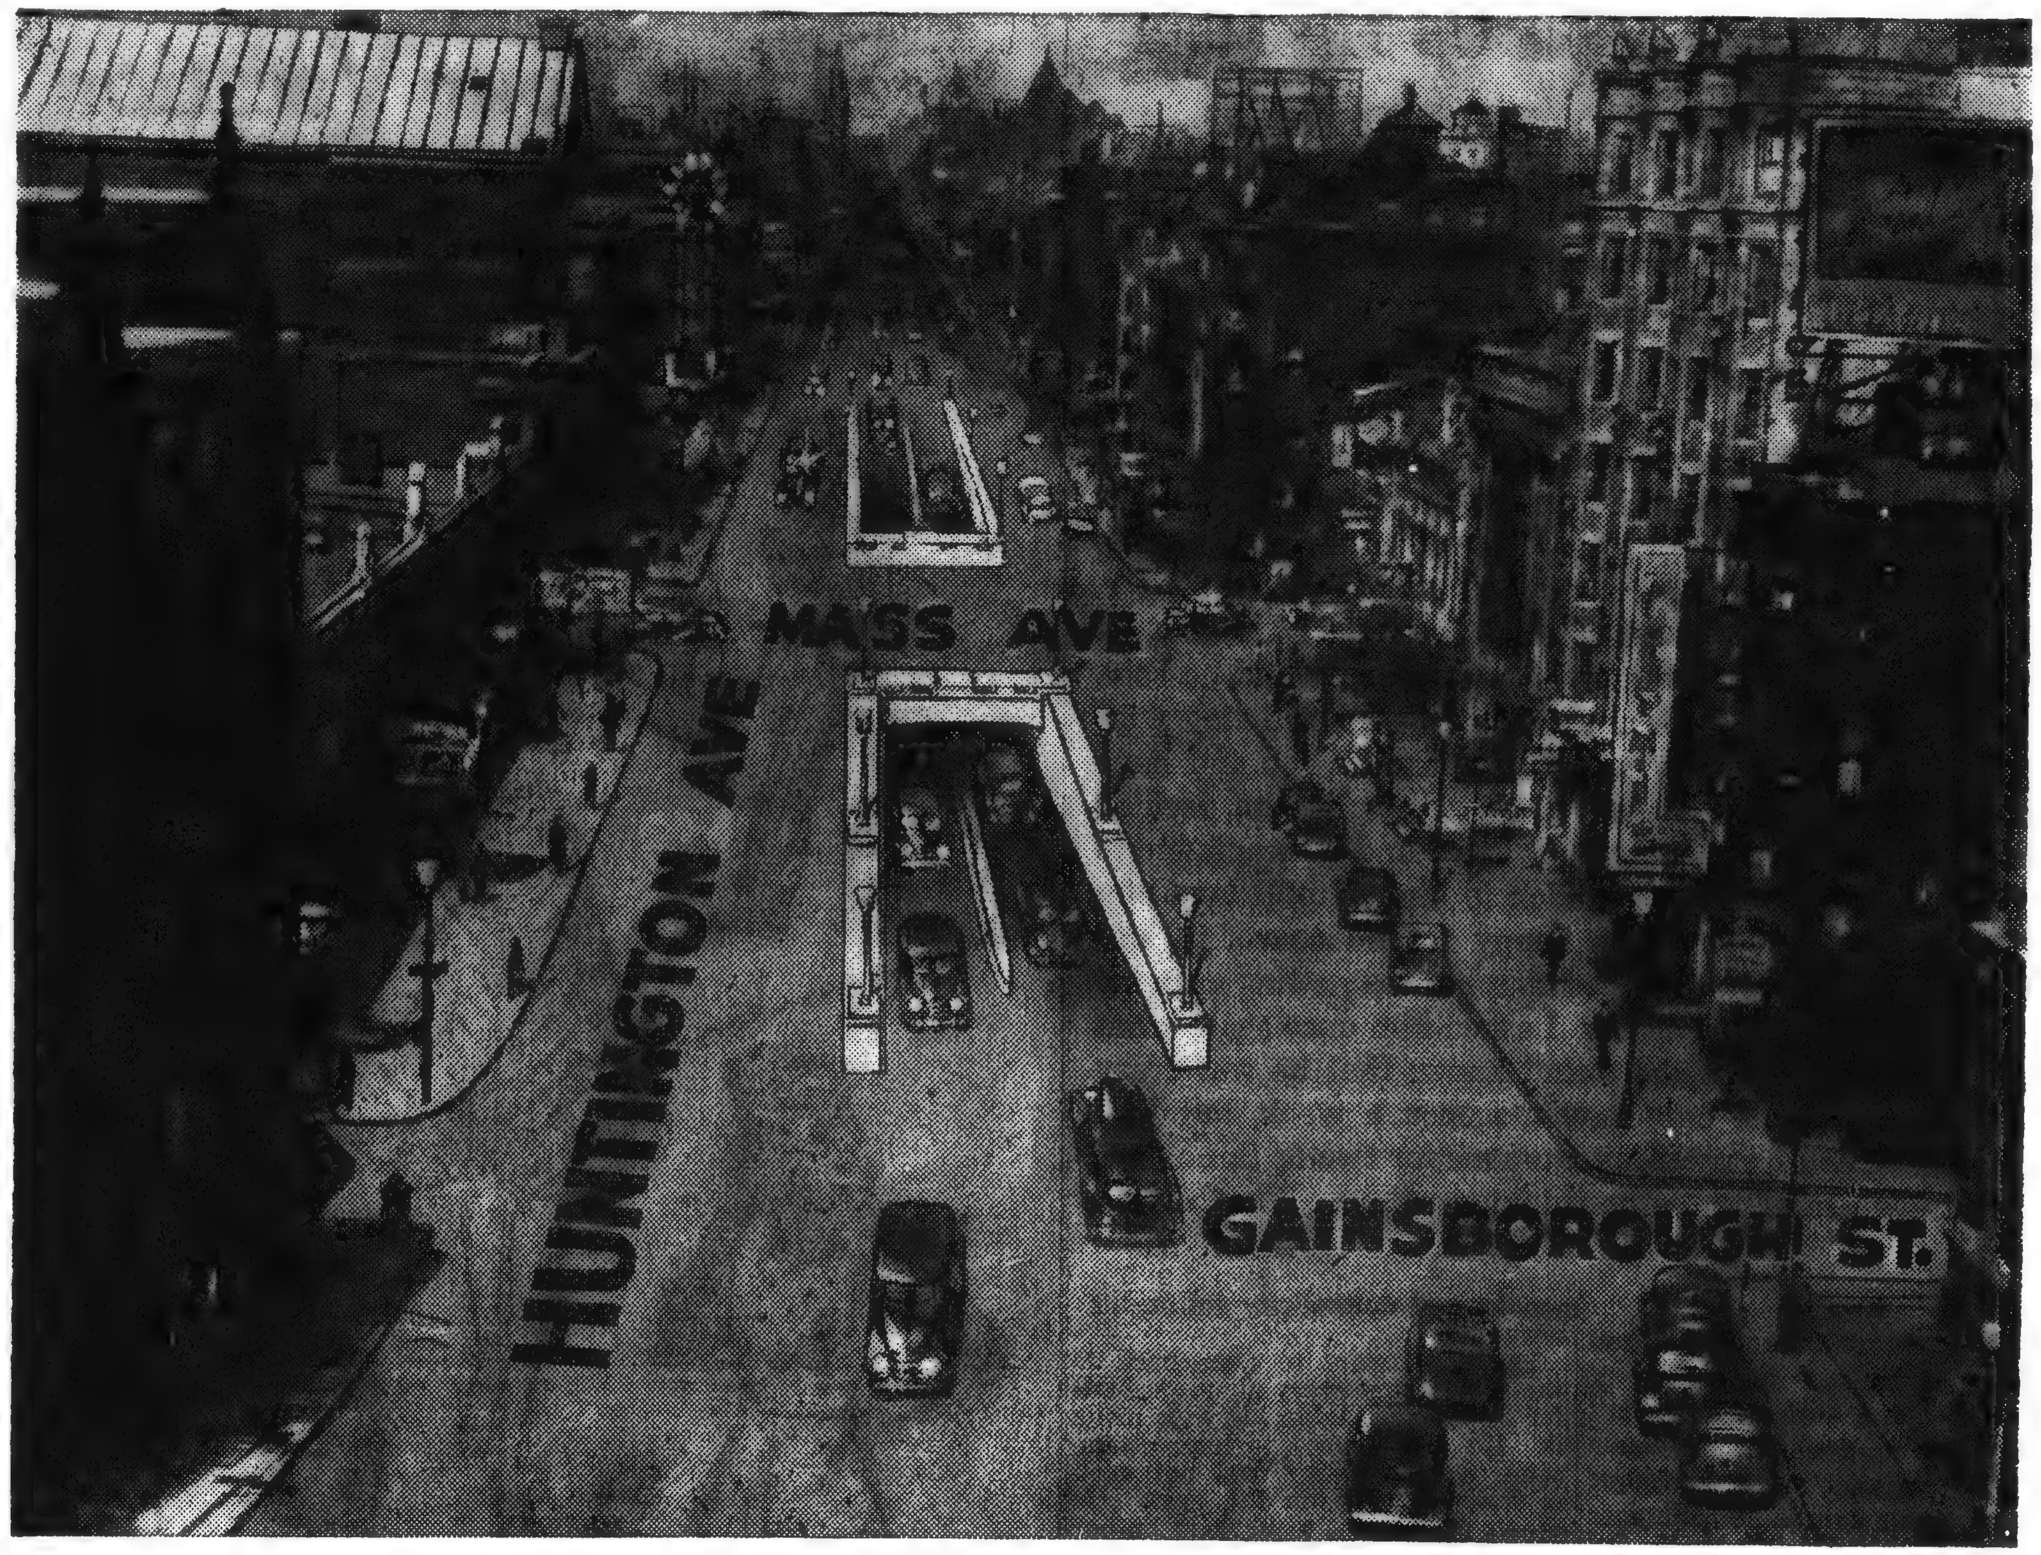
HUNTINGTON-AV. UNDERPASS FAST, DIRECT ROUTE TO CITY

Four-Lane Roadway Will Help Unsnarl Traffic Tieups at Massachusetts-Av. Intersection

Hurried and impatient motorists who over the years have grown more or less hardened to approaching the traffic maelstrom at Huntington and Massachusetts avs. are watching progress on the Huntington-av. subway with a good deal of personal interest. For the big W. P. A. project includes a vehicular underpass which, it is expected, will relieve the congestion on one of Boston's worst corners.

The underpass will cost a total of $800,000, of which the city is putting up $300,000 with W. P. A. funds providing the rest. The traffic experts seem to think its worth the price and point to the count taken before construction of the subway removed a major part of the motor vehicles off Huntington av.

This count, taken June 30, 1938, began at 7 in the morning and ended 12 hours later. It showed that 25,554 cars passed during that time, a little more than 2000 an hour. That may not sound much, but most of them came in the rush hours and then Huntington av. and Massachusett av. were auto drivers' nightmares. The count showed that during the time checked 8602 cars passed along Massachusetts av. headed toward Cambridge, 6497 in the opposite direction. On Huntington av, 5137 were inward bound and 5318 outward bound.



WHEN THE UNDERPASS IS COMPLETED
No more tieups at Massachusetts av. during rush hours.

Bends the Subway

The underpass, being part of the huge Huntington-av. project, differs in a number of ways from the Commonwealth underpass. To allow room for it, the tubes which carry the Elevated cars bend away from each other at a point near Norway st., continue in the sweeping curve as they pass under Massachusetts av. Before reaching Gainsboro st. the tubes turn toward each other again.

This slight bend in the tubes allows room for the underpass. The motor vehicles will duck under just beyond Norway st., opposite the Christian Science buildings and come up again a little before Gainsboro st. The underpass will be about 1000 feet from one end of the sunken road to the other.

The walls of the underpass are the walls of the subway itself. On the underpass side they will be faced with granite when the subway work is done.

The underpass will look a good deal like the one at Commonwealth av. and Massachusetts av. There will be metal railings of the same type used on the older underpass which will separate vehicles entering the underpass from those passing along Huntington av. to Massachusetts av. so as to make the turn there.

On the west entrance of the underpass up near Gainsboro st. provision will be made for cars coming out of Gainsboro st. to turn down Huntington av., make a turn above the underpass onto Huntington av. and proceed up to Gainsboro st. This is to care for the often heavy traffic which comes out of Gainsboro st. bound to or from the Boston Arena, the New England Conservatory of Music and other places in the area back of Huntington av.

Solving Water Problem

The underpass itself is a four-lane one, with usual division between the two-way traffic lines.

Water can be plenty of a problem in an underpass. To handle it at Huntington av. there will be a drainage basin 11 feet and 10 feet wide by 20 feet long. There will be a float which, when water rises to its level, will start an electric pump. The pump will take the water from the basin and pour it into the sewer. If the single pump isn't enough there is provision for a second which will in turn start automatically if the first proves incapable of handling the flood.

Backers of the Huntington-av. project think the underpass, joined to the removal of surface cars from the avenue as far as the Opera House, will popularize the street as a fast, direct route into Boston, especially from the Worcester Turnpike. Some of the traffic now coming around the Arborway and down Commonwealth av. may prefer this route when it is completed.

Whether the underpass will do much to reduce accidents isn't so certain. Registrar of Motor Vehicles Frank A. Goodwin, who thinks underpasses are good things, adds that such jammed corners as Huntington and Massachusetts avs. aren't productive of many accidents. This, he says, is largely because traffic is slowed down and all but the most rattled-brained of pedestrians are reasonably careful.

The figures bear him out. The record shows that the last fatal motor vehicle accident at this corner was in 1928. In 1937 and 1938 there were 12 accidents each year in which personal injury either to a motorist or a pedestrian was involved. Last year there were 18 of this type, the increase being largely attributed to the confusion of construction.

YEAR'S FIRST POP CONCERT

Hannikainen Conducts; In Honor of Finland

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The season's first Sunday Pop Concert, that of last evening, took the form of a special concert in honor of and in aid of Finland. Tauno Hannikainen conducted, and although he might have made his programme all Sibelius, or at least all Finnish, he avoided this extreme of partisanship and devoted the second half of the concert to the C minor Symphony of Brahms.

The Sibelius items, which made the preceding portion, were four in number: "Finlandia," the Elegy from the incidental music to "King Christian II.," the tone poem, "Night Ride and Sunrise," and the Scherzo and Finale from the Second Symphony. It is more than likely that "Finlandia" has been played more often in the United States in the season just past than any other symphonic work. Nor has the Second Symphony been neglected. But as far as Boston is concerned the Elegy and "Night Ride and Sunrise" are rarities. The first, composed in 1898, was last heard here in 1916; the second, composed in 1909, was played here in 1917 and again the next season.

Unquestionably, they would have made a deeper impression under the more favorable conditions of the Symphony Concerts than they did last evening, with the reduced orchestra, disadvantageously seated on a level stage. The Elegy is sombre and solemn, rather than deeply moving, while its companion piece, like other of the lesser Sibelius tone poems, hardly rises above picturesqueness. Unlike most of the typical 19th century composers, Sibelius is more inspired when he does not have a poetic idea to prompt him than when he does. In other words, his symphonies are far and away his greatest music. Mr. Hannikainen conducted with the spirit and efficiency that have marked his other appearances here.

The stage was decorated with the flags of the United States and of Finland and with an enormous wreath around which were entwined the Finnish colors, blue and white. Before the concert began the Finnish Minister to the United States, Hjalmar J. Procope, made a stirring address. And as the first number on the musical programme, Mr. Hannikainen offered "The Star Spangled Banner." The audience was both large and fashionable.

Herald May 13

E. B. Hill Honored

The concert Friday night in honor of Edward Burlingame Hill commemorated his thirty-two years' service as a teacher of music at Harvard and drew attention to his achievements and versatility as a composer. In scholarship he devoted his abilities to the modern French school and published an important book on the significance of this contemporary music. Doubtless he will find time, in his retirement from active teaching, to bring this book up to date and will also devote himself to original composition.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has frequently played his works. They are characterized by great facility of expression. They are attractive to the ear without being sentimental or lush. Nor has he disdained a sense of humor.

New England was perhaps the first place on the continent where music gained a firm foothold as an art. It was also the first place where the native composer could be said to thrive or, as the historians like to put it, "come of age." Mr. Hill grew up in the Harvard musical tradition. Naturally his own artistic personality expanded from this and developed along lines of individual thought.

A teacher's reward must be of the moment, but as a composer Mr. Hill can contemplate a longer span and recognize, not without pride, that he has added luster to the Harvard name.

20

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Finnish Relief Pops

The first Sunday Pop concert of the season, last evening, was a benefit for Finnish relief and reconstruction. Tauno Hannikainen conducted as guest, dividing his program between music of the great Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, and the First Symphony of Brahms.

The packed house, special ushers in Finnish costume, and the United States and Finnish colors displayed on the Symphony Hall stage emphasized the special nature of the occasion. The evening began with the "Star Spangled Banner," after which Hjalmar Procope, Finnish Minister to the United States, addressed the audience. In a short but ringing speech which had a thrilling quality of confidence, Mr. Procope spoke of the needs of Finland for reconstruction and for assistance to its people.

From the works of Sibelius, Mr. Hannikainen chose "Finlandia," the Elegy from the incidental music to "King Christian II," "Night Ride and Sunrise," and the scherzo and finale from the Second Symphony, in D major. As a conductor of Sibelius, Mr. Hannikainen's prowess was shown to Boston when, first, he directed the Second Symphony at the Pops two years ago, and most recently at the pair of Boston Symphony concerts he led as guest last Winter.

It was interesting to observe his careful, forthright way last evening with the seldom-heard "Night Ride and Sunrise," and also with the symphonic excerpts. "Finlandia" was nobly done, a performance truly exciting. Though minor Sibelius, the Elegy from "King Christian II" is very likable music.

With Brahms Mr. Hannikainen dealt as he had with Sibelius, obtaining a musicianly reading, clear and logical save for an inclination to hurry the closing pages of the finale. He was most warmly applauded.

C. W. D.

for them odd and original, such

Hannikainen at Benefit Pops Tonight

Piano Soloists Will Feature 2d Week Of Pop Concerts

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall will begin tonight the second week of their 55th season. Arthur Fiedler will present programes with elements of musical importance and gratifying populartity, designed to please the extensive tastes of the wide and varied Pops public. Mr. Fiedler's orchestra of Symphony players will be heard in a different program each night.

Tonight there will be a concert for the benefit of Finland, with Tauna Hannikainen as guest conductor. Tomorrow will be the annual Harvard night, with three guest conductors and notable composers of Harvard well represented. The Harvard Gle Club will assist the orchestra in the middle group. Elizabeth Travis will be the notable soloist o fWednesday evening's concert; Palmyra de Camart, the soloist of Thursday; and Jesus Maria Sanroma the soloist of the second Sunday concert on May 19.

The programs follow (the concerts from Tuesday night to be conducted by Mr. Fiedler):

Tauno Hannikainen, famous Finnish conductor, who will conduct the Pops orchestra at Symphony Hall tonight in a special benefit concert in aid and honor of Finland.

Musical Events

TODAY—The first of the Sunday Pop concerts at 8:30 P. M., in Symphony Hall, will be conducted by Tauno Hannikainen and will be devoted to the cause of Finnish relief. Mr. Hannikainen will present Brahms' First Symphony in C minor, and the following works of Sibelius: "Finlandia"; Elegy from "King Christian II" Suite; "Night Ride and Sunrise", Symphonic Poem Op. 55; Scherzo and Finale from Symphony No. 2 in D major. The programs for the rest of the Pop concerts will be found elsewhere in this section.

The Liturgical Choir of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, directed by Leonard Whalen, and Pietro Yon, organist, will give a concert in Jordan Hall at 8 P. M. The choir will sing a number of early plain chants, music by Pales-

Elizabeth Travis, pianist, who will be soloist at the Pops on Wednesday evening in a benefit concert for the

Non-Symphonic Remarks On the Season Just Past

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Although the Boston Symphony's concerts provide the center of interest of our musical season, it is profitable to take stock of the activities each year that are not under Mr. Koussevitzky's direct control. Naturally series like the Flute Players', Mr. Zighera's chamber orchestra and the Early Music Society involve the participation of members of the Boston Symphony and so, in a sense, are conditioned by it. On the other hand we may also consider these concerts as separate events.

In the eyes of most people the opera looms large on the musical horizon, and there are doubtless a great many who attend it with enthusiasm and yet are not normally disposed to set foot in Symphony Hall. The Metropolitan's visit was extensively discussed before, and we need not spend much time over it now. The authorities were criticized for not letting us hear the successful revival of Mozart's "Figaro"; and there was consequently a kind of vicious satisfaction for some of us that "Gioconda", as a substitute, was not completely sold out. The vexing question of the scarcity of cheap tickets is still with us; and, unless the season can be prolonged, it is difficult to offer a solution. Indications are that the Metropolitan will attain its $1,000,000 goal and thus save itself for another five years or so. Boston has certainly supported it well in its annual visits and presumably will continue to do so.

An important aspect of this season has been the presence here of Igor Stravinsky. His Charles Eliot Norton lectures at Harvard will be published and may more fittingly be considered then, especially as we were unable to hear all of them. Mr. Stravinsky's own concerts with the Boston Symphony have been thoroughly reviewed, so that it is sufficient here to note the stimulating effect of his presence. In view of European conditions we may well hope that he will reside in America until further notice.

VARIOUS HIGHLIGHTS

Casting back to recall certain concerts that stood out in particular relief may be an invidious process, though it is certainly natural. The annual Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society concert was emphatically one of these. Mr. Woodworth chose an exceptionally interesting program, with a new chorus by Walter Piston of high ingenuity and a number of remarkable choruses by Giovanni Gabrieli. Another choral event—besides, of course, the B minor Mass—was the Handel and Haydn Society's performance of Haydn's "Creation."

The morning musicales, which provide a chance to hear a number of famous artists who might not otherwise come to Boston, had a good season. The most rewarding of the series to our mind was the first opportunity to hear that excellent young violinist, Robert Virovai. Other exceptional recitals were Lotte Lehmann's "Lieder Abend", Busch and Serkin, Nathan Milstein, the 100th concert of the Flue Players' Club, the second of the Zighera Chamber Orchestra concerts, Jan Smeterlin, Vladimir Horowitz. It was a great pleasure to welcome back Mr. George Copeland, whose interpretations of Debussy and of Spanish music put most pianists to shame. We heard a number of unsual songs at various concerts, little known works by Debussy, Wolf, Mahler, and others, sung by Cleora Wood. This admirable artist has made herself indispensable locally.

If this seems on the whole a short list of memorable events it is because we have only mentioned concerts that were good all the way through, so to speak. There were many occasions where the tone of a review would be generally loud in praise; yet they might not linger in the memory to the same extent and for one reason or another.

As far as we can see neither the war nor the institution of the radio nor other world disaster seems to have interrupted the flow of concerts. Nor is it possible to say that their quality has deteriorated. Ordinarily one would think that times of worry would not promote an artist's best work. America has become to a large extent a refuge for artists and scholars, and the result in the long run may be akin to the effects of the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453. If America is to be the scene of another renaissance, by all means let us be alert enough to take advantage

---

Ushers at Finnish Relief Pop Concert

Left to Right—Viole Heikkila, Dagmar Peurala, Viola Ray, Barbara Mattson, May Brayant, Elizabeth Cabot.

THE BOSTON HERALD, MONDAY, MAY 13, 1940

Sunday Night Program of 55th Pops Season

Hannikainen Conducts Concert For Benefit of Finnish Relief

Miss Fanny Mason, Committee Chairman, And Morton P. Princes Entertain in Advance

By ALISON ARNOLD

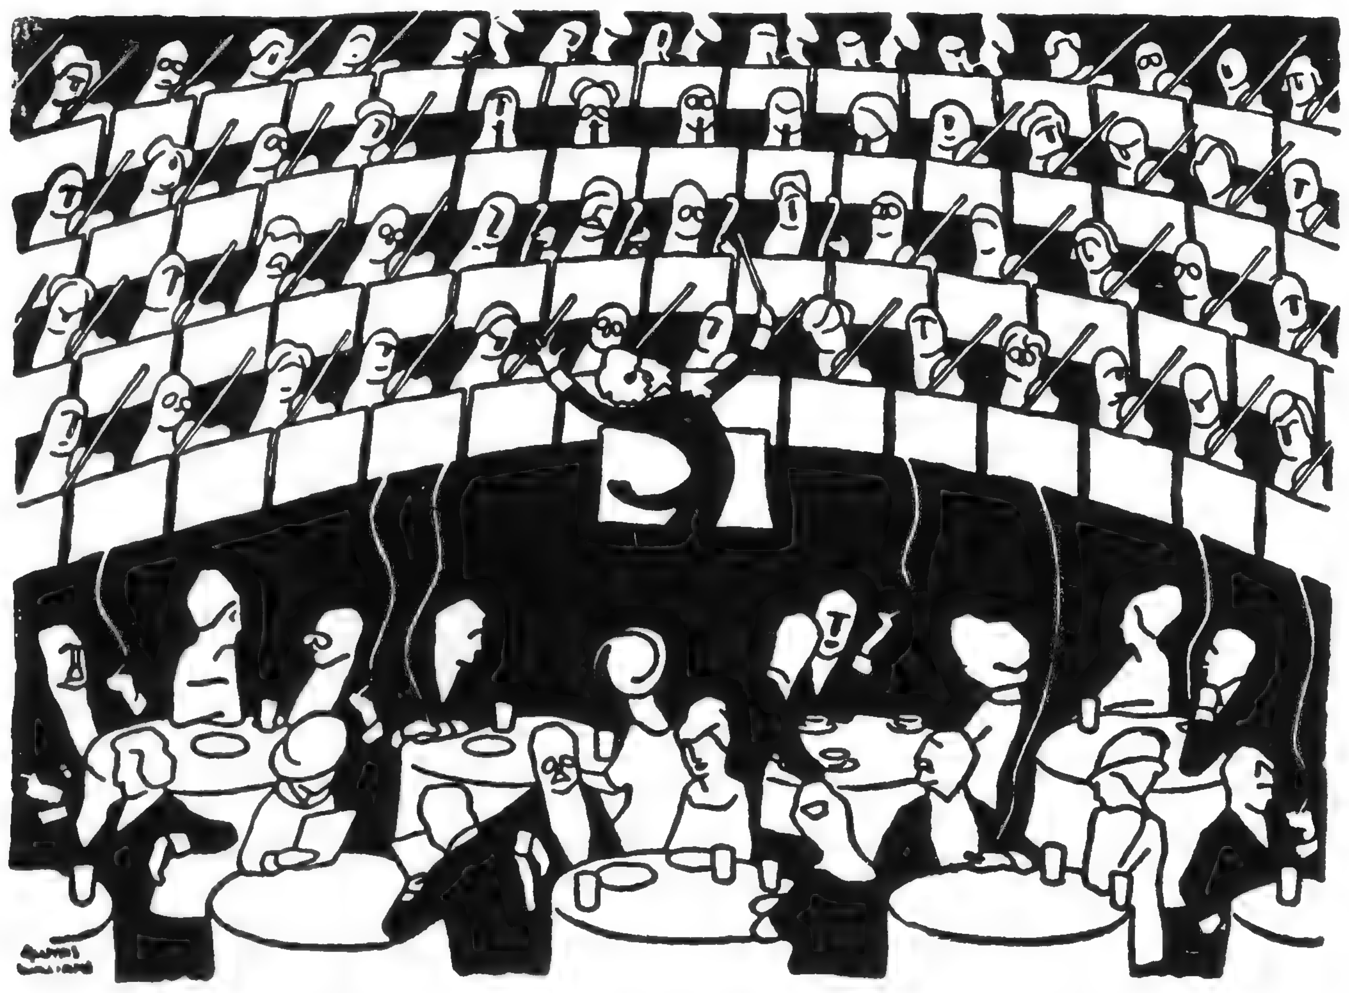
The first Sunday Pop concert of the 55th season of these concerts in Symphony Hall was an impressive one since the proceeds from the evening are to go toward Finnish Relief and Reconstruction. Tauno Hannikainen, brilliant Finnish conductor, was the guest conductor, and the program included several compositions by Sibelius. Concluding the program was Brahms No. 1 Symphony in C Minor. Symphony Hall was crowded with prominent members of society, and before the program started and during the intermission, post debutantes and Finnish girls sold Finnish dolls to add to the fund. A special added attraction was the appearance of Mr. Edward Everett Horton, star of "Springtime for Henry" at the Wilbur Theater, who attended the concert with several members of the company. The Finnish Minister, Haljmar Procope, was also a guest at the concert.

A great many dinner parties preceded the concert. Miss Fanny Mason, who headed the concert committee, entertained at dinner hav- as her guests, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Mrs. Bird in a green and black print gown; Mr. and Mrs. Harvey Bundy, the latter wearing a sable cape over her black gown, and Mr. Mark A. Dewolfe Howe. Mr. and Mrs. Morton P. Prince, the latter in black satin and lace, and Mr. and Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb entertained at dinner for Mr. John B. Mattson, Finnish vice-consul and Mrs. Mattson. Other guests were Mr. Russell Codman, Jr., Mr. Herbert B. Elliston, Mr. and Mrs. Maurice Osborne, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Metcalf and Miss Betty Titcomb.

At the table with Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, who wore a gown of mauve chiffon with a corsage of white orchids, were her daughter, Miss Mary Fuller, in gray with a plaid skirt, the latter's fiance, Mr. Robert L. Henderson, another daughter, Miss Lydia Fuller, who wore black trimmed with white, and Miss Ellen Bottomley in a white background print gown.

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Jr., gave a dinner before the concert, Mrs. Dane looking extremely lovely in a gown of black organdy and net. In their party were Mr. and Mrs. Nathaniel Niles, Mrs. Niles in grape colored crepe, Miss Marie LeM. Stevenson, in a gown of palest pink chiffon, Mr. David Griggs and Mr. John Pierce.

Mrs. Hannikainen was a guest of Mrs. George Hawley, who wore a black net gown, as were former Governor and Mrs. Channing H. Cox, the latter wearing a white ermine wrap over her gown. Miss Doris Foote wore a green wrap with her gown, and in pale blue crepe was Mrs. William Brace Pratt, who was accompanied by her son, Mr. Peter Pratt. Mr. and Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs were in a party with their daughter, Miss Rebekah Hobbs. Mrs. Hobbs wore a feather boa with her gown of black and white printed satin and Miss Rebekah's gown of black taffeta had a black and white plaid bodice. Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Lyman Eliot were in a large party, Mrs. Eliot in a gown of pale blue chiffon, and in black was Mrs. Alexander Steinert. Still others noted were Miss Mary Hastings, Mrs. Roger S. Warner, in black, Mrs. John Yerxa, Miss Jane Pickman, Mrs. Handasyd Cabot, Mr. Harleston Parker and Mrs. Constantin Pertzoff, the former Olga Monks.



SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

55th Season Opens Wednesday, May 8th

POPS

ORCHESTRA OF 85 SYMPHONY PLAYERS
ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor

Annual HARVARD NIGHT Monday, May 13
BENJAMIN GROSBAYNE, '17, G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, '24
LEROY ANDERSON, '29, Conductors

"1915" NIGHT — TUESDAY, JUNE 18

The regular season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will close in Symphony Hall May 4.

The Berkshire Music Center will be inaugurated at "Tanglewood" (between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass.) by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with a six weeks session (July 8 to August 18).

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival will be given at "Tanglewood" coinciding with the last three weeks of the Music Center (August 1, 3, 4, 8, 10, 11, 15, 17, 18).

Particulars about each series of concerts, and a catalogue for the Berkshire Music Center will be sent on application to Symphony Hall, Boston.

op Concert Calendar for Next Week

Pop Concerts begin at 8.30 at Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler conducts unless otherwise noted.

Tonight

March, "El Capitan"	Sousa
Overture to "Mignon"	Thomas
"Molly on the Shore"	Grainger
"Espana" Rhapsody	Chabrier
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"	Tchaikovsky
Andante Cantabile for Strings	Tchaikovsky
Third Movement Symphony No. 6	Tchaikovsky
Fantasy on Gershwin Melodies
Mozart Matriculates	Alec Templeton
Prelude to "Carmen"	Bizet

Tomorrow

Overture, "Donna Diana"	Reznicek
"Military" Symphony	Haydn
Prelude in E major	Bach-Cailliet
Pianoforte Concerto in A minor	Paderewski
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
Londonderry Air	Arranged by Grainger
"Ride of the Valkyries"	Wagner

Monday

Marche Militaire	Schubert
"Romeo and Juliet," Overture Fantasia	Tchaikovsky
Cradle Song	Brahms-Smith
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem	Sibelius
"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"	Mozart
Mexican Rhapsody	McBride
Songs by the M. G. H. Nurses' Glee Club
"Wine Woman and Song," Waltzes	Strauss
"Begin the Beguine"	Porter
Sailors' Dance from "The Red Poppy"	Glière

Tuesday

Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"	Mozart
Walther's Prize Song	Wagner
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree	Weinberger
Spanish Rhapsody	Braggiotti
Coronation Scene from "Boris Godunov"	Moussorgsky
Fray and Braggiotti
Rhapsody in Blue	Gershwin
Fray and Braggiotti
Bach Goes to Town	Alec Templeton
Fifth Hungarian Dance	Brahms

Wednesday

Procession of the Sardar from the "Caucasian Sketches"	Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"	Glinka
"Träume"	Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
"The Prince and the Princess," from "Scheherazade"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
Incidental Music to "Antony and Cleopatra"	Quincy Porter
(Conducted by the Composer)
"Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs," Fantasy	Churchill
"On the Trail," from the "Grand Canyon" Suite	Grofé
In the Hall of the Troll King, from "Peer Gynt"	Grieg

Thursday

Polonaise from "Eugene Onegin"	Tchaikovsky
Scherzo from the "New World" Symphony	Dvorak
Passepied from "Le Roi s'amuse"	Delibes
Capriccio Espagnole	Rimsky-Korsakov
Songs by the Radcliffe Choral Society
G. Wallace Woodworth, Conductor
"Estudiantina," Waltzes	Waldteufel
Mozart Matriculates	Alec Templeton
Spanish Dance from "La Vida Breve"	de Falla

Friday

Triumphal March from "Aida"	Verdi
Overture to "Zampa"	Herold
"Spring," for String Orchestra	Grieg
Ballet Music from "Faust"	Gounod
Divertissement	Ibert
"None but the Lonely Heart"	Tchaikovsky-Cailliet
Bolero	Ravel
"Artists' Life," Waltzes	Strauss
"When You Wish Upon a Star"	Harline
American Patrol	Meacham

Saturday

"Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III	Wagner
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"	Rossini
"The Swan"	Saint-Saëns
Violoncello solo Jacobus Langendoen
Pop Goes the Weasel	Cailliet
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," Waltzes	Strauss
Rhapsody in Blue	Gershwin
Piano solo: Leo Litwin
Cielito Lindo	Arranged by Bodge
Songs of the Old-Days
"Stars and Stripes Forever," March	Sousa

— SYMPHONY HALL—COM 1492 —
TONIGHT 8:30
POPS
ARTHUR FIEDLER—Conductor.
TOMORROW 8:30
SANROMA — Soloist
TUESDAY, MAY 21
FRAY and BRAGGIOTTI
All Tickets On Sale 2 Wks. in Advance

Berkshire Programs Announced

Program details for the three weeks of concerts at Tanglewood to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, were announced today by the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. They are as follows:

SERIES A

FIRST PROGRAM

Thursday Evening, Aug. 1, 8.30

Beethoven: Symphony No. 1.
Schumann: Symphony No. 1.
Sibelius: Symphony No. 1.

SECOND PROGRAM

Saturday Evening, Aug. 3, 8.30

Berlioz: Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."
Strauss: "Don Quixote."
Violoncello solo: Gregor Piatigorsky. Viola solo: Jean Lefranc.
Harris: Symphony No. 3.
Debussy: "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune."
Ravel: Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" (Second Suite).

THIRD PROGRAM

Sunday Afternoon, Aug. 4, 3.30

Mozart: Symphony in E-flat (K. 543).
Stravinsky: Capriccio for Orchestra with Piano Solo.
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma.
Brahms: Symphony No. 2.

SERIES B

(Programs of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky, commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of Tchaikovsky's birth.)

FOURTH CONCERT

Thursday Evening, Aug. 8, 8.30

Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont."
Beethoven: Concerto for Violin in D.
Soloist: Albert Spalding.
Tchaikovsky: Symphony, "Pathetique."

FIFTH CONCERT

Saturday Evening, Aug. 10, 8.30

Beethoven: Overture, "Coriolanus."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4.
Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 4.

SIXTH CONCERT

Sunday Afternoon, Aug. 11, 8.30

Beethoven: Symphony No. 6.
Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 5.

SERIES C

SEVENTH CONCERT

Thursday Evening, Aug. 15, 7-9.30

Bach: Mass in B Minor (in two parts).
Berkshire Festival Chorus: Elisabeth Schumann, soprano; Viola Silva, mezzo-soprano; William Hain, tenor; Alexander Kipnis, bass; Richard Burgin, violin; Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, Obol d'Amore; William Valkenier, horn; Georges Laurent, flute; E. Power Biggs, organ; Erwin Bodky, harpsichord.

EIGHTH CONCERT

Saturday Evening, Aug. 17, 8.30

Prokofieff: "Classical" Symphony.
Hindemith: Symphony, "Mathis der Maler."
Mozart: Concert Aria.
Beethoven: "Adelaide."
Soloist: Dorothy Maynor.
Faure: "Pelleas et Melisande."
Respighi: Symphonic Poem, "The Pines of Rome."

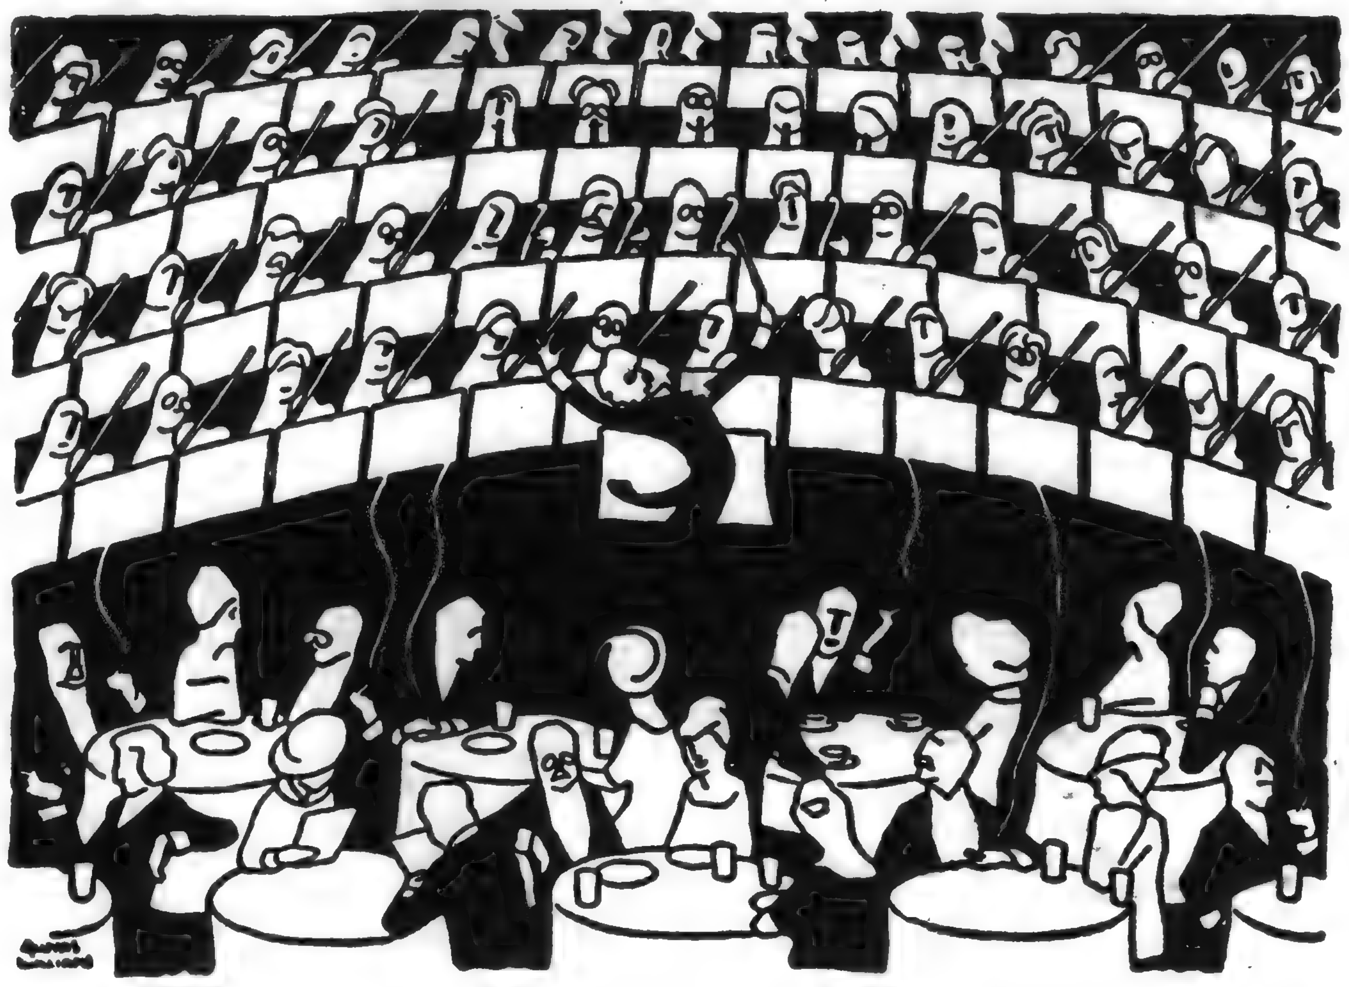
NINTH CONCERT

Sunday Afternoon, Aug. 18, 3.30

Haydn: Symphony in G-major, No. 88.
Sibelius: Symphony No. 7.
Brahms: Symphony No. 1 in C-minor, Op. 68.

7

Sunday Night Program of 55th Pops Season



SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

55th Season Opens Wednesday, May 8th

POPS

ORCHESTRA OF 85 SYMPHONY PLAYERS
ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor

Annual HARVARD NIGHT Monday, May 13
BENJAMIN GROSBAYNE, '17, G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, '24
LEROY ANDERSON, '29, Conductors

"1915" NIGHT — TUESDAY, JUNE 18

The regular season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will close in Symphony Hall May 4.

The Berkshire Music Center will be inaugurated at "Tanglewood" (between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass.) by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with a six weeks session (July 8 to August 18).

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival* will be given at "Tanglewood" coinciding with the last three weeks of the Music Center (August 1, 3, 4, 8, 10, 11, 15, 17, 18).

Particulars about each series of concerts, and a catalogue for the Berkshire Music Center will be sent on application to Symphony Hall, Boston.

Hannikainen Conducts Concert For Benefit of Finnish Relief

Miss Fanny Mason, Committee Chairman, And Morton P. Princes Entertain in Advance

By ALISON ARNOLD

The first Sunday Pop concert of the 55th season of these concerts in Symphony Hall was an impressive one since the proceeds from the evening are to go toward Finnish Relief and Reconstruction. Tauno Hannikainen, brilliant Finnish conductor, was the guest conductor, and the program included several compositions by Sibelius. Concluding the program was Brahms No. 1 Symphony in C Minor. Symphony Hall was crowded with prominent members of society, and before the program started and during the intermission, post debutantes and Finnish girls sold Finnish dolls to add to the fund. A special added attraction was the appearance of Mr. Edward Everett Horton, star of "Springtime for Henry" at the Wilbur Theater, who attended the concert with several members of the company. The Finnish Minister, Haljmar Procope, was also a guest at the concert.

A great many dinner parties preceded the concert. Miss Fanny Mason, who headed the concert committee, entertained at dinner having as her guests, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Mrs. Bird in a green and black print gown; Mr. and Mrs. Harvey Bundy, the latter wearing a sable cape over her black gown, and Mr. Mark A. Dewolfe Howe. Mr. and Mrs. Morton P. Prince, the latter in black satin and lace, and Mr. and Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb entertained at dinner for Mr. John B. Mattson, Finnish vice-consul and Mrs. Mattson. Other guests were Mr. Russell Codman, Jr., Mr. Herbert B. Elliston, Mr. and Mrs. Maurice Osborne, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Metcalf and Miss Betty Titcomb.

At the table with Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, who wore a gown of mauve chiffon with a corsage of white orchids, were her daughter, Miss Mary Fuller, in gray with a plaid skirt, the latter's fiance, Mr. Robert L. Henderson, another daughter, Miss Lydia Fuller, who wore black trimmed with white, and Miss Ellen Bottomley in a white background print gown.

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Jr., gave a dinner before the concert, Mrs. Dane looking extremely lovely in a gown of black organdy and net. In their party were Mr. and Mrs. Nathaniel Niles, Mrs. Niles in grape colored crepe, Miss Marie LeM. Stevenson, in a gown of palest pink chiffon, Mr. David Griggs and Mr. John Pierce.

Mrs. Hannikainen was a guest of Mrs. George Hawley, who wore a black net gown, as were former Governor and Mrs. Channing H. Cox, the latter wearing a white ermine wrap over her gown. Miss Doris Foote wore a green wrap with her gown, and in pale blue crepe was Mrs. William Brace Pratt, who was accompanied by her son, Mr. Peter Pratt. Mr. and Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs were in a party with their daughter, Miss Rebekah Hobbs. Mrs. Hobbs wore a feather boa with her gown of black and white printed satin and Miss Rebekah's gown of black taffeta had a black and white plaid bodice. Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Lyman Eliot were in a large party, Mrs. Eliot in a gown of pale blue chiffon, and in black was Mrs. Alexander Steinert. Still others noted were Miss Mary Hastings, Mrs. Roger S. Warner, in black, Mrs. John Yerxa, Miss Jane Pickman, Mrs. Handasyd Cabot, Mr. Harleston Parker and Mrs. Constantin Pertzoff, the former Olga Monks.

[illegible]op Concert Calendar for Next Week

Pop Concerts begin at 8.30 at Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler conducts unless otherwise noted.

Tonight

March, "El Capitan"	Sousa
Overture to "Mignon"	Thomas
"Molly on the Shore"	Grainger
"Espana" Rhapsody	Chabrier
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"	Tchaikovsky
Andante Cantabile for Strings	Tchaikovsky
Third Movement Symphony No. 6	Tchaikovsky
Fantasy on Gershwin Melodies
Mozart Matriculates	Alec Templeton
Prelude to "Carmen"	Bizet

Tomorrow

Overture, "Donna Diana"	Reznicek
"Military" Symphony	Haydn
Prelude in E major	Bach-Caillet
Pianoforte Concerto in A minor Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma	Paderewski
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
Londonderry Air	Arranged by Grainger
"Ride of the Valkyries"	Wagner

Monday

Marche Militaire	Schubert
"Romeo and Juliet," Overture Fantasia	Tchaikovsky
Cradle Song	Brahms-Smith
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem	Sibelius
"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"	Mozart
Mexican Rhapsody	McBride
Songs by the M. G. H. Nurses' Glee Club
"Wine Woman and Song," Waltzes	Strauss
"Begin the Beguine"	Porter
Sailors' Dance from "The Red Poppy"	Gliere

Tuesday

Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"	Mozart
Walther's Prize Song	Wagner
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree	Weinberger
Spanish Rhapsody	Braggiotti
Coronation Scene from "Boris Godunov" Fray and Braggiotti	Moussorgsky
Rhapsody in Blue Fray and Braggiotti	Gershwin
Bach Goes to Town	Alec Templeton
Fifth Hungarian Dance	Brahms

Wednesday

Procession of the Sardar from the "Caucasian Sketches"	Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"	Glinka
"Träume"	Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
"The Prince and the Princess," from "Scheherazade"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
Incidental Music to "Antony and Cleopatra" (Conducted by the Composer)	Quincy Porter
"Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs," Fantasy	Churchill
"On the Trail," from the "Grand Canyon" Suite	Grofé
In the Hall of the Troll-King, from "Peer Gynt"	Grieg

Thursday

Polonaise from "Eugene Onegin"	Tchaikovsky
Scherzo from the "New World" Symphony	Dvorak
Passepied from "Le Roi s'amuse"	Delibes
Capriccio Espagnol	Rimsky-Korsakov
Songs by the Radcliffe Choral Society G. Wallace Woodworth, Conductor
"Estudiantina," Waltzes	Waldteufel
Mozart Matriculates	Alec Templeton
Spanish Dance from "La Vida Breve"	de Falla

Friday

Triumphal March from "Aida"	Verdi
Overture to "Zampa"	Herold
"Spring," for String Orchestra	Grieg
Ballet Music from "Faust"	Gounod
Divertissement	Ibert
"None but the Lonely Heart"	Tchaikovsky-Caillet
Bolero	Ravel
"Artists' Life," Waltzes	Strauss
"When You Wish Upon a Star"	Harline
American Patrol	Meacham

Saturday

"Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III	Wagner
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"	Rossini
"The Swan" Violoncello solo Jacobus Langendoen	Saint-Saëns
Pop Goes the Weasel	Caillet
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," Waltzes	Strauss
Rhapsody in Blue Piano solo: Leo Litwin	Gershwin
Cielito Lindo	Arranged by Bodge
Songs of the Old Days
"Stars and Stripes Forever," March	Sousa

SYMPHONY HALL—COM 1492
TONIGHT 8:30
POPS
ARTHUR FIEDLER—Conductor
TOMORROW 8:30
SANROMA — Soloist
TUESDAY, MAY 21
FRAY and BRAGGIOTTI
All Tickets On Sale 2 Wks. in Advance

Berkshire Programs Announced

Program details for the three weeks of concerts at Tanglewood to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, were announced today by the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. They are as follows:

SERIES A
FIRST PROGRAM
Thursday Evening, Aug. 1, 8.30
Beethoven: Symphony No. 1.
Schumann: Symphony No. 1.
Sibelius: Symphony No. 1.

SECOND PROGRAM
Saturday Evening, Aug. 3, 8.30
Berlioz: Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."
Strauss: "Don Quixote."
Violoncello solo: Gregor Piatigorsky. Viola solo: Jean Lefranc.
Harris: Symphony No. 3.
Debussy: "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune."
Ravel: Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" (Second Suite).

THIRD PROGRAM
Sunday Afternoon, Aug. 4, 3.30
Mozart: Symphony in E-flat (K. 543).
Stravinsky: Capriccio for Orchestra with Piano Solo.
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma.
[illegible]: Symphony No. 2.

SERIES B
(Programs of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky, commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of Tchaikovsky's birth.)

FOURTH CONCERT
Thursday Evening, Aug. 8, 8.30
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont."
Beethoven: Concerto for Violin in D.
Soloist: Albert Spalding.
Tchaikovsky: Symphony, "Pathetique."

FIFTH CONCERT
Saturday Evening, Aug. 10, 8.30
Beethoven: Overture, "Coriolanus."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4.
Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 4.

SIXTH CONCERT
Sunday Afternoon, Aug. 11, 3.30
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6.
Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 5.

SERIES C
SEVENTH CONCERT
Thursday Evening, Aug. 15, 7-9.30
Bach: Mass in B Minor (in two parts).
Berkshire Festival Chorus: Elisabeth Schumann, soprano; Viola Silva, mezzo-soprano; William Hain, tenor; Alexander Kipnis, bass; Richard Burgin, violin; Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, Oboi d'Amore; William Valkenier, horn; Georges Laurent, flute; E. Power Biggs, organ; Erwin Bodky, harpsichord.

EIGHTH CONCERT
Saturday Evening, Aug. 17, 8.30
Prokofieff: "Classical" Symphony.
Hindemith: Symphony, "Mathis der Maler."
Mozart: Concert Aria.
Beethoven: "Adelaide."
Soloist: Dorothy Maynor.
Faure: "Pelleas et Melisande."
Respighi: Symphonic Poem, "The Pines of Rome."

NINTH CONCERT
Sunday Afternoon, Aug. 18, 3.30
Haydn: Symphony in G-major, No. 88.
Sibelius: Symphony No. 7.
Brahms: Symphony No. 1 in C-[illegible]

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, MONDAY, MAY 13, 1940

Finland's Night at Pops—

Hannikainen Conducts Sibelius-Brahms Program

With Hjalmar J. Procope, Finnish Minister, and Dr. Serge Kousevitzky as guests, the Boston Committee on Finnish Relief sponsored a special Pops concert last night in Symphony Hall, conducted by Tauno Hannikainen of Finland.

As introduction to the program, George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, introduced Mr. Procope, who spoke in behalf of his countrymen in distress and expressed his and their gratitude for the friendship of the United States.

When Mr. Hannikainen appeared, the capacity house stood and applauded him for many minutes. He opened the program with an unannounced performance of "The Star Spangled Banner."

The first half of the regular program was devoted appropriately to Finland's major musical figure, Jan Sibelius. It opened with "Finlandia, and continued with a pair of Sibelius items that were almost novelties: the Elegy from the Suite of incidental music to Adolf Paul's tragedy, "King Christian II," and the symphonic poem "Night Ride and Sunrise."

* * *

The Elegy had not been heard in Boston, to the best of our knowledge, for 24 years. Mr. Hannikainen lavished great care upon the performance last night and won a good tone from the orchestra, but the richness of effect dependent upon the greater volume of the full symphony orchestra was missed. The "Night Ride," unheard here since 1918, is also music which demands much of both conductor and orchestra. The performance last night revealed the talents of Mr. Hannikainen, if at the same time the smaller orchestral forces limited them. The Scherzo and Finale from the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D major completed the first portion of the program and gave conductor and orchestra full opportunity to merit the enormous applause which followed the performance.

* * *

The final item on the program was the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, to which Mr. Hannikainen and the orchestra gave the fullest measure of devotion, thereby winning an ovation from the audience. During the evening, this first Sunday night audience of the season heard the music offered under most auspicious circumstances, since Mr. Hannikainen waited to commence a number until the hall was quiet—and a Pops audience does not always give a conductor such attention. The innovation was pleasantly acceptable to those who attend a Pops concert for the music it offers.

G. M. S.

Pops Programs

Pops programs for the remainder of the week will be as follows:

Tuesday Evening

March Militaire .... Schubert
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," .... Mozart
Praeludium .... Jarnefelt
"Romeo and Juliet," Oventure Fantasia .... Tchaikovsky
"Danse Macabre," Symphonic poem, ... Saint-Saens
Ave Maria ...... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Bolero .... Ravel
"Tales from the Vienna Woods." Waltzes .... Strauss
"The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from Tsar Saltan," .... Rimsky-Korsakoff Sixth Hungarian Dance

Wednesday Evening

Hungarian March, 'Rakoczy,' Berlioz
Ballet Suite .... Rameau-Mottl
Scherzo from Octet .... Mendelssohn
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurenberg" .... Wagner
Piano Concerto No. 2, in F minor.. .... Chopin
Soloist—Elizabeth Travis
"Show Boat," selection .... Kern
Fugato on a Well-Known Theme ... . McBride
"Thunder and Lightning," Polka,.... .... Strauss

Thursday Evening

March from "The Queen of Sheba" .... Gounod
Overture to "William Tell" . Rossini
Liebesfreud .... Kreisler
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem .... Sibelius
Piano Concerto in A major, No. 2 .... Liszt
Soloist—Palmyra da Camara
Framingham State Teachers College Glee Club. Director, Edward F. Gilday.
"Espana," Waltzes ..... Waldteufel
Polka from "Ritter Pasman" Strauss
Farandole from "L'Arlesienne"..... .... Bizet
Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
Second Movement, Allegretto, Symphony, No. 7 .... Beethoven

Friday Evening

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Procession of Bacchus from "Sylvia" .... Delibes
Soviet Iron Works .... Mossolov
Mexican Rhapsody .... McBride
Orphean Club of Lasell Junior College—George Sawyer Dunham, Conductor. Harold Schwab, Accompanist.
Waltzes, "Roses from the South".. .... Strauss
Pavane .... Gould
Strike Up the Band .... Gershwin

Saturday Evening

March "El Capitan" .... Soussa
Overture to "Mignon" ...... Thomas
"Molly on the Shore" .... Grainger
"España" Rhapsody .... Chabrier
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" .... Tchaikovsky
Andante Cantabile for Strings .... Tchaikovsky
Third Movement from the Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic" .... Tchaikovsky
Fantasy on Gershwin Melodies
Mozart Matriculates. Alec Templeton
Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet

Sunday Evening

Overture, "Donna Diana" .. Reznicek
Symphony in G major, No. 100, "Military" .... Haydn
Prelude in E major .... Bach-Cailliet
Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, Op. 17
Soloist—Jesús María Sanromá
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes .... Strauss
Londonderry Air ... Arr. by Grainger
"Ride of the Valkyries," .... Wagner

Hill Honored In Concert Of His Compositions

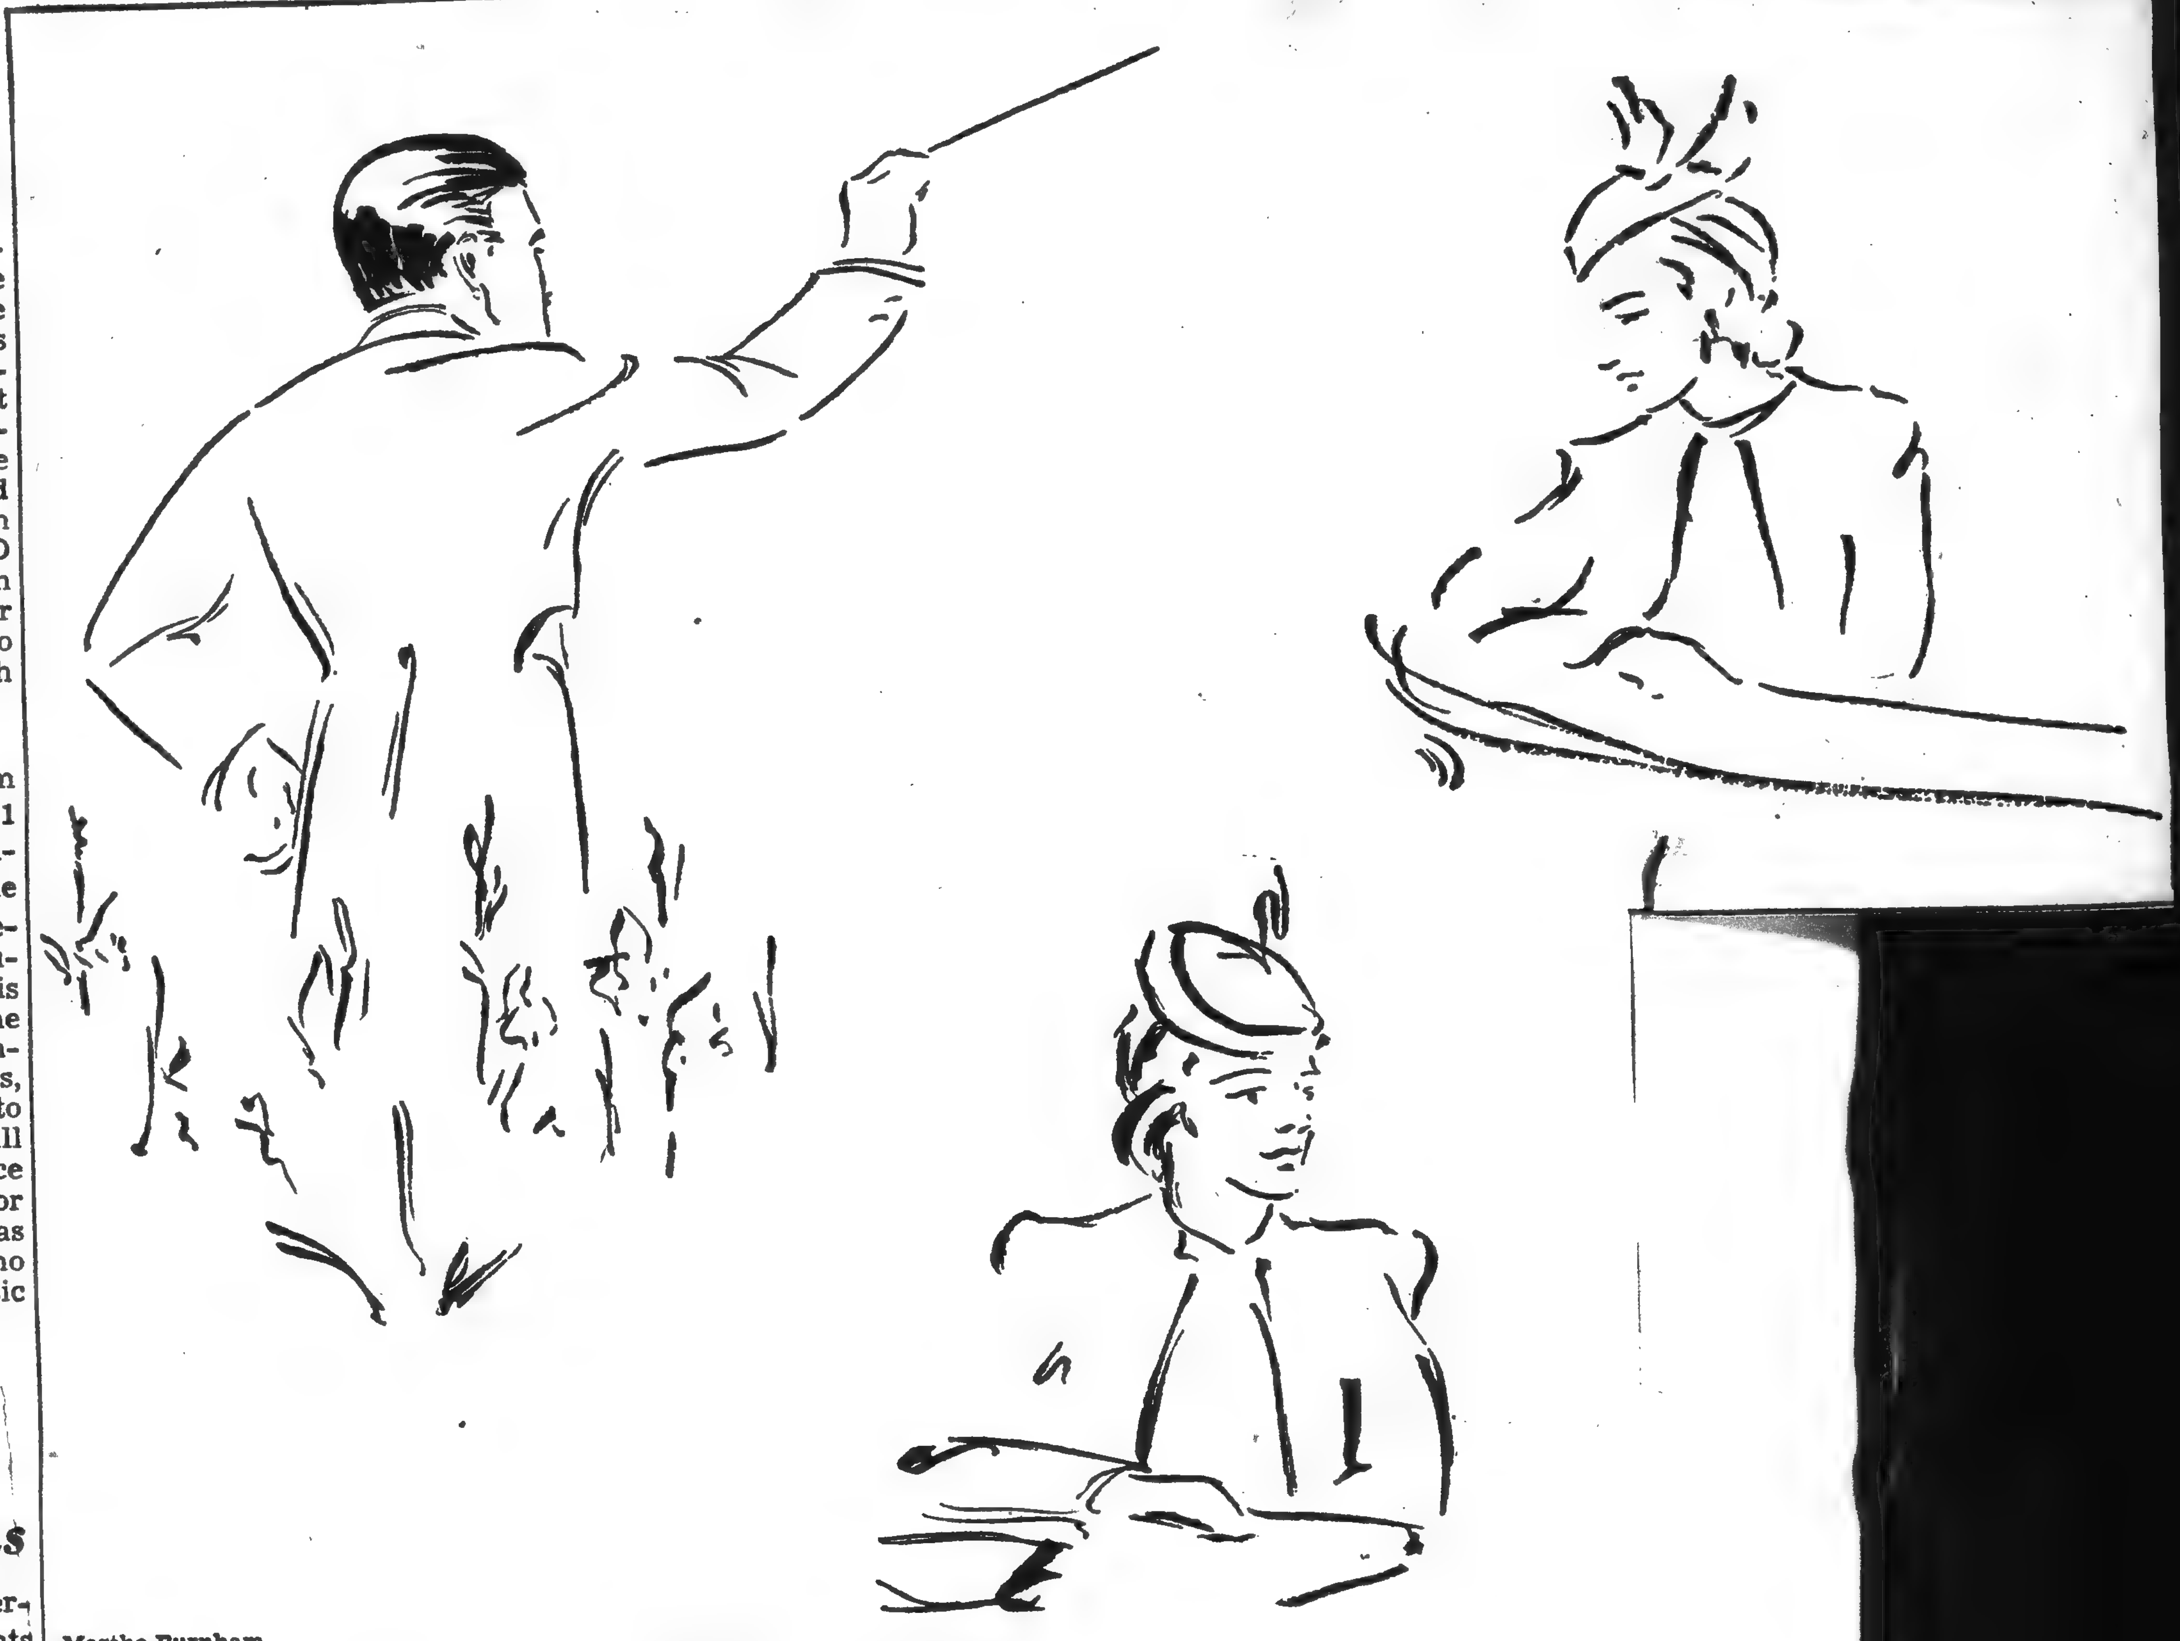
To compose with power and persuasion in the three departments of piano, voice, and string quartet should be enough to put a man in the company of top-ranking musicians; and for a university scholar to do so should be something to start people talking, inasmuch as such a one is commonly supposed to write only handicraft exercises that prove his right to teach. Yet Edward Burlingame Hill, who holds the James Edward Ditson chair of music at Harvard, showed up as a master of piano, voice, and quartet composing at a concert given in John Knowles Paine Hall, Cambridge, on Friday evening, the program of which was devoted to works of his; the most impressive of them written in the past five years.

As composer for piano, Mr. Hill made distinguished record of himself in a piece entitled Concertino No. 2 for piano and orchestra, in one movement, the solo performer being Jesús María Sanromá, and the assisting player on a second piano, Walter Piston. Then, as composer for voice, Mr. Hill shone in a cycle of Three Songs (without text) which Miss Doris Doe, the Metropolitan Opera contralto, vocalized, Mr. Sanromá taking the accompanying part. Lastly, Mr. Hill earned applause for a string quartet, played by the Chardon Quartet (Messrs. Lauga, Knudsen, Cauhapé, and Chardon).

To say "lastly," however, is to turn things the wrong way around, because the Quartet opened the program. But the Concertino, being a new piece, calls for first and chief mention; and it may be described as hardly yet released from the workshop. It bears marks, indeed, of sketchiness and incompleteness and is none the less interesting for that. It is conceived in the big brilliant style that brings to view the orchestral platform and the spacious auditorium. It has flair and fire. It is scant, perhaps, on contrasts and goes rather shy on sentiment.

In fact, the whole program seemed pretty disdainful of the romantic, unless a sonata for flute and piano, in which George Laurent took part with Mr. Sanromá, could be counted an exception. Mr. Hill gets into a humorous vein and makes a success of it, when he likes; and he excels in the assertive. The second movement of the Quartet is extraordinary for its clear-cut themes and its vigorous rhythms.

W. P. T.



Martha Burnham

Sketches at the Pops

An artist's impressions of Arthur Fiedler, conducting, and some of the audience at Symphony Hall

At the Pops Tonight

Harvard Night

Guest Conductor:
Benjamin Grosbayne, '17.
Overture to "Die Fledermaus"...Strauss
Scherzo Capriccioso .... Dvořák
Overture to "Rienzi"............Wagner
Guest Conductor:
G. Wallace Woodworth, '24.
Two Choruses from "The Mikado".... .... Sullivan
Tarantella.......Randall Thompson, '20
(Orchestrated by Wm. Denny)
Jazz Studies for Piano and Orchestra ....Edward Burlingame Hill, '94
Soloist: Jesús María Sanromá
Carnival Song for Men's Voices and Brass............ Walter Piston, '24
Casey Jones........American Folk Song
(Arranged by Edward B. Lawton, '34)
Harvard to the Harvard Men.........
Words and Music by Charles Norman Fay, '69
THE HARVARD GLEE CLUB
Guest Conductor:
Malcolm Holmes, '28.
"Voices of Spring," Waltzes.....Strauss
Variations on "Mary Had a Little Lamb"........Edward Ballantine, '07
Harvard Sketches.. Leroy Anderson, '29
Prayer of Thanksgiving.............. .... Valerius-Kremser
Fair Harvard

MUSIC--

Peggy Stuart Soloist at Pops

There is this pleasant aspect about the Pop concerts, that every night has the air of an "opening." Last night, the second, was no exception. The gaily attired audience was enthusiastic; popular Arthur Fiedler conducted with his usual zest and decisiveness. Familiar music as the Berlioz "Rakoczy" March, Ravel's "Pavane for a Dead Infanta," the Finale from Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, a suite from Bizet's "Carmen," to say nothing of the still more familiar encores, in which catagory Templeton's "Mozart Matriculates" will soon find itself, contrasted last evening with the new music of Peggy Stuart's "Smoke Drift." This latter was played with clarity and precision by the composer herself.

Arthur Fiedler admirably set the proper spirit for each work. Tchaikovsky's Finale was stirring and Ravel's "Pavane" was delicately poignant. Mention must be made of Schonherr's Austrian Peasant Dances, which were given the humorous performance the music calls for.

Miss Stuart's composition was mild and pleasant, wrought principally in two styles: slight bits of musical atmospheric painting of the Loeffler variety, and the Gershwin vintage of sophisticated popular stuff. Three groups had tables at last evening's Pops, the George Junior Republic Association, the Faulkner Hospital Alumnae Association, and the Sisterhood of Temple Mishkan Tefila.

E. M.

THIS CLIPPING
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
MAY 17 1940

It's quite cricket to look down your nose at Bostonians these days. In one of the final concerts by Boston symphony before the start of the current "Pops" season, Conductor Serge Kousevitzky gave the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique" such a ride that the audience not only applauded at the end of the stirring third movement,—a mortal sin for Brahmins but a large proportion of the customers started to leave, forgetting all about the fourth movement. It was a trying evening for Serge, who must have felt all his past efforts in vain, and we'd like to have heard the dressing down the ushers got for opening the doors a movement too early.

* * *

Palmyra da Camara Pop Concert Soloist

At last night's Boston Symphony Pop Concert Palmyra da Camara played the Liszt Second Piano Concerto under the baton of Arthur Fiedler. Another feature of the concert was the Framingham Teachers College Glee Club which sang songs of Stephen Foster, Romberg, Friml and a Czech Folk-song under the direction of Edward Gilday.

Other numbers on the program were Sibelius' "Finlandia," the Overture to Rossini's "William Tell," a Farandole from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" Suite and the march from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION & REPUBLICAN

MAY 19 1940

Boston Symphony Ends 59th Season

On Saturday, the 4th, Serge Koussevitzky brought to a close, with memorable performances of Beethoven's Second, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphonies, the 59th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the 16th under his famed direction.

Dr Koussevitzky included in the last three programs of the season the final three symphonies of Tchaikovsky, in observance of the centennial of the composer's birth. After the last chords of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony had resounded in Symphony hall, the audiences responded with prolonged demonstrations. The reviewers thus summed up the season which ended:—

"Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra again gave us an exhibition of magnificent playing and interpretations ideally suited to these very different symphonies. There used to be a time —say a dozen years ago—when the merits of the various major orchestras were animatedly discussed. Fortunately for us those discussions today generally begin with an admission of the supremacy of the Boston Symphony. . . . Yesterday's concert was, then, a high testimonial to the vitality of the Boston Symphony and its conductor. We are always sorry to see the end of another symphony season—Friday is never a normal day until the middle of October!—but if it must stop, it is well to be assured that it does so in the full tide of glorious achievement." (Alexander Williams, Boston Herald)

"Players and conductor are at the hight of their powers, a fabulous instrument unrivaled today." (C. W. Durgin, Boston Globe)

The performances of new works proved in several cases musical events of real importance. They included the Violin Concertos of Hindemith and Bloch, the 'Cello Concerto of Prokofieff, the Third Symphony of Hanson, and the Second of Lopatnikoff; Hill's String Concertino, and Szymanowski's Symphonie Concertante. Stravinsky conducted two programmes of his own music. Choral works included Bach's B Minor Mass, Debussy's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," and Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" and "Symphony of Psalms."

The 55th season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony hall, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, opened the 8th and continues nightly through June. In July, the season of free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade will be given, while on the 8th of that month the new Berkshire Music Center at "Tanglewood" (between Stockbridge and Lenox) will begin. Serge Koussevitzky, who is the director of the school, will conduct at "Tanglewood," concurrently with the last three weeks of its six weeks session (August 1-18), the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

MUSIC

Transcript May 13

Finnish Concert

Hannikainen Leads Boston Symphony In Pop Concert for Finnish Relief

By EDWARD DOWNES

With feeling running high in this country over the murderous invasion which has just added three more to the long list of ruthlessly assaulted small countries, music loving Bostonians crowded Symphony Hall last night to attest their continued sympathy for Finland's heroic spirit—a spirit which we have seen defend Finnish homes and forests, a spirit which whispers and thunders through the scores of Jan Sibelius, and which was brought nearer to us last night through the conducting of Tauno Hannikainen, the eminent Finnish musician, who led the Boston Symphony in a Pop Concert for the benefit of Finnish relief and reconstruction funds.

The first part of Mr. Hannikainen's program was devoted entirely to Sibelius: the symphonic poem, "Finlandia," the Elegy from "King Christian II," "Night Ride and Sunrise" and the Scherzo and Finale from the Second Symphony in D major.

Before the beginning of the music George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony, introduced the Finnish minister to this country, Hjalmar Procope, who expressed the thanks of his country for the sympathy and financial assistance we are lending Finland in its heartbreaking task of relief and reconstruction. There was confidence and deep emotion in his voice as he reaffirmed his belief in the ultimate vindication of the rights of all small countries to independent, democratic existence.

Mr. Hannikainen was greeted with an enthusiasm which brought the audience to its feet, but the Finnish conductor modestly launched the orchestra immediately into the "Star Spangled Banner," which opened the program. The extraordinary silence and attention of the audience during the sombre, defiant score of "Finlandia," set the mood of the entire evening, a mood of entire seriousness in spite of all attendant enthusiasm.

In the Elegy from "King Christian II" Mr. Hannikainen again proved himself a sensitive instrument for Sibelius' more delicate moments of melancholy as well as for the eerie imaginings of "Night Ride and Sunrise." The last two movements of the Second Symphony, for all the conductor's restraint were rugged enough, and the climax of the finale fairly lifted one listener out of his seat.

It was an uncommonly vital interpretation of the Brahms First Symphony which followed the intermission. Mr. Hannikainen's attention was constantly upon the broad architecture of the score and upon the far-flung melodic line of its component parts. This was particularly true of the second movement which he took as a real Andante and in which Brahms' additional direction: "sostenuto" was carried out in spirit as well as in the letter. The Finnish conductor showed that in his Brahms as well as Sibelius he can unite bold sense of drama, a flare for exciting climaxes, with a firm grasp of the score as an organically proportioned whole.

The clamor of applause was shared by the orchestra.

Juan Sanromá

Monitor May 16

J. M. Sanromá

Who will play the Paderews Piano Concerto in A mino the Symphony Hall Pop C of May 19.

The Lure of the Soloist

IF there has been any lingering doubt about the appeal of soloists at summer concerts, the recent record crowds in New York, Chicago and elsewhere on nights when noted artists have appeared with symphony orchestras in open-air programs must have answered every question that could be raised. By their drawing power, singers, violinists and pianists have doubled, tripled and quadrupled on their special nights what could be regarded as average attendance for the nights when there have been no soloists, in the same series. Often they add materially to the cost of the particular concerts in which they participate. But even at a very low charge for admission, a very little arithmetic will show that when the difference of attendance runs into the thousands and even the fives and even tens of thousands, the additional outlay represents sound business policy.

One thing should not be overlooked, however. The combination of soloist and orchestra is what pleases the American public most. It would be a rash artist who would undertake to fill a summer stadium singled-handed by giving a recital there. If the public loves the soloist, this is not because it does not love its symphonies.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

MAY 15 1940

Boston Pops.
The 55th season of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler continues nightly through June. In July, the season of free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade will be given, while on the 8th of that month the new Berkshire Music Centre at "Tanglewood" (between Stockbridge and Lenox) will begin. Serge Koussevitzky, who is the director of ~~the school~~, will conduct at Tanglewood, concurrently with the last three weeks of its six weeks session (August 1-18), the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

After a six weeks holiday for the complete orchestra, the 60th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in Symphony Hall on October 11-12.

American Works Featured.
A perusal of the works played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season which has just closed gives further proof of Dr. Koussevitzky's interest to assure worthy American composers of a hearing. American compositions played during the season included the first performance of the Bloch Concerto for violin and orchestra with Szigeti as soloist; George Foote's Suite "In Praise of Winter;" the first concert performance of Hanson's Symphony No. 3, conducted by the composer; first performance of Hill's Concertino for String Orchestra; Symphony No. 33 by Roy Harris; Walter Piston's Concertino for Piano and Orchestra in first performance; William Schuman's "American Festival Overture;" Randall Thompson's Symphony No. 2.

MUSIC

Trans. May 16

Elizabeth Travis, Pianist, at Pops

Elizabeth Travis was piano soloist at last night's Pop concert before a cordial audience assembled to aid the Deaconess Hospital. She played the Chopin Concerto No. 2 in F minor, one of the Polish composer's more dated works and one which calls for remarkable playing if its poetry is to be translated to present day listeners.

After a somewhat uncertain beginning, Miss Travis gained confidence in the second movement, the larghetto, and performed the final one, allegro vivace, with the brilliance and fervor which Chopin demands. Here, too, her ensemble with the orchestra was on securer footing. Miss Travis, a Boston girl who has wide experience at the piano here and abroad, obtained sympathetic support from Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra.

The rest of the program was the pleasant Pops routine, the number nearest to novelty being McBride's facetious fugue on the well known theme "There She Goes." E. B. S.

THE POPS SCHEDULE

Many Favorites on This Week's List

Post May 19

TONIGHT

Overture, "Donna Diana"	Reznicek
Symphony in G major, No. 100, "Military"	Haydn
Prelude in E major	Bach-Cailliet
Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, Op. 17	Paderewski
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes	Strauss
Londonderry Air	Arranged by Grainger
"Ride of the Valkyries"	Wagner

MONDAY

Marche Militaire	Schubert
"Romeo and Juliet," Overture Fantasia	Tchaikovsky
Cradle Song	Brahms-Smith
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem	Sibelius
"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"	Mozart
Mexican Rhapsody	McBride
Songs by the M. G. H. Nurses' Glee Club
"Wine, Woman and Song," Waltzes	Strauss
"Begin the Beguine"	Porter
Sailors' Dance from "The Red Poppy"	Gliere

TUESDAY

Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"	Mozart
Walther's Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes	Strauss
Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree, Variations and Fugue on an old English Tune	Weinberger
Spanish Rhapsody	Braggiotti
Coronation Scene from "Boris Godunov"	Moussorgsky
Fray and Braggiotti
Rhapsody in Blue	Gershwin
Fray and Braggiotti
Bach Goes to Town	Alec Templeton
Fifth Hungarian Dance	Brahms

WEDNESDAY

Procession of the Sardar, from the "Caucasian Sketches"	Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"	Glinka
"Dreams"	Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
"The Prince and the Princess," from "Scheherazade"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture, Solenelle, "1812,"	Tchaikovsky
Incidental music to "Antony and Cleopatra"	Quincy Porter
"Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs," (fantasy)	Churchill
"On the Trail," from the "Grand Canyon" Suite	Grofe
In the Hall of the Troll King, from "Peer Gynt"	Grieg

THURSDAY

Polonaise from "Eugene Onegin,"	Tchaikovsky
Scherzo from the "New World Symphony	Dvorak
Passepied from "Le Roi s'amuse"	Delibes
Capriccio Espagnole	Rimsky-Korsakov
(Songs by the Radcliffe Choral Society)
"Estudiantina" Waltzes	Waldteufel
Mozart Matriculates	Alec Templeton
Spanish Dance from "La Vida Brive,"	de Falla

FRIDAY

Triumphal March from "Aida"	Verdi
Overture to "Zampa"	Herold
"Spring," for string orchestra	Grieg
Ballet music from "Faust"	Gounod
Divertissement	Ibert
"None But the Lonely Heart,"	Tchaikovsky-Cailliet
Bolero	Ravel
"Artists' Life," Waltzes	Strauss
"When You Wish Upon a Star," from "Pinocchio"	Harline
American Patrol	Meacham

SATURDAY

"Lohengrin," introduction to Act III.	Wagner
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"	Rossini
"The Swan"	Saint-Saens
Pop Goes the Weasel	Cailliet
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman,"	Wagner
"Tales From the Vienna Woods," Waltzes	Strauss
Rhapsody in Blue	Gershwin
Cielito Lindo	Arranged by Bodge
(Songs of the Old Days)
"Stars and Stripes Forever," March	Sousa

MUSIC

Transcript May 13

Finnish Concert

Hannikainen Leads Boston Symphony In Pop Concert for Finnish Relief

By EDWARD DOWNES

With feeling running high in this country over the murderous invasion which has just added three more to the long list of ruthlessly assaulted small countries, music loving Bostonians crowded Symphony Hall last night to attest their continued sympathy for Finland's heroic spirit—a spirit which we have seen defend Finnish homes and forests, a spirit which whispers and thunders through the scores of Jan Sibelius, and which was brought nearer to us last night through the conducting of Tauno Hannikainen, the eminent Finnish musician, who led the Boston Symphony in a Pop Concert for the benefit of Finnish relief and reconstruction funds.

The first part of Mr. Hannikainen's program was devoted entirely to Sibelius: the symphonic poem, "Finlandia," the Elegy from "King Christian II," "Night Ride and Sunrise" and the Scherzo and Finale from the Second Symphony in D major.

Before the beginning of the music George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony, introduced the Finnish minister to this country, Hjalmar Procope, who expressed the thanks of his country for the sympathy and financial assistance we are lending Finland in its heartbreaking task of relief and reconstruction. There was confidence and deep emotion in his voice as he reaffirmed his belief in the ultimate vindication of the rights of all small countries to independent, democratic existence.

Mr. Hannikainen was greeted with an enthusiasm which brought the audience to its feet, but the Finnish conductor modestly launched the orchestra immediately into the "Star Spangled Banner," which opened the program. The extraordinary silence and attention of the audience during the sombre, defiant score of "Finlandia," set the mood of the entire evening, a mood of entire seriousness in spite of all attendant enthusiasm.

In the Elegy from "King Christian II" Mr. Hannikainen again proved himself a sensitive instrument for Sibelius' more delicate moments of melancholy as well as for the eerie imaginings of "Night Ride and Sunrise." The last two movements of the Second Symphony, for all the conductor's restraint were rugged enough, and the climax of the finale fairly lifted one listener out of his seat.

It was an uncommonly vital interpretation of the Brahms First Symphony which followed the intermission. Mr. Hannikainen's attention was constantly upon the broad architecture of the score and upon the far-flung melodic line of its component parts. This was particularly true of the second movement which he took as a real Andante and in which Brahms' additional direction: "sostenuto" was carried out in spirit as well as in the letter. The Finnish conductor showed that in his Brahms as well as Sibelius he can unite bold sense of drama, a flare for exciting climaxes, with a firm grasp of the score as an organically proportioned whole.

The clamor of applause was shared by the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION & REPUBLICAN

MAY 19 1940

Boston Symphony Ends 59th Season

On Saturday, the 4th, Serge Koussevitzky brought to a close, with memorable performances of Beethoven's Second, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphonies, the 59th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the 16th under his famed direction.

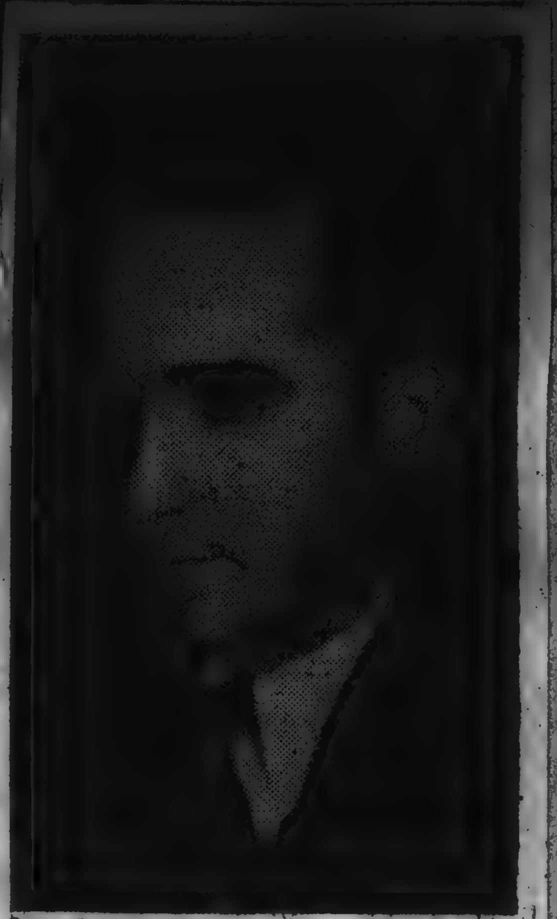
Dr Koussevitzky included in the last three programs of the season the final three symphonies of Tchaikovsky, in observance of the centennial of the composer's birth. After the last chords of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony had resounded in Symphony hall, the audiences responded with prolonged demonstrations. The reviewers thus summed up the season which ended:—

"Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra again gave us an exhibition of magnificent playing and interpretations ideally suited to these very different symphonies. There used to be a time—say a dozen years ago—when the merits of the various major orchestras were animatedly discussed. Fortunately for us those discussions today generally begin with an admission of the supremacy of the Boston Symphony. . . . Yesterday's concert was, then, a high testimonial to the vitality of the Boston Symphony and its conductor. We are always sorry to see the end of another symphony season—Friday is never a normal day until the middle of October!—but if it must stop, it is well to be assured that it does so in the full tide of glorious achievement." (Alexander Williams, Boston Herald)

"Players and conductor are at the hight of their powers, a fabulous instrument unrivaled today." (C. W. Durgin, Boston Globe)

The performances of new works proved in several cases musical events of real importance. They included the Violin Concertos of Hindemith and Bloch, the 'Cello Concerto of Prokofieff, the Third Symphony of Hanson, and the Second of Lopatnikoff; Hill's String Concertino, and Szymanowski's Symphonie Concertante. Stravinsky conducted two programmes of his own music. Choral works included Bach's B Minor Mass, Debussy's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," and Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" and "Symphony of Psalms."

The 55th season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony hall, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, opened the 8th and continues nightly through June. In July, the season of free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade will be given, while on the 8th of that month the new Berkshire Music Center at "Tanglewood" (between Stockbridge and Lenox) will begin. Serge Koussevitzky, who is the director of the school, will conduct at "Tanglewood," concurrently with the last three weeks of its six weeks session (August 1-18), the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.



Juan Sanromá

Monitor May 16

J. M. Sanromá

Who will play the Paderewski Piano Concerto in A minor the Symphony Hall Pop C of May 19.

Courier

The Lure of the Soloist

If there has been any lingering doubt about the appeal of soloists at summer concerts, the recent record crowds in New York, Chicago and elsewhere on nights when noted artists have appeared with symphony orchestras in open-air programs must have answered every question that could be raised. By their drawing power, singers, violinists and pianists have doubled, tripled and quadrupled on their special nights what could be regarded as average attendance for the nights when there have been no soloists, in the same series. Often they add materially to the cost of the particular concerts in which they participate. But even at a very low charge for admission, a very little arithmetic will show that when the difference of attendance runs into the thousands and even the fives and even tens of thousands, the additional outlay represents sound business policy.

One thing should not be overlooked, however. The combination of soloist and orchestra is what pleases the American public most. It would be a rash artist who would undertake to fill a summer stadium singled-handed by giving a recital there. If the public loves the soloist, this is not because it does not love its symphonies.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

MAY 15 1940

Boston Pops.

The 55th season of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler continues nightly through June. In July, the season of free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade will be given, while on the 8th of that month the new Berkshire Music Centre at "Tanglewood" (between Stockbridge and Lenox) will begin. Serge Koussevitzky, who is the director of [redacted], will conduct at Tanglewood, concurrently with the last three weeks of its six weeks session (August 1-18), the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

After a six weeks holiday for the complete orchestra, the 60th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in Symphony Hall on October 11-12.

American Works Featured.

A perusal of the works played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season which has just closed gives further proof of Dr. Koussevitzky's interest to assure worthy American composers of a hearing. American compositions played during the season included the first performance of the Bloch Concerto for violin and orchestra with Szigeti as soloist; George Foote's Suite "In Praise of Winter;" the first concert performance of Hanson's Symphony No. 3, conducted by the composer; first performance of Hill's Concertino for String Orchestra; Symphony No. 33 by Roy Harris; Walter Piston's Concertino for Piano and Orchestra in first performance; William Schuman's "American Festival Overture;" Randall Thompson's Symphony No. 2.

MUSIC

Trans. May 16

Elizabeth Travis, Pianist, at Pops

Elizabeth Travis was piano soloist at last night's Pop concert before a cordial audience assembled to aid the Deaconess Hospital. She played the Chopin Concerto No. 2 in F minor, one of the Polish composer's more dated works and one which calls for remarkable playing if its poetry is to be translated to present day listeners.

After a somewhat uncertain beginning, Miss Travis gained confidence in the second movement, the larghetto, and performed the final one, allegro vivace, with the brilliance and fervor which Chopin demands. Here, too, her ensemble with the orchestra was on securer footing. Miss Travis, a Boston girl who has wide experience at the piano here and abroad, obtained sympathetic support from Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra.

The rest of the program was the pleasant Pops routine, the number nearest to novelty being McBride's facetious fugue on the well known theme "There She Goes."

E. B. S.

THE POPS SCHEDULE

Many Favorites on This Week's List

Post May 19

TONIGHT

Overture, "Donna Diana" .... Reznicek
Symphony in G major, No. 100, "Military" .... Haydn
Prelude in E major .... Bach-Cailliet
Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, Op. 17 .... Paderewski
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes .... Strauss
Londonderry Air .... Arranged by Grainger
"Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner

MONDAY

Marche Militaire .... Schubert
"Romeo and Juliet," Overture Fantasia .... Tchaikovsky
Cradle Song .... Brahms-Smith
Finlandia, Symphonic Poem .... Sibelius
"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" .... Mozart
Mexican Rhapsody .... McBride
Songs by the M. G. H. Nurses' Glee Club
"Wine, Woman and Song," Waltzes .... Strauss
~~"Begin the Beguine"~~ .... Porter
Sailors' Dance from "The Red Poppy" .... Gliere

TUESDAY

Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or" .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
Walther's Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger" .... Wagner
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes .... Strauss
Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree, Variations and Fugue on an old English Tune .... Weinberger
Spanish Rhapsody .... Braggiotti
Coronation Scene from "Boris Godunov" .... Moussorgsky
Fray and Braggiotti
Rhapsody in Blue .... Gershwin
Fray and Braggiotti
Bach Goes to Town .... Alec Templeton
Fifth Hungarian Dance .... Brahms

WEDNESDAY

Procession of the Sardar, from the "Caucasian Sketches" .... Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" .... Glinka
"Dreams" .... Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
"The Prince and the Princess," from "Scheherazade" .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture, Solenelle, "1812," .... Tchaikovsky
Incidental music to "Antony and Cleopatra" .... Quincy Porter
"Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs," (fantasy) .... Churchill
"On the Trail," from the "Grand Canyon" Suite .... Grofe
In the Hall of the Troll King, from "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg

THURSDAY

Polonaise from "Eugene Onegin," .... Tchaikovsky
Scherzo from the "New World Symphony .... Dvorak
Passepied from "Le Roi s'amuse" .... Delibes
Capriccio Espagnole .... Rimsky-Korsakov
(Songs by the Radcliffe Choral Society)
"Estudiantina" Waltzes .... Waldteufel
Mozart Matriculates .... Alec Templeton
Spanish Dance from "La Vida Brive," .... de Falla

FRIDAY

Triumphal March from "Aida" .... Verdi
Overture to "Zampa" .... Herold
"Spring," for string orchestra .... Grieg
Ballet music from "Faust" .... Gounod
Divertissement .... Ibert
"None But the Lonely Heart," .... Tchaikovsky-Cailliet
Bolero .... Ravel
"Artists' Life," Waltzes .... Strauss
"When You Wish Upon a Star," from "Pinocchio" .... Harline
American Patrol .... Meacham

SATURDAY

"Lohengrin," introduction to Act III. .... Wagner
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" .... Rossini
"The Swan" .... Saint-Saens
Pop Goes the Weasel .... Cailliet
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," .... Wagner
"Tales From the Vienna Woods," Waltzes .... Strauss
Rhapsody in Blue .... Gershwin
Cielito Lindo .... Arranged by Bodge
(Songs of the Old Days)
"Stars and Stripes Forever," March .... Sousa

of them odd and original, such

Herald / MUSIC May 20

Pop Concert

The second Sunday Pop concert was given last night in Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler conducted, and the soloist was Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist. The program was as follows:

Reznicek ....Overture to "Donna Diana"
Haydn,
Symphony in G major No. 100, "Military"
Bach-Cailliet,
Prelude from the E major Partita for Violin
Paderewski,
Piano Concerto in A minor Op. 17
J. Strauss........"Blue Danube" Waltzes
Grainger..................Londonderry Air
Wagner.............Ride of the Valkyries

Yesterday's concert, like all of the Sunday Pops in May, offered a somewhat more serious program than is customary for the evenings during the week. Not that it began seriously. The Austrian composer, Emil Nikolaus von Reznicek, achieved a considerable success in 1894 with his comic opera, "Donna Diana" and naturally the popular overture to it is in a jolly mood. Comic, from another point of view, might be held the idea of transcribing for full modern orchestra the prelude for the E major violin partita of Bach. Nevertheless that is what Lucien Cailliet set himself solemnly to do; and the result, however bloated, is not without effectiveness.

Haydn's "Military" Symphony, though one of his mature works, is more or less neglected nowadays. Sir Donald Tovey thinks this is due to the notion that the military touches in the slow movement and the finale are held to be "bad taste." The 18th century knew these touches as Turkish music, consisting of big drum, cymbals and triangle employed for definite rhythmic color. Haydn and Mozart were fond of this device; and, if we smile now and again at what we in superior fashion regard as naive, that should not prevent us from enjoying a remarkably ingenious and delightful symphony.

Far more naive, in many ways, is the Paderewski concerto, for this is frankly a virtuoso piece in which a brilliant pianist is afforded ample scope to disport himself. There is much use of Polish material, and the concerto is attractive if not very profound. It is not as fine, say, as the Rachmaninoff concertos; but it would be foolish to deny its points. Of these Mr. Sanroma last night took full advantage. He is so skillful and confident a pianist that it was no small part of our pleasure just to observe him. A. W. W.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN

MAY 26 1940

● THREE SERIES of Summer concerts are announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The fifty-fifth season of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, opened on May 8 and are continuing nightly through June. In July a season of free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade will be given, while on July 18 the new Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will begin with Serge Koussevitzky conducting the last three of the six-weeks session of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. Among the soloists selected for the festival are Gregor Piatrigorsky, cellist; Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; Albert Spalding, violinist; Elisabeth Schumann, soprano; Viola Silva, mezzo soprano; William Hain, tenor, and Alexander Kipnis, bass. Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, who rose to fame overnight since her appearance last Summer at a picnic given at Tanglewood by Dr. Koussevitzky, will appear this year as soloist in the Mozart Concert Aria and Beethoven's "Adelaide" on August 17.

Selma Kramer, piano soloist with the Pops orchestra at Symphony Hall tonight in the Second Piano Concerto by Tschaikovsky.

4th Week of Pops; Kramer Soloist; Longy Night

The Pop concerts begin tonight the fourth week of their 55th season as Arthur Fiedler and the Symphony orchestra present music of symphonic character, featuring tonight the Second Piano Concerto of Tchaikovsky in G major, long unheard here. The distinguished soloist who is to present this concerto is Selma Kramer. Miss Kramer since her New York debut four years ago has taken her place as a pianist of importance in this country. This will be her second appearance at the Pops. Next Tuesday, Yves Chardon will conduct the program as guest, when the soloist will be E. Power Biggs, who will appear with the orchestra in Handel's Organ Concerto in D minor, Op. 7, No. 4. Miss Maxine McCurry will appear as soloist in the concert of Friday, in the first movement of Schumann's Piano Concerto. There will be no Pop concert on Sunday, June 2.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, celebrated pianist, who will appear as soloist this evening at the special Pops concert to be given at Symphony Hall, with Arthur Fiedler conducting. Sanroma will play Paderewski's piano concerto.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, MAY 20, 1940 B.

MUSIC

Sanroma Pops Soloist

Brilliant Performance of Paderewski A Minor Concerto Under Direction of Arthur Fiedler

By EDWARD DOWNES

The center of interest at the Boston Symphony Pop Concert which Arthur Fiedler conducted last night in Symphony Hall was Ignaz Paderewski's A minor Piano Concerto. The solo part was taken by Jesus Maria Sanroma, and a brilliant performance he made of it. If this music falls a little conventionally on modern ears, it could not have sounded so at the turn of the century when it was written, and in any case its melodies and fireworks are still redolent of the great man and the great artist who composed them.

That is perhaps the chief charm of this music, and it may well be that when the time comes that no one in a Symphony Hall audience can remember the playing of Paderewski, there will be no further curiosity to hear his concerto. Last night its loud passages recalled the familiar Olympian thunders, its brilliance brought back the lightning flashes of his bravoura and poetry of the Andante suggested the magical nuance and the sensitivity which were perhaps the greatest aspects of Paderewski's genius.

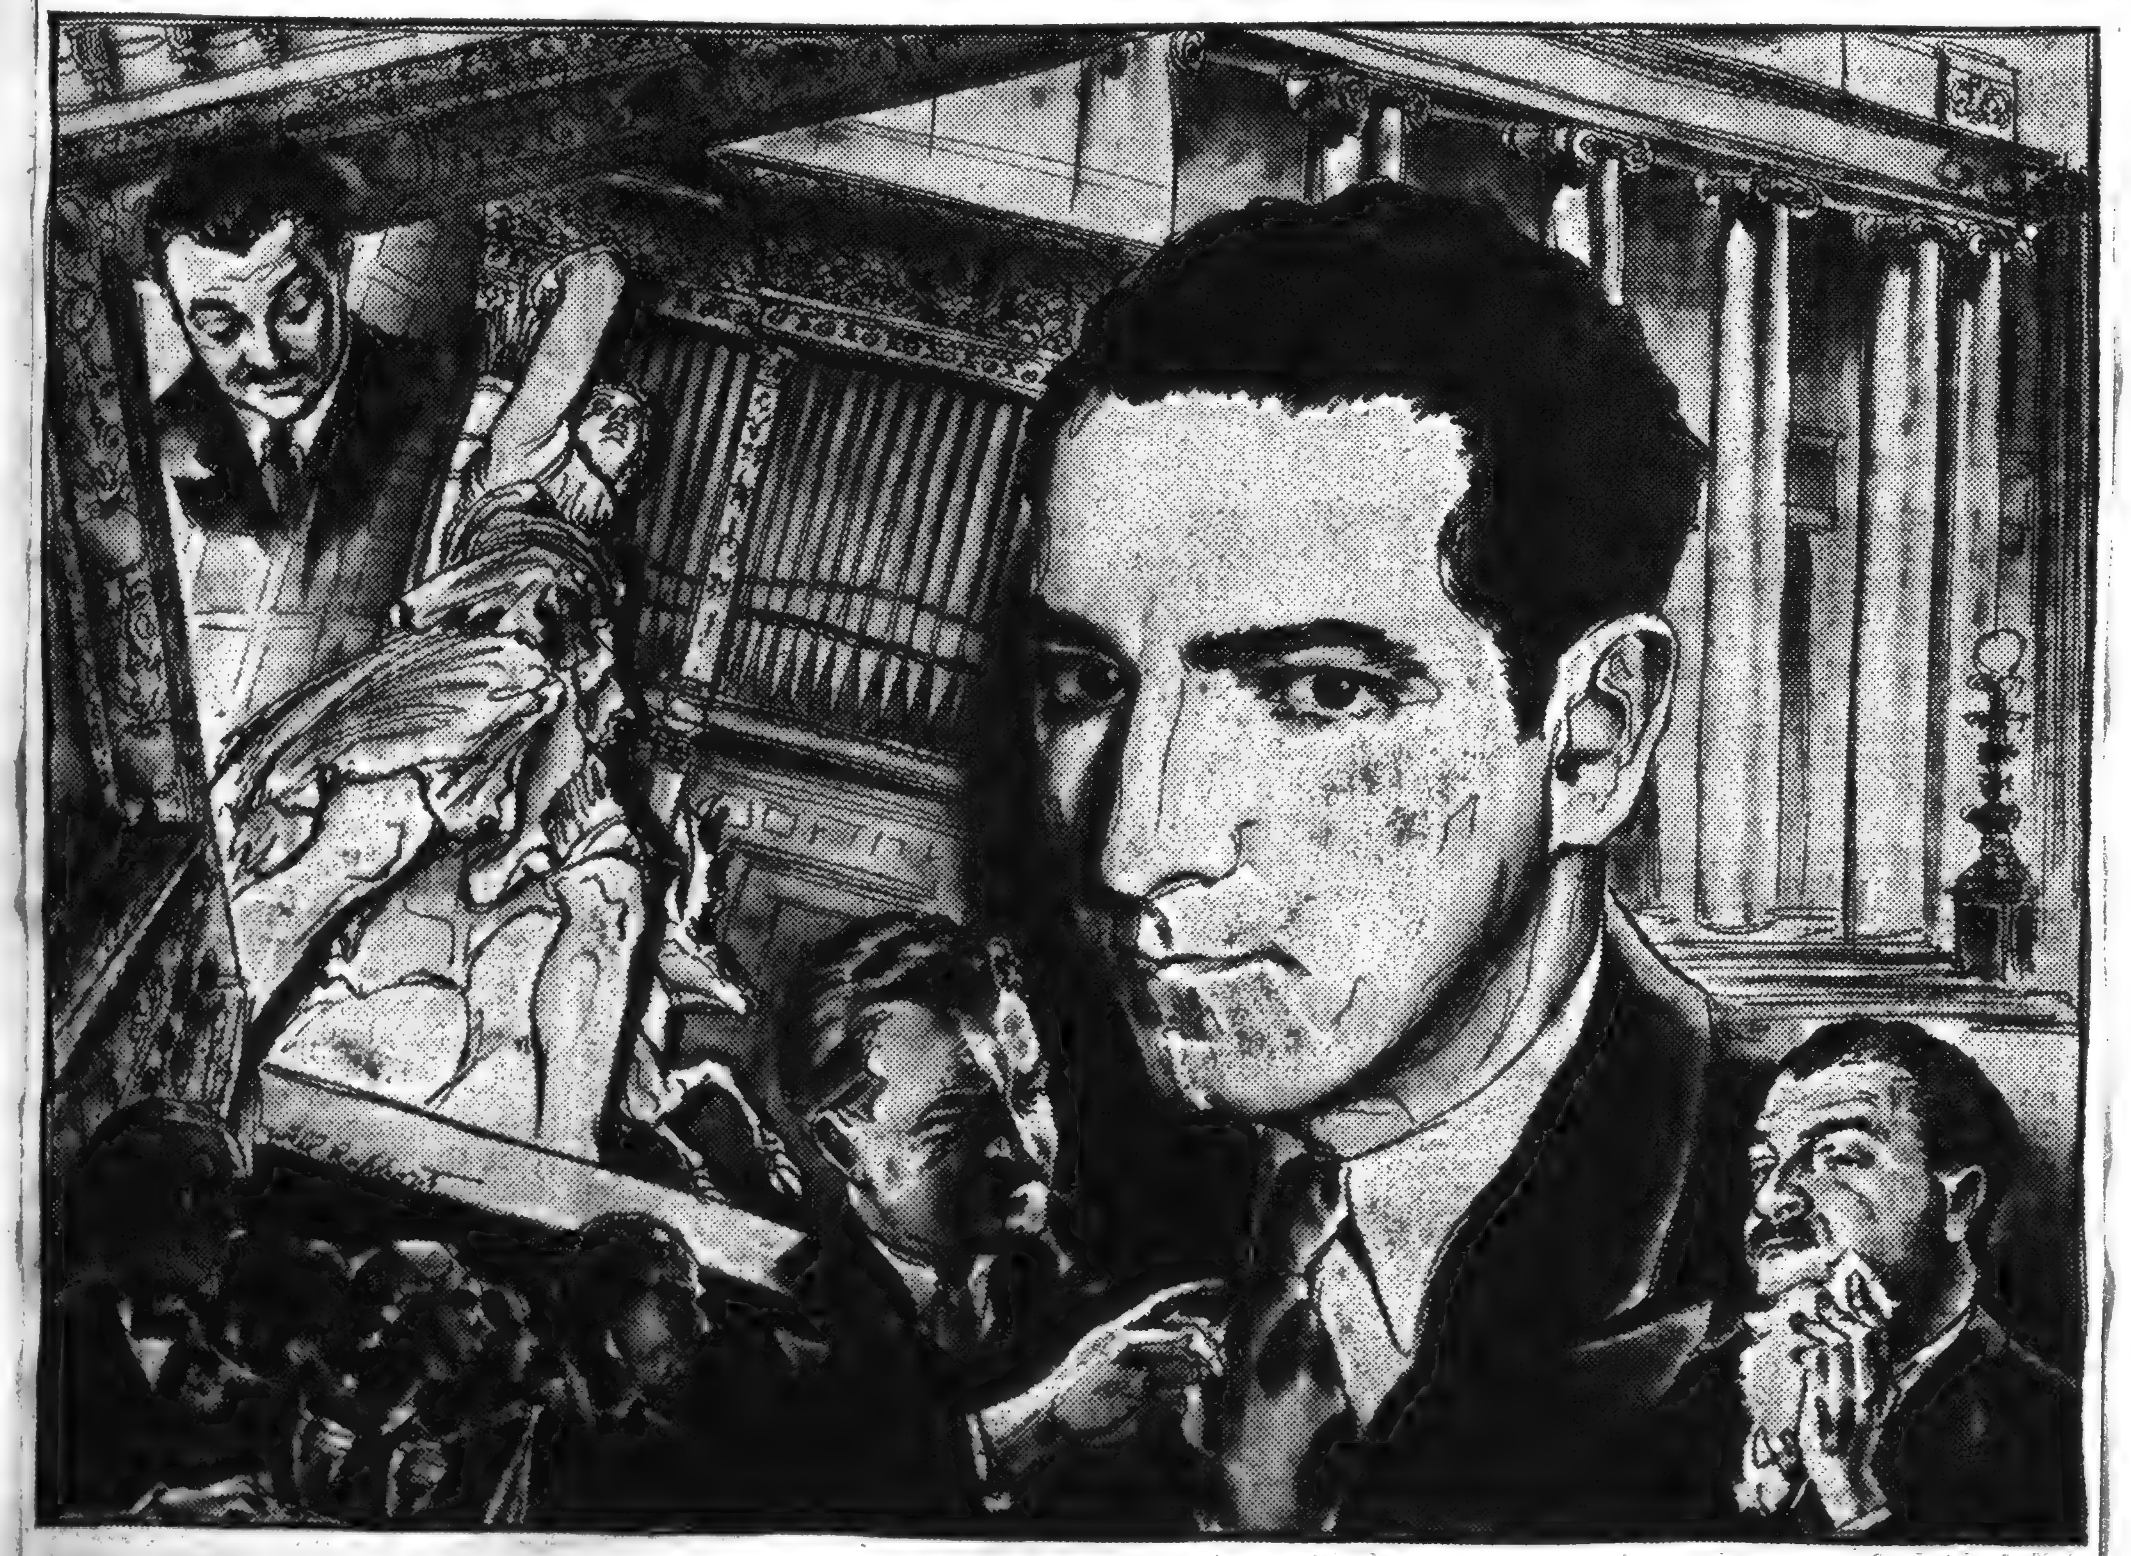
Mr. Sanroma had steely fingers for the flash and glitter of the last movement and irrepressible vitality for its dancing rhythms. He was more than a match for it. In the Romanza-andante he displayed good taste and intelligence though without many of the iridescent overtones the music evokes for a sentimental ear. A somewhat broader tempo from Mr. Fiedler's baton towards the end of the last movement would have brought out more of the grandeur and gallantry inherent in the sweeping lyricism of its peroration.

The curtain raiser last night was the Overture to Reznicek's "Donna Diana." A pleasant performance of Haydn's "Military" Symphony was followed by an orchestral perversion of the Prelude in E major from Bach's Third Partita for Violin. If pompous arrangements like this help popularize Bach, they serve a noble purpose. There can hardly be any other excuse for their existence.

The graceful genius of Johann Strauss's "Beautiful Blue Danube" Waltzes, Percy Grainger's arrangement of the Londonderry Air and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from Wagner's "Die Walkuere" completed the program. There was a large and enthusiastic audience.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MAY 18, 1940

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL PLANS---



Being several aspects of the Boston Symphony Pop Concerts ll at once; notably Jesus Maria Sanroma, piano soloist tomor- ncerto in A miner, and Arthur Fiedler, who conducts throughout the week. Also a convivial table of Pops fans and the plaster cast Diana who has decided to unbend and enjoy the fun.

Herald May 20

MUSIC

Pop Concert

The second Sunday Pop concert was given last night in Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler conducted, and the soloist was Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist. The program was as follows:

Reznicek .....Overture to "Donna Diana"
Haydn,
Symphony in G major No. 100, "Military"
Bach-Cailliet,
Prelude from the E major Partita for Violin
Paderewski,
Piano Concerto in A minor Op. 17
J. Strauss..........."Blue Danube" Waltzes
Grainger.................Londonderry Air
Wagner..............Ride of the Valkyries

Yesterday's concert, like all of the Sunday Pops in May, offered a somewhat more serious program than is customary for the evenings during the week. Not that it began seriously. The Austrian composer, Emil Nikolaus von Reznicek, achieved a considerable success in 1894 with his comic opera, "Donna Diana" and naturally the popular overture to it is in a jolly mood. Comic, from another point of view, might be held the idea of transcribing for full modern orchestra the prelude for the E major violin partita of Bach. Nevertheless that is what Lucien Cailliet set himself solemnly to do; and the result, however bloated, is not without effectiveness.

Haydn's "Military" Symphony, though one of his mature works, is more or less neglected nowadays. Sir Donald Tovey thinks this is due to the notion that the military touches in the slow movement and the finale are held to be "bad taste." The 18th century knew these touches as Turkish music, consisting of big drum, cymbals and triangle employed for definite rhythmic color. Haydn and Mozart were fond of this device; and, if we smile now and again at what we in superior fashion regard as naive, that should not prevent us from enjoying a remarkably ingenious and delightful symphony.

Far more naive, in many ways, is the Paderewski concerto, for this is frankly a virtuoso piece in which a brilliant pianist is afforded ample scope to disport himself. There is much use of Polish material, and the concerto is attractive if not very profound. It is not as fine, say, as the Rachmaninoff concertos; but it would be foolish to deny its points. Of these Mr. Sanroma last night took full advantage. He is so skillful and confident a pianist that it was no small part of our pleasure just to observe him. A. W. W.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN

MAY 26 1940

● THREE SERIES of Summer concerts are announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The fifty-fifth season of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler opened on May 8 and are continuing nightly through June. In July a season of free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade will be given, while on July 18 the new Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will begin with Serge Koussevitzky conducting the last three of the six-weeks session of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. Among the soloists selected for the festival are Gregor Piatrigorsky, cellist; Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; Albert Spalding, violinist; Elisabeth Schumann, soprano; Viola Silva, mezzo soprano; William Hain, tenor, and Alexander Kipnis, bass. Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, who rose to fame overnight since her appearance last Summer at a picnic given at Tanglewood by Dr. Koussevitzky, will appear this year as soloist in the Mozart Concert Aria and Beethoven's "Adelaide" on August 17.

Selma Kramer, piano soloist with the Pops orchestra at Symphony Hall tonight in the Second Piano Concerto by Tschaikovsky.

4th Week of Pops; Kramer Soloist; Longy Night

The Pop concerts begin tonight the fourth week of their 55th season as Arthur Fiedler and the Symphony orchestra present music of symphonic character, featuring tonight the Second Piano Concerto of Tchaikovsky in G major, long unheard here. The distinguished soloist who is to present this concerto is Selma Kramer. Miss Kramer since her New York debut four years ago has taken her place as a pianist of importance in this country. This will be her second appearance at the Pops. Next Tuesday, Yves Chardon will conduct the program as guest, when the soloist will be E. Power Biggs, who will appear with the orchestra in Handel's Organ Concerto in D minor, Op. 7, No. 4. Miss Maxine McCurry will appear as soloist in the concert of Friday, in the first movement of Schumann's Piano Concerto. There will be no Pop concert on Sunday, June 2.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, celebrated pianist, who will appear as soloist this evening at the special Pops concert to be given at Symphony Hall, with Arthur Fiedler conducting. Sanroma will play Paderewski's piano concerto.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, MAY 20, 1940 B.

MUSIC

Sanroma Pops Soloist

Brilliant Performance of Paderewski A Minor Concerto Under Direction of Arthur Fiedler

By EDWARD DOWNES

The center of interest at the Boston Symphony Pop Concert which Arthur Fiedler conducted last night in Symphony Hall was Ignaz Paderewski's A minor Piano Concerto. The solo part was taken by Jesus Maria Sanroma, and a brilliant performance he made of it. If this music falls a little conventionally on modern ears, it could not have sounded so at the turn of the century when it was written, and in any case its melodies and fireworks are still redolent of the great man and the great artist who composed them.

That is perhaps the chief charm of this music, and it may well be that when the time comes that no one in a Symphony Hall audience can remember the playing of Paderewski, there will be no further curiosity to hear his concerto. Last night its loud passages recalled the familiar Olympian thunders, its brilliance brought back the lightning flashes of his bravoura and poetry of the Andante suggested the magical nuance and the sensitivity which were perhaps the greatest aspects of Paderewski's genius.

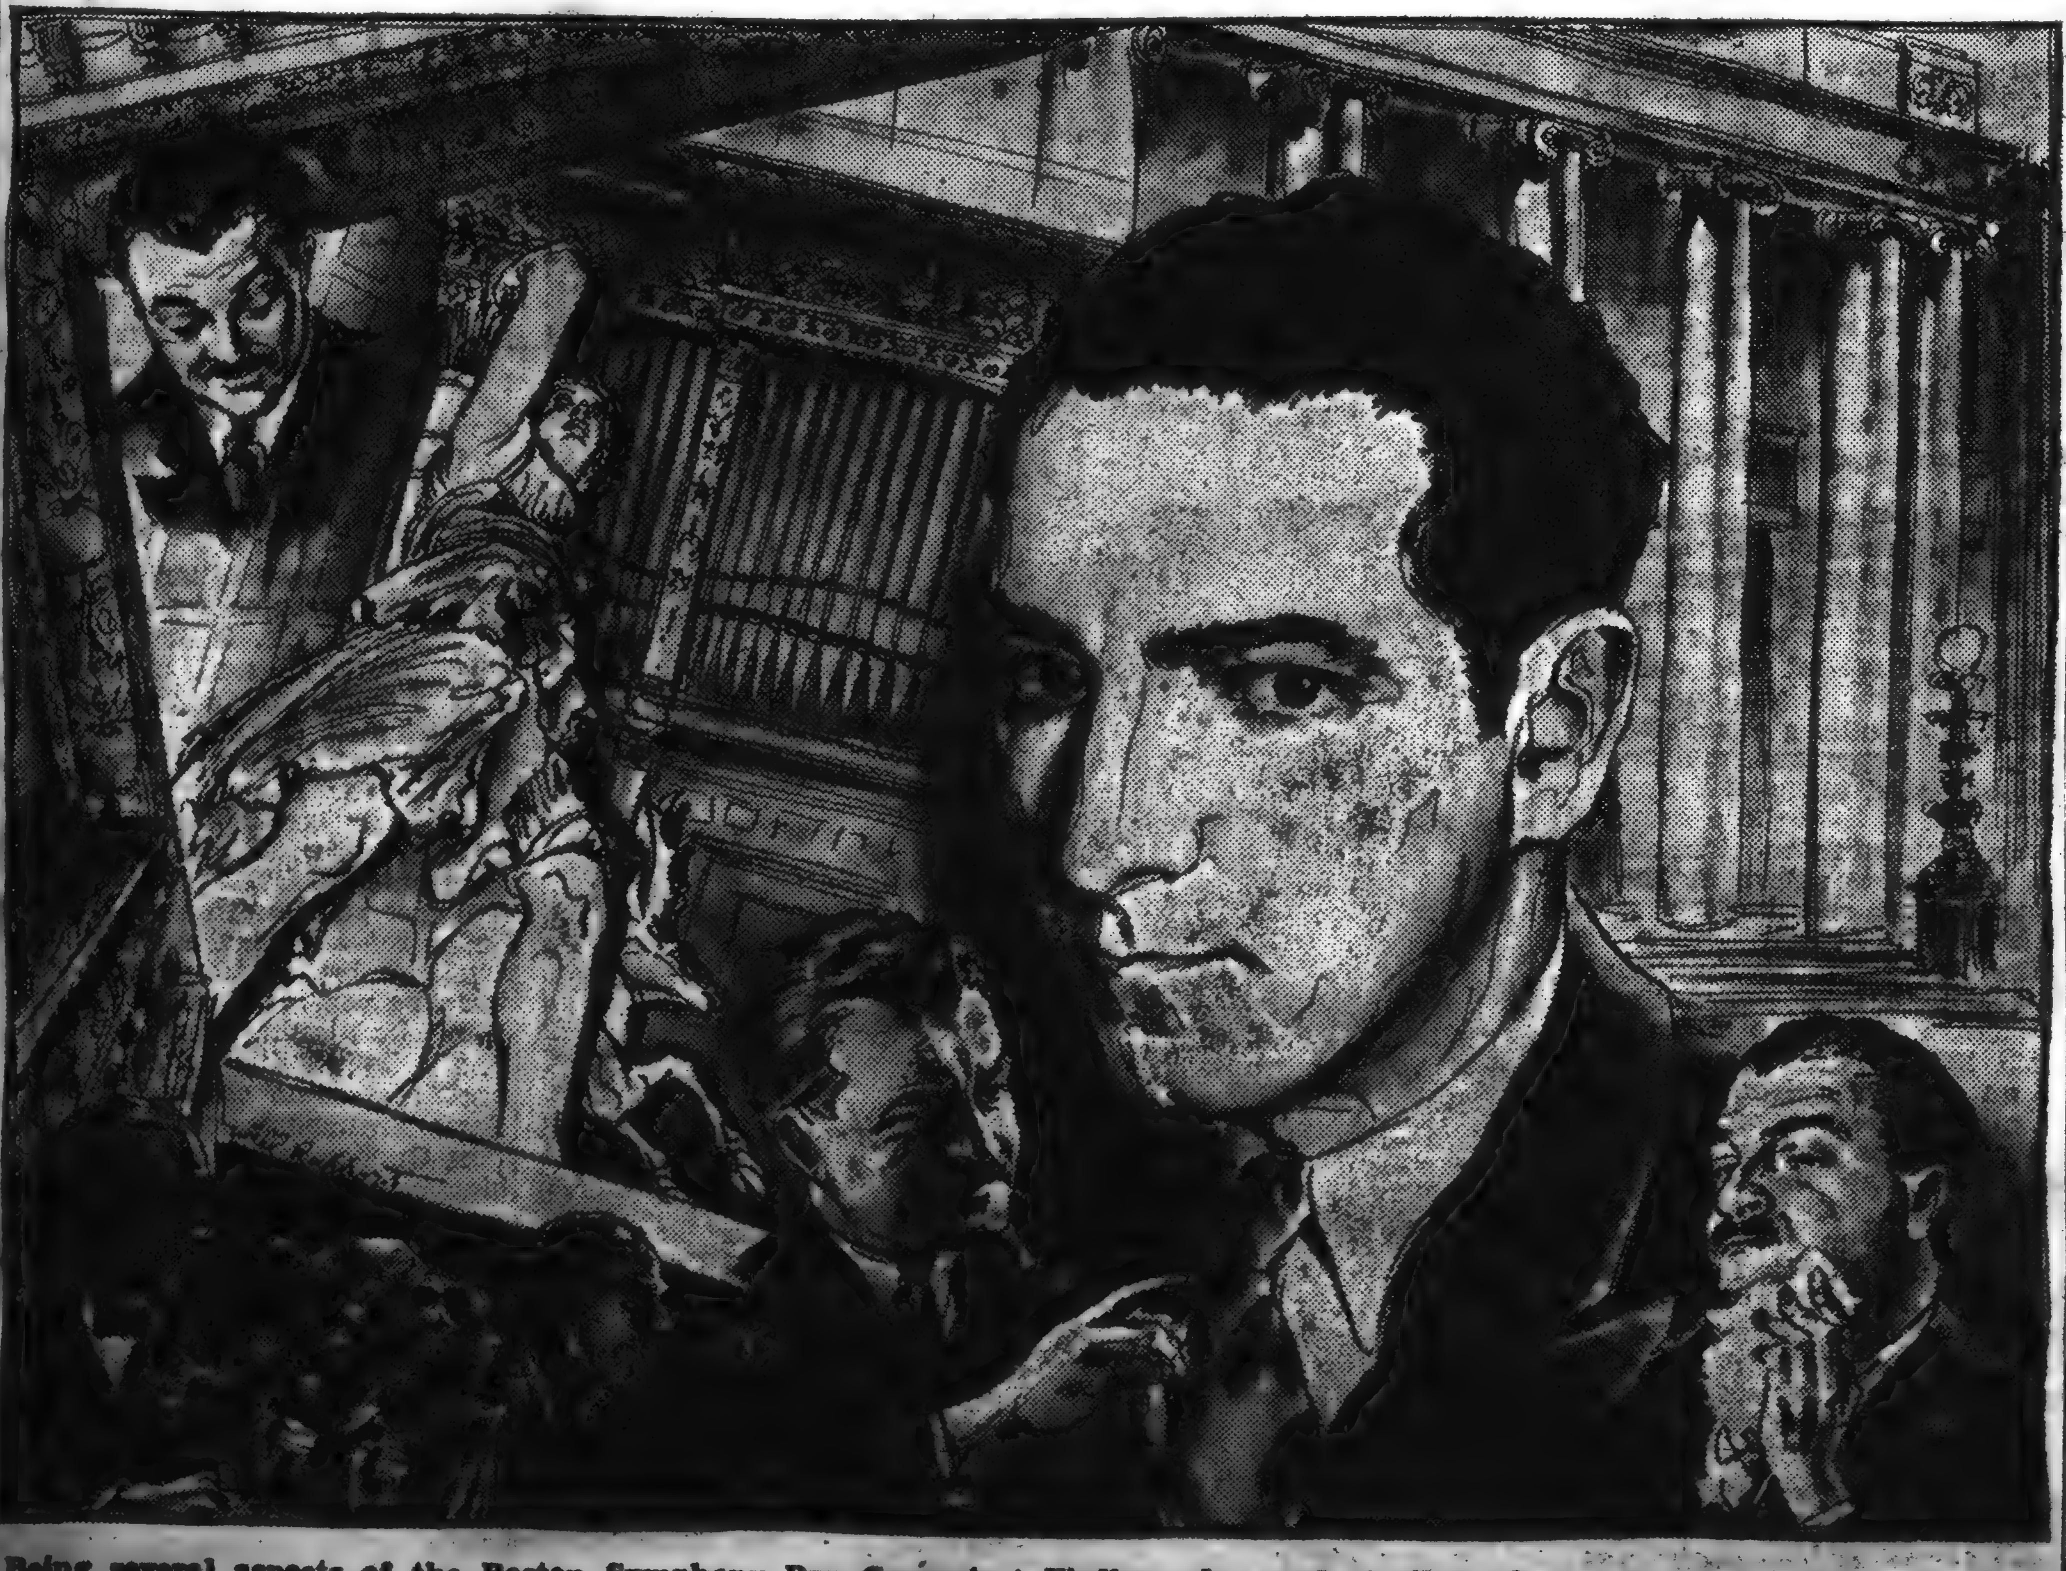
Mr. Sanroma had steely fingers for the flash and glitter of the last movement and irrepressible vitality for its dancing rhythms. He was more than a match for it. In the Romanza-andante he displayed good taste and intelligence though without many of the iridescent overtones the music evokes for a sentimental ear. A somewhat broader tempo from Mr. Fiedler's baton towards the end of the last movement would have brought out more of the grandeur and gallantry inherent in the sweeping lyricism of its peroration.

The curtain raiser last night was the Overture to Reznicek's "Donna Diana." A pleasant performance of Haydn's "Military" Symphony was followed by an orchestral perversion of the Prelude in E major from Bach's Third Partita for Violin. If pompous arrangements like this help popularize Bach, they serve a noble purpose. There can hardly be any other excuse for their existence.

The graceful genius of Johann Strauss's "Beautiful Blue Danube" Waltzes, Percy Grainger's arrangement of the Londonderry Air and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from Wagner's "Die Walkuere" completed the program. There was a large and enthusiastic audience.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MAY 18, 1940

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL PLANS---



Being several aspects of the Boston Symphony Pop Concerts ll at once; notably Jesus Maria Sanroma, piano soloist tomor- ncerto in A minor, and Arthur Fiedler, who conducts throughout the week. Also a convivial table of Pops fans and the plaster cast Diana who has decided to unbend and enjoy the fun.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS IN THE NEWS---

Artist and Teacher

Portrait of Edward Burlingame Hill Who Retires from Harvard This Spring

At the close of the present academic year, Edward Burlingame Hill, eminent composer and pedagogue, will retire from active teaching in the music department of Harvard University, thus ending a fruitful association of 32 years' standing. Edward Ballantine of the Harvard music department has very kindly responded to a request of the Transcript and written for us the following portrait of Professor Hill as a teacher, artist and as a man.

By Edward Ballantine

The retirement in June of Edward Burlingame Hill from teaching music at Harvard after a service of 32 years, brings keen regret to his colleagues and to a host of students, past and present. "Gentleman and scholar" is the characterization which springs to mind, but another word must be added: "Gentleman, scholar and composer." In a sketch of Professor Hill in "Modern Music" of November, 1938, George H. L. Smith says, "It is not possible to draw a cunning likeness of a man who has learned to be brilliantly normal." And not only brilliantly normal, but far more than normally brilliant.

His New England and Harvard inheritances are well known. His grandfather, Thomas Hill, was president of Harvard and his father, Henry B. Hill, was professor of chemistry there. E. B. Hill studied music at Harvard under J. K. Paine and graduated in 1897. By nature intellectual as well as musical, this university inheritance and environment stimulated his critical faculties and a pursuit of learning which has always been eager, but never pedantic. He exemplifies the Harvard ideal of sincerity marked by reserve and understatement, although with him urbanity and a distinguished amiability soften this reserve.

His Lectures

A student in Music 3, "The History of Music from the Time of Bach to the Present Day," once remarked: "I never heard anyone pack so much information into 50 minutes as Professor Hill." His lectures have a literary finish without bookishness and humorous or picturesque bits of musical history are enhanced by his own witty observations and contagiously ironic smile. Apt and original similes drawn from college life help to impress the facts of musical history upon the minds of those students whose primary interest is not music. Professor Hill has assumed the playful attitude that nobody in his big history class could be interested in anything but athletics and social life.

A characteristic mannerism of his in lecturing is to rest his finger tips lightly on his nose and speak into the hollow of his hand, giving his voice a muted tone like the hand-stopped notes of the natural horn, a suggestion appropriate to the utterance of a master of the orchestra. Moralizings inspired by the lives of the great composers have been extremely rare with him, but J. S. Bach has always occasioned an exhortation on the importance and reward of adding hard, steady work to inspiration. This is a sermon that Professor Hill has practised far more than he has preached, and the fruit of his practice is conspicuous in the extent and quality of his composition and academic work.

Imagination and Technique

He was the first American to make a thorough study of modern French music. This was a broadening and progressive interest for the sake of musical education at Harvard and elsewhere in this country, where German training and tradition had held sway. After college he had studied with Widor in Paris. In 1910 he began to give his course in modern French music, then in 1920 he presented this material at the Lowell Lectures, and in 1924 published a book which remains the best authority on this subject in English. Later he added a course in Russian music. Over a long period he was the principal champion at Harvard of modern music in general, his colleagues following his enterprise and leadership in this direction.

He was one of the first Americans to appreciate the extraordinary musicianship of Nadia Boulanger and through his influence a number of his students went to Paris to study composition with her. He has been in close touch with many French musicians, during their visits in the United States, his own visits to France, and correspondence. The French musicologist Henri Prunieres said of him, "C'est un homme delicieux."

Professor Hill was invited as lecturer to the Congress of History of Art in Paris in 1921, and again in Paris in 1924 he was U. S. representative of the international jury for the musical competition of the Olympic games. A few years ago the French Government decorated him with the badge of the Legion of Honor. And he has distinctly been "not without honor" in his own country as member both of the National Institute of Arts and Letters and of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

Authority on French Music

His course in orchestration has been a rare opportunity for students to profit by his expert detailed knowledge and an ever fresh imagination for colors and combinations. Here again his genius for verbal similes vivifies the instructions. He once described the effect of stringed instruments played "sul ponticello" (on the bridge) as being like the sound made by walking on packed, creaking snow.

His ear for timbres reveals itself also in an ability to make the most surprising vocal imitations of orchestral instruments, this being a treat for companions out of school hours. After a little begging he may be persuaded to perform a two-voiced canon, one part whistled and the other part simultaneously produced by a gutteral tone.

He has always been patient and generous in giving time to students in private conference and to any young composer seeking advice. Once when a colleague expressed surprise at his tolerance of an importunate and frequent visitor, he said: "I believe that a teacher should always be ready to welcome any former student who wants to see him." This courtesy and kindliness are deeply characteristic of Professor Hill. His politeness extends to a meticulous observation of social forms in dress as well as in conduct, quite in contrast to the proverbial Bohemian genius. He always wears evening dress and a derby hat to the Symphony concerts.

Winning His H

In college he won his H on the track in the quarter and half-mile. This experience and achievement have given him a greater hold over many students. By serving as judge at track meets for many years he has kept in touch with the athletic life of the undergraduates. Ever since college, running has been his chief form of exercise and today he may be seen late in the afternoon out for a run along the Charles. Handball has been a favorite sport of his and in the summer at Francestown he and his three boys have competed in all sorts of games, some of them odd and original, such as croquet on hazardous, hilly ground, and baseball golf. Ping-pong and Chinese checkers are now in the ascendant with him for indoor games.

But it has not been all play, for the self-discipline demanded of him as an athlete has been applied to his whole life. In later years he has often been compelled to follow a very strict diet over long periods in order to check a threatening malady. Once when sympathy was expressed for his being deprived of some favorite dish he said, "Oh, I am so glad to find a diet which keeps me well that I don't mind going without anything."

An apparently paradoxical trait is his humorously expressed aversion to attending concerts. To read, study, think and compose music in his supreme interest, but to sit through a prescribed program at a stated time makes him restive. He greatly prefers a symphony rehearsal to a symphony concert, and he would rather hear his own music being rehearsed than in the public performance. He says that in the actual concert he becomes painfully aware of what he might have done better.

If ever a teacher could retire with a sense of solid achievement and of wide and well-earned recognition, it should be Professor Hill.

EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

Yesterday evening a dinner was given in his honor by his associates. M. A. Wolfe Howe, for some years chairman of the Harvard Overseers Visiting Committee to the Department of Music, wrote the following inscription for the loving cup which was presented: "To Edward Burlingame Hill, exemplar and teacher of music at Harvard, 1908-1940, with the affection of his colleagues, their gratitude for his friendship and their homage to his art."

A trio of Pops Pianists. Left: Maxine McCurry of Boise, Idaho, student at Colby Junior College, soloist for the Colby Night Pop Concert, Friday, May 31. Right: Selma Kramer, who will play Tchaikovsky's Second Piano Concerto tomorrow evening. Inset: Leon Tumarkin, soloist in Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto Monday evening, June 3.

Programs for Berkshire Festival

The exact programs have been announced by Serge Koussevitzky for the Berkshire Festival. Nine concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Tanglewood on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons from Aug. 1 through Aug. 18. The programs are as follows: 1—Beethoven's Symphony No. 1, Schumann's Symphony No. 1 and Sibelius' Symphony No. 1. 2—Berloiz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Strauss' "Don Quixote," Harris' Symphony No. 3, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's Second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite. 3—Mozart's Symphony in E flat, Stravinsky's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, Brahms' Symphony No. 2. 4—Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Violin Concerto and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6. 5—Beethoven's "Cariolanus" Overture and Symphony No. 4 and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4. 6—Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5. 7—Bach's Mass in B minor. 8—Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony, arias by Mozart and Beethoven, Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite, Respighi's 'Pines of Rome." 9—Haydn's Symphony in G major No. 88, Sibelius' Symphony No. 7, Brahms' Symphony No. 1.

SYMPHONY HALL—COM 1492
TONIGHT at 8:30
POPS
ARTHUR FIEDLER—Conductor
TOMORROW 8:30
Tchaikovsky Concerto No. 2
Soloist—Selmar Kramer—Piano
TUES., MAY 28, at 8:30
LONGY SCHOOL of MUSIC
Iyves Chardon, Guest Conductor

Third Week of Pops Starts Tonight; Soloists Named

The Pop concerts enter tonight upon the third week of their 55th season. Arthur Fiedler and the Pops Orchestra of Symphony players will present music of more symphonic import at the Sunday night concert this evening in which Jesus Maria Sanroma will appear as soloist. Soloists for the program of Tuesday will be Fray and Braggiotti, the two-piano team appearing with and without the orchestra.

The Radcliffe Choral Society, under the direction of G. Wallace Woodworth, will grace the program of Thursday night, and on Saturday Leo Litwin will apear in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

The program of the week follows:

Sunday evening, May 19

Overture, "Donna Diana" ....Reznicek
Symphony in G major, No. 100, "Military" ....Haydn
Prelude in E major (from the Third Partita for Violin.......Bach-Cailliet
Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, Op. 17 Paderewski
Soloist—Jesus Maria Sanroma
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltzes ....Strauss
Londonderry Air .....Arranged by Grainger
"Ride of the Valkyries" ....Wagner

Monday evening, May 20

Marche Militaire ....Schubert
"Romeo and Juliet," overture fantasia Tchaikovsky
Cradle Song ....Brahms-Smith
Finlandia, symphonic poem ....Sibelius
"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," serenade for string orchestra.......Mozart
Mexican Rhapsody ....McBride
Songs by the M. G. H. Nurses' Glee Club, "Wine, Woman and Song," waltzes.Strauss
"Begin the Beguine" ....Porter
Sailors' dance from "The Red Poppy" Gliere

Tuesday evening, May 21

Wedding march from "Le Coq d'Or" Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" Mozart
Walther's prize song from "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" ....Wagner
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltzes ....Strauss
Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree, variations and fugue on an old English tune ....Weinberger
Spanish Rhapsody ....Braggiotti
(Request repeat performance
Coronation scene from "Boris Godunov" Moussorgsky
Fray and Braggiotti
Rhapsody in Blue ....Gershwin
Fray and Braggiotti
Back Goes to Town.......Alec Templeton
Fifth Hungarian Dance.......Brahms

WEDNESDAY EVENING, MAY 22

Procession of the Sardar from the "Caucasian Sketches".......Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," Glinka
"Traume" ....Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.......Liszt
"The Prince and the Princess," from "Scheherazade" ....Rimsky-Korsakov
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
Incidental music to "Antony and Cleopatra" ....Quincy Porter
(Conducted by the composer)
"Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs," fantasy ....Churchill
"On the Trail," from the "Grand Canyon" suite.......Grofe
In the Hall of the Troll King, from "Peer Gynt".......Grieg

THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 23

Polonaise from "Eugene Onegin", Tchaikovsky
Scherzo from the "New World" Symphony ....Dvorak
Passepied from "Le Roi s'amuse"..Delibes
Capriccio Espagnole.....Rimsky-Korsakov
Songs by the Radcliffe Choral Society
G. Wallace Woodworth, Conductor
"Estudiantina," waltzes.......Waldteufel
Mozart Matriculates.......Alec Templeton
Spanish Dance from "La Vida Breve," de Falla

FRIDAY EVENING, MAY 24.

Triumphal March from "Aida".......Verdi
Overture to "Zampa".......Herold
"Spring," for string orchestra.......Grieg
Ballet music from "Faust".......Gounod
Divertissement ....Ibert
"None but the Lonely Heart," Tchaikovsky-Cailliet
Bolero ....Ravel
"Artists' Life," waltzes.......Strauss
"When You Wish Upon a Star," from "Pinocchio" ....Harline
American Patrol.......Meacham

SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 25

"Lohengrin," introduction to Act III, Wagner
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"....Rossini
"The Swan".......Saint-Saens
Violoncello solo, Jacobus Langendoen
Pop Goes the Weazel.......Cailliet
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," waltzes ....Strauss
Rhapsody in Blue.......Gershwin
Piano solo, Leo Litwin
Cielito Lindo.......arr. by Bodge
Songs of the Old Days
"Stars and Stripes Forever," march, Sousa

11

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Selma Kramer Pops Soloist Tonight

Selma Kramer will be soloist at the Symphony Hall Pops tonight, appearing with Arthur Fiedler and the Pops Orchestra in the G major Piano Concerto by Tchaikovsky. This concerto is the second of the three which the Russian composer wrote, and is very rarely performed. Miss Kramer has previously appeared at the Pops.

Tonight's concert will mark the beginning of the fourth week of the current Pops season. Tuesday will be Longy School night, with Yves Chardon conducting the entire program as guest, and with E. Power Biggs as soloist in a Handel organ concerto.

Maxine McCurry will play the solo part of the first movement of the Schumann Piano Concerto Friday evening.

There will be no concert Sunday evening, June 2. The Pops begin at 8:30. Programs of the week:

Tonight—Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; "Capriol" Suite for Strings (based on Dance Tunes from Arbeau's Orchesographie (1588), Warlock; Prelude and Fugue on "Dixie," Weinberger; Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, in G major, Op. 44, Tchaikovsky, soloist, Selma Kramer; Austrian Peasant Dances, Schonn. Bach Goes to Town, Alec Templeton; Sailors' Dance, from "Red Poppy," Gliere.

Monday Evening, May 27—Wedding March, from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; Second Movement, "Unfinished" Symphony, in B minor, Schubert; Song Without Words, Tchaikovsky; "Madame Butterfly," Fantasia, Puccini; Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; Kammenoi Ostrow, Rubinstein; Bolero, Ravel; "1001 Nights," waltzes, Strauss; Hora Staccato (Rumanian), Dinicu-Heifetz; "Knightsbridge" (March) from London Suite, Eric Coates.

Tuesday Evening, May 28, Yves Chardon, Guest Conductor—Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz; "L'Arlesienne," Suite No. 1, Bizet; Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Wagner; Concerto for organ and orchestra in D minor, Op. 7, No. 4, Handel, soloist, E. Power Biggs; Nocturnes, Nuages, Eetes, Debussy; Ballet Suite from "Coppelia," Delibes; "Wine, Woman and Song," waltzes, Strauss.

Wednesday Evening, May 29. Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser," Wagner; Largo from the "New World" Symphony, Dvorak; "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes," arranged by Pochon; "Emperor" waltzes, Strauss; Suite from "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Ave Maria, Bach-Gounod; Overture to "Orpheus in Hades," Offenbach; "America Sings"; Prayer of Thanksgiving, old Dutch hymn, Valerius; March, "Second Connecticut," Reeves.

Thursday Evening, May 30. "Sambre et Meuse," march, Planquette; Overture to "Mignon," Thomas; Air, Hure-Langendoen, solo cello, Jacobus Langendoen; "Espana" rhapsody, Chabrier; "The Animals' Carnival," grand zoological fantasia, Saint-Saens; Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky; "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs," fantasy, Churchill; "Deep River," arranged by Jacchia; American Fantasy, Herbert.

Friday Evening, May 31—"Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III, Wagner; "Romeo and Juliet," Overture-Fantasy, Tchaikovsky; Minute Waltz, Chopin; Hungarian March, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Scherzo, Tchaikovsky; Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, First Movement, Schumann, soloist, Maxine McCurry; Colby Junior College Glee Club, Florence J. Barbiers, conductor; Fantasy on Gershwin Melodies; "Jealousy," Gypsy Tango, Gade; "Lorraine," March, Ganne.

Saturday Evening, June 1, M. I. T. Night—Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Overture to "Egmont," Beethoven; Polka, from "The Golden Age," Shostakovitch; "Sylvia," Ballet, Delibes; Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier," R. Strauss; Finale, Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Tchaikovsky; The Massachusetts Institute of Technology Glee Club, Henry Jackson Warren, conductor, Robert J. Best, '40, student leader, Northroy Brown, G, accompanist; American Symphonette No. 2, Gould; "When You Wish Upon a Star," from "Pinocchio," Harline; "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin.

POPS TO GIVE RARE WORK TONIGHT

Tchaikovsky Second Piano Concerto to Be Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THERE are two ways of paying homage to a composer when some significant anniversary rolls around. You can take that excuse for bringing to light some of his less known works or you can confine the memorial observances to pieces already familiar. The celebration in Leipzig, which marked the 125th anniversary of Wagner's birth in that city, comprised a series of representations of everything that he wrote for the stage, even to his initial fragmentary attempt at opera, "Die Hochzeit," with the choral "Love Feast of the Apostles," dramatized for good measure.

The reverse of this wholesale observance was lately seen at Symphony Hall when Dr. Koussevitzky marked the 100th anniversary of Tchaikovsky's birth by playing merely the long popular Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Symphonies, even though his original plan had been for something far more comprehensive. Until recently it was his intention to devote three entire concerts at the Berkshire Festival to Tchaikovsky's music. But now it appears that these concerts will offer only the same three symphonies, each one preceded, as in Boston, by the music of Beethoven.

* * * *

The above disquisition is by the way of preface to the announcement that a seldom heard work of Tchaikovsky, the Second Piano Concerto in G major, will be performed at this evening's Pop Concert, with the New York pianist, Selma Kramer, as soloist. Incidentally, the far better known First Concerto in B-flat minor will be played at the Pop Concert of a week from Monday with Leon Tumarkin as pianist. By this piece, which received its world premiere in Boston, under the fingers of Hans von Buelow, the G major Concerto has long been overshadowed. Only two perfromances of it at the Symphony Concerts are recorded, one in 1898, the other in 1912. This evening's, then, will be something of an event.

Nor is this the only item of interest on Mr. Fiedler's programme. Boston will hear for the first time a Suite for Strings, entitled "Capriol," by the English composer, Peter Warlock, based on dance tunes from Arbeau's Orchesographie (1588) and also Jaromir Weinberger's Prelude and Fugue on "Dixie." As might be expected from a pupil of Max Reger, Mr. Weinberger, who by the way, seems to be permanently established in this country, is a masterly writer of fugues. But Mr. Weinberger's fugues are far from being dry and academic affairs. By testimony of the one from "Schwanda" and the more recent one which concludes the variations on "Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree," they are infectiously high spirited and robed in resplendent orchestral dress. We may well expect the "Dixie" fugue to be a counterpart of its predecessors.

MUSIC

Transcript May 29

Chardon Conducts Longy Pop Concert

Yves Chardon, of the faculty of the Longy School, conducted members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in a Symphony Hall Pop Concert for the benefit of the Longy School. The evening's soloist was E. Power Biggs, who was warmly applauded in one of the inexhaustible Mr. Handel's Organ Concerti.

Mr. Chardon, whose conducting is not unfamiliar in Boston, proved a persuasive leader of the Pops Orchestra. He opened his program with the Overture to Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini," followed by movements from Bizet's "Arlesienne" Suite.

An impressive performance of the Overture to Wagner's music drama "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg" was the occasion for a warm ovation to both orchestra and its guest conductor. The printed program was complete with Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," Delibes' Ballet Suite, "Coppelia" and Johan Strauss' "Wine, Woman and Song" Waltzes. Among the orchestral encores was the "Dance of the Happy Spirits" from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice."

[illegible]vsky at Pops

Selma Kramer Is Soloist in Seldom Heard Second Piano Concerto—Weinberger Premiere

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Pops Orchestra made another contribution to the observation of the Tchaikovsky Centenary at their concert last night in Symphony Hall with a performance of the rarely heard Second Piano Concerto in G major. The soloist was Selma Kramer.

No one expects the Second Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto to measure up to the colossal First and so the impression it made was one of pleasant surprise. Considerably more conventional than the First, it lacks the bold sweep and self-assurance, but it is not unworthy of the better Tchaikovsky. Of the three movements the first is perhaps the weakest. The second is delightfully sentimental without ever descending to bathos: relatively simple with the melody first in the piano, then carried on by the string choirs and soli while the piano weaves fanciful arabesques about the thematic core. The final movement is a brilliant, dashing Allegro con fuoco.

Though Miss Kramer's piano was often overpowered with the crushing weight of orchestral tone, she gave the impression, when her instrument was audible, of sound musicianship, adequate technique and considerable musical warmth, though not of thrilling imagination.

There was also a "first performance in Boston" on last night's program: Jaromir Weinberger's "Prelude and Fugue on 'Dixie.'" In this piece one of the jauntiest, raciest tunes this continent has produced is cluttered up with cumbersome harmonies, a ponderous orchestral apparatus, caught in the toils of a fugue and all but smothered in a complicated pseudo-symphonic development of its phrases. Schwanda the Bagpipe-player who was with us last winter under the spreading chestnut tree is with us again in Dixie. If anything could kill a tune such treatment would. But "Dixie" will outlive its arrangements.

The printed program also included works by Rossini, Warlock, Schoenherr, Alec Templeton and Gliere, and there were encores. The Daughters of Zion, the Student Association of Newton Hospital and the Massachusetts School of Art had groups of tables on the floor.

E. D.

MAY 27,

NOVELTY FOR POPS CONCERT

Tchaikovsky Concerto Is Well Received

Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An important revival and a less important novelty marked last evening's Pop Concert, the final Sunday concert of the season. What appears to have been the third Boston performance, with orchestra, of Tchaikovsky's Second Piano Concerto filled the second division of Mr. Fiedler's programme and its brilliant and sympathetic performance by Selma Kramer made one wonder at the piece's long neglect at the hands of pianists.

Less striking in thematic material than the B-flat minor Concerto, this one in G major is, on the whole, more effectively idiomatic. Completely missing from this genial, charming and often exhilarating work are the Tchaikovskian lushness, morbidity, frenzies and hysteria. It has, therefore, far more in common with the Suite for Orchestra in the same key than it has with the Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Symphonies. Ours is a debt both to Miss Kramer and to Mr. Fiedler for so successfully recalling to us a work that unaccountably had not been heard in Symphony Hall since 1912.

As was suggested above, the interest in this Concerto and the pleasant surprise it occasioned rather eclipsed the immediately preceding performance of Jaromir Weinberger's Prelude and Fugue on "Dixie," which was receiving its Boston premiere. Of course, Mr. Weinberger has accomplished his appointed task with skill. And, after his Fugue, which finishes off the variations on "Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree," it was no shock to find reminiscences of "Schwanda" in that of last evening.

Mr. Weinberger seems to be a man of one melody, or, at least, of one fugue. But this is not to say that these contrapuntal exercises on "Dixie" failed to prove stimulating and even mildly exciting and last evening's audience was much taken with them. More rewarding from a purely musical point of view, however, was the Suite for Strings, entitled "Capriol," by Peter Warlock, based on 16th century dance tunes. Taken as a whole, the concert was one that fitly supplemented the regular Symphony season.

PALMER, MASS
JOURNAL
5/29/40

Outstanding Concert At Brimfield

Brimfield—A few weeks after the hurricane in 1938, Mr. and Mrs. Wellington Smith of New York City spent the night in Brimfield. During the evening the conversation naturally turned to the devastation caused by the storm.

They were told of the damage done to the Brimfield church, and were shown pictures taken before and after the disaster. Mr. and Mrs. James Smith made up their minds to do their part in assisting in the restoration. The result will be the concert to be presented in the Brimfield church, on Saturday evening at eight o'clock.

The artists are as follows:

Mr. Wellington Smith of whom the papers say, (quote) "One of America's outstanding concert baritones with a record of successful appearances with leading organizations of the country, such as Boston, Cleveland, Detroit and New York Symphony Orchestra and the New York Philamonic Orchestra."

Mr. Smith is also a teacher of voice in New York, Boston and Providence and conducts a Summer Camp in Maine.

Miss Louise Bernhardt of New York, a former contralo soloist with the Chicago Civic Opera Company. Miss Bernhardt is the winner of the National Federation of Music and the Naumbourg Foundation Prize in New York.

Mr. John Barrozzi, violin soloist with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and has appeared as guest soloist in nearly all the great orchestras in the country. Mr. Barrozzi was born in Roumania. He started his career early in life and after appearing as violin soloist before many of the crowned heads of Europe, he was made Court Violinist by his "Queen."

The concert committee regrets that they have not as yet received press notices of the accompanist, Mrs. Wellington Smith, but she is a most charming person, and certainly must be an outstanding accompanist.

The committee also regrets the fact that the program has not as yet been handed them, but it will be published as soon as possible.

Information will be gladly given to any one writing the "Concert Committee, Brimfield, Mass.

It is needless to say that a concert of this type is very rarely heard outside of our large cities, and it one that music lovers hereabout plan to attend.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

MAY 29 1940

Concert in Boston To Mark Colby Jr. College Night

Miss M. Maxine McCurry, left, of Boise, Ida., talented pianist and member of the senior class at Colby Junior college, and her instructor, Miss Gladys Gleason, look over the score of the Schumann Concerto in A Minor for piano and orchestra which Miss McCurry will play with the Boston Symphony Pops orchestra at Colby Night in Boston, on Friday, May 31.

Special to The Union.

NEW LONDON, May 28.—A college holiday will be declared at Colby Junior college on Friday, May 31, when about three-fourths of the 375 college community of students and faculty will journey to Boston for Colby Junior College Night at Pops in Symphony hall.

Taking the spotlight for the students will be Miss M. Maxine McCurry of Boise, Idaho, talented pianist and a senior at Colby, who will be the soloist. She will play with the Pops orchestra under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, the Allegro movement of the Schumann Concerto in A Minor for piano and orchestra.

Only 18 years old, Miss McCurry came to Colby from Boise on a two year music scholarship in September, 1938. While at Colby she has been studying with Miss Gladys Gleason of Jerome, Id., and Boston, instructor of pianoforte. It was during the summer of 1938 as a member of the music department at the summer session of the University of Idaho that Miss Gleason heard Miss McCurry and made it possible for her to study at Colby.

Miss McCurry, besides playing in the Colby orchestra, is president of the Music club in which a third of the college holds membership. She hopes to continue her music studies in New York following her graduation from Colby in June.

The Glee club of 65 voices under the direction of Miss Florence Barbiers, will sing a group of college songs and old English folk songs, during the intermission. At this time a new college song will be sung for the first time, "Life Goes to Colby," with words by Miss Emily Squires of the English department and music by Miss Hope Howell of the music faculty.

The popularity of the Pops concert at Colby is evidenced by the first day sale of tickets to students on March 15 when 507 tickets were sold in the space of two hours.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

FLINT, MICH
NEWS ADVERTISER
5/31/40

Orchestra Manager Writes 2 Nocturnes

Philadelphia, May 30—INS—Two nocturnes for orchestra entitled "San Juan Capistrano" have been presented to the musical world by Harl McDonald, 40-year-old manager of the Philadelphia orchestra.

The work, completed late in 1938, was given its first performance by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION & REPUBLICAN

JUN 2 - 1940

OLD CALIFORNIA TOWN INSPIRES MUSICAL WORK

Philadelphia, June 1—(INS)—Two nocturnes for orchestra, entitled "San Juan Capistrano," have been presented to the musical world by Harl McDonald, 40-year-old manager of the Philadelphia orchestra.

The work, completed late in 1938, was given its first performance by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra. Geographical suggestion for the music came from the quasi-medieval town of Capistrano in southern California, scene of the mysterious "flight of the swallows" each year.

---

help ourselves, for that is one thing no one can, or should, do for us, and when a nervous sufferer actually decides that this is true, he gathers his energies together instead of dissipating them in worry, resentment and fear and goes ahead to some sort of decision and improvement in health. But action is imperative, for no amount of wishing or theorizing will help. Do try to make a change, either in your environment or in your attitude toward it. Not in big ways, but in the little things within your power to do and which will give you a sense of true progress.

Garden Ways.

columns.

A goodly supply of sweet-smelling toiletries for, if you'll notice, it's the smoothest girl who always seems surrounded by a charming and captivating fragrance. Men like nice scents, too. You'll always be sure of rating high on this score if you take with you one of the new colognes recently put out, colognes whose fragrances match exactly four extremely popular perfumes, one of which is the college girl's delight. These colognes are dramatic and distinctively gracious. They come in cool, streamlined bottles you'll be proud to place on your dresser. Each comes with its own

---

CAMBRIDGE, MASS
TRIBUNE
5/31/40

Nadia Boulanger On Longy Faculty

After a year's absence in France, Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French organist, conductor, lecturer and teacher, will return to the United States in September to become a full-time member of the faculty of the Longy School of Music for a period of three years. Last year she gave a series of lectures at Radcliffe and conducted the Lili Boulanger Memorial Fund Concert at Symphony Hall, Boston, with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Harvard and Radcliffe Choral Societies.

Mlle. Boulanger's teaching will be restricted to advanced students from all over the country, many of whom have been prevented from studying abroad this year owing to war conditions. A seminar in composition and courses in counterpoint, fugue and advanced harmony will be given for men and women of exceptional ability.

Each course, limited to twelve students, will consist of class lessons once a week and one individual lesson in addition to a discussion period weekly under the direction of Mlle. Boulanger. An opportunity to enroll in a lecture course on the Bach aCntatas will be given mature but less advanced students, while a series of lectures on the Beethoven Quartets will be available to the public for a nominal fee. Mlle. Boulanger will be at the Longy School daily, Mondays through Fridays, during the school year.

Widely known throughout Europe and America, Mlle. Boulanger is the only woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She has served on the advisory committee of the Longy School, which is the only American music school affiliated with the Ecole Normale de Paris, and the only music school in this country at which she has been teaching. As head of the composition department of te Ecole Normale, Mlle. Boulanger has conducted classes with Igor Strawinsky and has taught at the Fontainebleau School of Music since 1921. Among her many distinguished pupils are Igor Markevitch and Jean Francaix, Walser Piston, Aaron Copland, Roy Harris, Theodore Chanler and Herbert Elwell.

In 1937, shortly after receiving the Cross of the Legion d'Honneur, Mlle. Boulanger was sent to the United States by the French Government to observe educational methods in American schools and David L. Darling, of Sparks St., Cambridge, with mother, Mrs. D. H. Darling, is a guest at the New Weston in New York City.

It is the very essence of Love, of nobleness, of greatness, to be willing to suffer for the good of others.—Spencer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
EVENING DISPATCH

MAY 31 1940

Joyce Barthelson, the accompanist for the Treble Clef Chorus of the Contemporary Club, who has just completed her first symphony and is anxious to hear it performed, also will appear in the role of conductor during the Summer months. On June 15, she will conduct a program at Forest Park in Brooklyn; on the 17th she will appear at Prospect Park, and on the 19th her baton will be raised at a concert at the World's Fair.

Many White Plains musicians will take their vacations during the first three weeks of August in order to attend the Berkshire Symphonic Festival which will be held at Tanglewood, Mass., Aug 1 to 18. One of the more important events will be a performance of Bach's B Minor Mass by the Berkshire Festival Chorus, which, including several Westchester members, will make its first official appearance on Aug. 15. Soloists will include Elisabeth Schumann, Viola Silva, William Hain, and Alexander Kipnis. The chorus will also be composed of students at the music center being established by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood this Summer.

Three programs devoted to the works of Tschaikowsky will also be included in the festival series, to celebrate the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct at the opening event. Soloists who will appear with the orchestra are Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist; Jean Lefranc, viola; Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; Albert Spalding, violinist; and Dorothy Maynor, soprano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LA CROSSE, WIS.
TRIBUNE

MAY 30 1940

Q. Please give the date of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Stockbridge, Mass. J. E.

A. The Festival will open on August 1 and will close August 18. The concerts will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sergei Koussevitzky conducting. Among the distinguished artists who will appear are Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, Albert Spalding, violinist, and Dorothy Maynor, the talented Negro soprano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLESTON, S. C.
POST

THIS CLIPPING FROM SUPERIOR, WIS.
TELEGRAM

THIS CLIPPING FROM IDAHO FALLS, IDAHO
IDAHO POST

THIS CLIPPING FROM WATERVILLE, ME.
SENTINEL

THIS CLIPPING FROM EAU CLAIRE, WIS.
TELEGRAM

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BILLINGS, MONT.
MORNING GAZETTE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BILLINGS, MONT.
MORNING GAZETTE

THIS CLIPPING FROM WICHITA FALLS, TEXAS
RECORD NEWS

79

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUN 1 - 1940

THE WORLD OF BOOKS

Criticism and Creation

By EDWARD N. JENCKES

Irving Kolodin states and then tactfully evades a persistent question in the foreword to his book, "The Critical Composer," a selection of the writings of Berlioz, Wagner, Schumann and others on music and the works of other composers. Has the composer, or any creative artist, an advantage over the critic who lacks ability to create original works in the medium discussed?

Mr Kolodin says: "The conviction that accomplishments in one field automatically confer upon its possessor sagacity and wit in all others is a belief generally respected in the modern world, especially in America. Merchants give benedictions to cultural projects, admirals comment learnedly on politics, movie actors are heeded when they give opinions on foreign affairs." It is not quite so bad as that; but it would be surprising and deplorable if merchants, admirals and even actors did not speak sometimes as citizens of their own country or of the world. However, the question is not as to what persons of creative talent say when they talk about general affairs but as to what they say when they talk about their specialty.

A simple—and correct—answer is that they talk significantly when they have a broad and sensitive understanding, an analytical power and a gift of expression; that, in short, they may have the critical or expository faculty and they may not. This dictum does not dispose of the issue, however. And Mr Kolodin does not dispose of it, though he states an indisputable truth, when he says: "A man who wrote as much music as Wagner did had an understanding of the procedures and the effort by which a score is created which is not accessible to one whose approach to the art was essentially external. I am not contending that it is therefore a better, or more valid, attitude —merely that it is an individual one, and worthy of attention."

Writings of Composers

It happens that the writings here assembled—by Berlioz, Wagner, Schumann, Tchaikovsky, Liszt, Hugo Wolf, Gounod and two or three other composers—are valuable chapters of musical interpretation. Those who are familiar with the Boston Symphony program books of Philip Hale are aware of the frequency with which he quoted Berlioz—"the great Berlioz" Hale sometimes called him, meaning that he was "great" as a writer about other musicians, and especially about Beethoven. A few of Mr Kolodin's incidental comments in the foreword may be open to dispute, but the essays that he has assembled in convenient form will assist any amateur's musical education.

Criticism of literature and art by novelists, poets, painters, sculptors and architects often reveals the limitations of what may be called the creative mind (using "creative" in the sense of "producing original works of art"; there are obviously other kinds of creation, and a creative element may appear in criticism). The question was discussed some months ago by Clive Bell with regard to artists criticism of their contemporaries. Writing in the New Statesman and Nation (London), Mr Bell said: "Painters' criticism of their contemporaries is always untrustworthy. Inevitably so; a sincere and ardent painter is so thoroughly obsessed by his peculiar vision, so deeply convinced of the rightness of his own way of seeing, feeling and expressing, that only by an effort can he avoid regarding a contemporary who sees and feels otherwise as a traitor."

There is, perhaps, some overemphasis here for rhetorical effect; but the underlying truth is apparent. It is applicable to many classes of original workers in literature and the arts. When the creative and critical faculties exist together in the same mind, they may tend to strengthen each other and may alike reveal intuitive insight. Yet the separation of functions is apparent to the reader. Virginia Woolf, for instance, writes novels of merit and vitality in the stream-of-consciousness mode (among the best examples of the type), but when she writes criticism she detaches herself from contemporary fashions and expresses judgments calmly considered in the light of broad knowledge of the enduring art of fiction. T. S. Eliot retains a more personal attitude in his criticism, but his critical writings and his poems spring from different "layers" of mind.

Artists' Self-Absorption

The limitations of artists' criticism are believed to proceed from the egoistic self-absorption of the creative worker. In an essay, "The Prisoners of Self," included in the book "Frames of Mind," published in 1899, A. B. Walkley, English dramatic critic, offered an explanation similar to that suggested by Mr Bell in the article quoted. "The creative mind," Mr Walkley said, "shrinks instinctively from the thought of creations not its own. It seems to be on that condition that it is a creative mind. . . . Disbelief in others, tending to a positive dislike of them, seems to be complementary to that self-confidence, not to say self-admiration, without which you cannot have triumphant self-expression."

"You know who the critics are?—the men who have failed in literature and art." This sneering remark, a paraphrase of something written by Coleridge, is from a novel of Disraeli's. It is very familiar, and apparently denotes a train of thought by which authors have sometimes consoled themselves when their works have been treated unfavorably by critics. One might have supposed that it was an outmoded notion, but it reappeared only a few weeks ago in some remarks of Phyllis Bottome's printed in the Boston Transcript. Critics are more often today accused of other faults—of praising too freely or of judging literature according to alien standards derived from sociology or the Marxist gospel. But evidently Miss Bottome believes that her novels have been adversely reviewed by writers who themselves have tried—and failed—to write popular novels.

If the defects of artists' opinions have been correctly explained, the critic has a defense against the sneers of an offended author. He can reply: "It is we who, whatever our failings, have to write criticism, because you are temperamentally disqualified for the task."

Summer Festival Time

AMERICA'S summer music season is on. Though by the calendar it is still late Spring, there is no mistaking the summer feeling of the outdoor and semi-outdoor events now in progress, with many others of a kindred nature soon to follow. The first fortnight of June brought the openings of the Municipal Opera season in St. Louis, Mo., and the Essex County Stadium Concerts at Newark, N. J., along with the Bach Festival at Berea, Ohio, and the Montreal Festival in Canada's largest city. To the third week of the month belong the openings of the Robin Hood Dell Concerts at Philadelphia, June 18, the Lewisohn Stadium concerts in New York, June 20, and the Zoo Opera in Cincinnati, June 20. Before the month closes Chicago will have both the Grant Park concerts (already begun) and those at Ravinia, beginning June 27. Baltimore, too will swing into line with its Stadium concerts, June 28. Another June opening will be that of the Lost Colony Festival at Manten, N. C., June 29.

With most of the above continuing in July, that month will have various additions to make to the calendar of outdoor musical events. In California, the Hollywood Bowl concerts will begin on July 9. Carmel's Bach Festival is set for July 17-23. In New York, the annual Chautauqua Festival, including opera, symphony and choral events will open on July 14. Another festival is that scheduled for Salt Lake City, Utah, July 20-24. August 1-18 are the dates of the annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass. The summer calendar of important events thus leads on, almost to the Worcester Festival in the early Autumn.

Though a few European festivals are still scheduled, they can have no interest for Americans, who could not normally obtain visas to attend and who would be foolhardy to attempt the trip through the war zones, even if this were possible —and if, as may be seriously questioned, the events ever take place. Nothing indicates America's growing self-sufficiency in music better than the array of festivals in this country. These not only supply the musical needs of this country through the warm weather months but do so without suffering in any way from what is fast becoming a situation of complete severance from former sources of supply of musical talent in Europe. The American festival is international in the same sense that American life is. But it is made in America for Americans—including those Americans who formerly went abroad each summer for their music but who are now learning more and more with every year the wealth of good things in store for them when they stay at home!

MUSICAL AMERICA for June, 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

JUN 5 - 1940

Pop Concerts Begin Monday

WPA Symphony to Give Weekly Concerts in Pleasure Beach Ballroom.

The first pop concert of the weekly summer series by the Bridgeport WPA Symphony orchestra will be given Monday at 8:30 p. m. in the Pleasure Beach ballroom, which has been newly decorated inside in blue and silver. Outside, an extra box office has been built at the entrance. The concerts will be patterned after the pop concerts of the Boston Symphony.

According to arrangements made by the Connecticut Music project and Perry W. Rodman, director of Pleasure beach, these summer 'pops' are to be given each Monday night throughout the summer months. They will be held regardless of weather conditions, and are to start at 8:30 o'clock.

Of particular interest to lovers of music is the announcement that the admission fee will be only 25 cents, which will entitle the ticket-holder to his choice of any seat in the ballroom.

Last year, it will be remembered, the orchestra played to thousands of symphony-lovers, and so great was the attendance that, despite the huge ballroom capacity of 3500, it was necessary to curtail the sale of tickets on several occasions.

With the ballroom cooled by Long Island Sound breezes, and with the inauguration of pop concerts at the low admission fee, it is believed that audiences will be even larger than at last summer's series.

Arrangements are also being completed for the appearance of nationally-known and local soloists to appear on these programs with the symphony orchestra. No advance sale of tickets will be made for the concerts, and patrons are urged to be present early in order to be assured of good seats. The box-office will be opened at 7:30 each Monday night in order to accommodate early arrivals who wish to avail themselves of the choice selections of these seats.

Symphony Hall—Com. 1492
TONIGHT AT 8.30
POPS
ARTHUR FIEDLER—Conductor
SUNDAY, JUNE 9
REQUEST PROGRAM
All Tickets On Sale 2 Wks. in Advance
All Nights Open to the Public

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
JUN 4 - 1940

U. R. to Confer Honorary Degrees Upon Six

Finnish Minister to U. S. Included in Group Chosen

Hjalmar J. Procope, Finnish minister to the United States, will be one of six persons to receive honorary degrees at the university of Rochester's 90th commencement, June 17, in Eastman Theater.

HJALMAR J. PROCOPE

The handsome, 51-year-old Finnish diplomat, whose name became familiar to most Americans during the Russo-Finnish war, will get a doctor of laws degree.

Others to be honored:

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has led his musicians in concert here on several occasions. He will receive a doctor of music degree.

Stephen Vincent Benet, poet and 1928 Pulitzer prize winner. The degree of doctor of letters will be conferred upon him.

Mrs. Mary Breckenridge, director of the Frontier Nursing Service, Leslie County, Ky. Hers will be a doctor of laws degree.

Dr. Herbert Spencer Gassner, director of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research. He will be given the degree of doctor of science.

Gisela M. A. Richter, English-born curator of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and author of numerous books on the arts. She will get a doctor of fine arts degree.

Two New Scholarships Established at U. of R.

Establishment of two new University of Rochester scholarships was announced yesterday by Dr. Allan V. Heely, headmaster of the Lawrenceville School, Lawrenceville, N. J.

They are made possible through the generosity of Martin F. Tiernan, Essex Fells, N. J., president of Wallace & Tiernan Co., Newark, N. J., a member of the class of 1906, trustee of the University of Rochester and former president of the Lawrenceville School Fathers' Association.

Through arrangement with the University of Rochester, the scholarships have been created with a value up to $500, the annual stipend, up to the maximum, to depend on financial needs of the applicant. They will be continued through the sophomore and junior years, providing the holder maintains the standard required, while in the senior year the scholarship award may be in the form of a loan rather than a gift.

Preference will be given applicants from the Lawrenceville School, but if applicants from that school fail to meet requirements set, or if there is no application in any one year, the scholarships will be made available to candidates from other institutions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

JUN 6 - 1940

Outing at Boston for High School Musicians

Clarence W. Arey, director of the High School music groups, will accompany 87 members of the orchestra and band to Boston Saturday, for a day's outing which includes luncheon and dinner, attendance at a theater or ball game in the afternoon and in the evening the Pop concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Arey has the first three rows booked for the concert, so the visitors will have a good view of Robert Gunderson, member of the violin section of the orchestra, who was the first concert master of the High School orchestra.

Wednesday of next week, the High School band will play at the commencement exercises of Tabor Academy, Marion. The following Saturday, the Academy will entertain the band and the program includes a sailing trip in the Tabor Boy, the academy ship. A special rehearsal is called for Monday to prepare for the Marion engagement.

UNITED STATES
BAPTIST
CHICAGO, ILL
JUNE, 1940

Convention Precenter

Dr. James R. Houghton, Precenter of the Northern Baptist Convention, is professor in Boston University School of Theology. Dr. Houghton has appeared with such organizations as the New York Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, the Syracuse University Chorus, the Back Choir of Baldwin-Wallace College of Berea, Ohio, and others of similar caliber. He is director of choral activities for Boston University, conducts the Boston University Glee Club, the Boston University Seminary Singers, famous group of "singing preachers," and the Amphion Club of Melrose, Mass.

Tumarkin Soloist At Pop Concert

Piano · June 4

Leon Tumarkin of the faculty of the Malkin Conservatory of Music appeared as soloist at last night's Pop Concert in Tchaikovsky's popular First Piano Concerto in B flat minor. Strong, fleet fingers and a sense of dramatic climax made Mr. Tumarkin's interpretation one which had no trouble in dominating the orchestra in passages where it was necessary to do so. And there was drive and temperament enough to win him many recalls at the end from an enthusiastic audience.

Whether there was also the sensitivity and fantasy which Tchaikovsky demands is a question hard to answer, not only because of the many conversations which are the inevitable though often pleasant accompaniment of a Pop Concert, but also because the orchestra and soloist did not always seem to be of one mind about tempi or phrasing.

An unusually boisterous Ride of the Valkyries in the first third of the program was compensated for by the nostalgic, suaver strains of the Johann Strauss Waltzes, "Wine, Woman and Song" in the third.

The Alazounov arrangeemnt of Chopin's Polonaise Militaire, the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," a "Suite Classique" for strings by Frederic Kempf, of the Malkin Conservatory faculty, the Rachmaninoff Prelude in C sharp minor arranged for orchestra, and a Torch Dance from "Henry VIII" completed the printed list to which encores were added.

The Malkin Conservatory, the Palestine Chapter of Eastern Star, the Marot College Club of Boston and the Uxbridge High School had groups of tables.

E. D.

79

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUN 1 - 1940

THE WORLD OF BOOKS

Criticism and Creation

By EDWARD N. JENCKES

Irving Kolodin states and then tactfully evades a persistent question in the foreword to his book, "The Critical Composer," a selection of the writings of Berlioz, Wagner, Schumann and others on music and the works of other composers. Has the composer, or any creative artist, an advantage over the critic who lacks ability to create original works in the medium discussed?

Mr Kolodin says: "The conviction that accomplishments in one field automatically confer upon its possessor sagacity and wit in all others is a belief generally respected in the modern world, especially in America. Merchants give benedictions to cultural projects, admirals comment learnedly on politics, movie actors are heeded when they give opinions on foreign affairs." It is not quite so bad as that; but it would be surprising and deplorable if merchants, admirals and even actors did not speak sometimes as citizens of their own country or of the world. However, the question is not as to what persons of creative talent say when they talk about general affairs but as to what they say when they talk about their specialty.

A simple—and correct—answer is that they talk significantly when they have a broad and sensitive understanding, an analytical power and a gift of expression; that, in short, they may have the critical or expository faculty and they may not. This dictum does not dispose of the issue, however. And Mr Kolodin does not dispose of it, though he states an indisputable truth, when he says: "A man who wrote as much music as Wagner did had an understanding of the procedures and the effort by which a score is created which is not accessible to one whose approach to the art was essentially external. I am not contending that it is therefore a better, or more valid, attitude —merely that it is an individual one, and worthy of attention."

Writings of Composers

It happens that the writings here assembled—by Berlioz, Wagner, Schumann, Tchaikovsky, Liszt, Hugo Wolf, Gounod and two or three other composers—are valuable chapters of musical interpretation. Those who are familiar with the Boston Symphony program books of [illegible] Hale are aware of the frequency with which he quoted Berlioz—"the great Berlioz" Hale sometimes called him, meaning that he was "great" as a writer about other musicians and especially about Beethoven. A few of Mr Kolodin's incidental comments in the foreword may be open to dispute, but the essays that he has assembled in convenient form will assist any amateur's musical education.

Criticism of literature and art by novelists, poets, painters, sculptors and architects often reveals the limitations of what may be called the creative mind (using "creative" in the sense of "producing original works of art"; there are obviously other kinds of creation, and a creative element may appear in criticism). The question was discussed some months ago by Clive Bell with regard to artists' criticism of their contemporaries. Writing in the New Statesman and Nation (London), Mr Bell said: "Painters' criticism of their contemporaries is always untrustworthy. Inevitably so; a sincere and ardent painter is so thoroughly obsessed by his peculiar vision, so deeply convinced of the rightness of his own way of seeing, feeling and expressing, that only by an effort can he avoid regarding a contemporary who sees and feels otherwise as a traitor."

There is, perhaps, some overemphasis here for rhetorical effect; but the underlying truth is apparent. It is applicable to many classes of original workers in literature and the arts. When the creative and critical faculties exist together in the same mind, they may tend to strengthen each other and may alike reveal intuitive insight. Yet the separation of functions is apparent to the reader. Virginia Woolf, for instance, writes novels of merit and vitality in the stream-of-consciousness mode (among the best examples of the type), but when she writes criticism she detaches herself from contemporary fashions and expresses judgments calmly considered in the light of broad knowledge of the enduring art of fiction. T. S. Eliot retains a more personal attitude in his criticism, but his critical writings and his poems spring from different "layers" of mind.

Artists' Self-Absorption

The limitations of artists' criticism are believed to proceed from the egoistic self-absorption of the creative worker. In an essay, "The Prisoners of Self," included in the book "Frames of Mind," published in 1899, A. B. Walkley, English dramatic critic, offered an explanation similar to that suggested by Mr Bell in the article quoted. "The creative mind," Mr Walkley said, "shrinks instinctively from the thought of creations not its own. It seems to be on that condition that it is a creative mind. . . . Disbelief in others, tending to a positive dislike of them, seems to be complementary to that self-confidence, not to say self-admiration, without which you cannot have triumphant self-expression."

"You know who the critics are?—the men who have failed in literature and art." This sneering remark, a paraphrase of something written by Coleridge, is from a novel of Disraeli's. It is very familiar, and apparently denotes a train of thought by which authors have sometimes consoled themselves when their works have been treated unfavorably by critics. One might have supposed that it was an outmoded notion, but it reappeared only a few weeks ago in some remarks of Phyllis Bottome's printed in the Boston Transcript. Critics are more often today accused of other faults—of praising too freely or of judging literature according to alien standards derived from sociology or the Marxist gospel. But evidently Miss Bottome believes that her novels have been adversely reviewed by writers who themselves have tried—and failed—to write popular novels.

If the defects of artists' opinions have been correctly explained, the critic has a defense against the sneers of an offended author. He can reply: "It is we who, whatever our failings, have to write criticism, because you are temperamentally disqualified for the task."

Summer Festival Time

AMERICA'S summer music season is on. Though by the calendar it is still late Spring, there is no mistaking the summer feeling of the outdoor and semi-outdoor events now in progress, with many others of a kindred nature soon to follow. The first fortnight of June brought the openings of the Municipal Opera season in St. Louis, Mo., and the Essex County Stadium Concerts at Newark, N. J., along with the Bach Festival at Berea, Ohio, and the Montreal Festival in Canada's largest city. To the third week of the month belong the openings of the Robin Hood Dell Concerts at Philadelphia, June 18, the Lewisohn Stadium concerts in New York, June 20, and the Zoo Opera in Cincinnati, June 20. Before the month closes Chicago will have both the Grant Park concerts (already begun) and those at Ravinia, beginning June 27. Baltimore, too will swing into line with its Stadium concerts, June 28. Another June opening will be that of the Lost Colony Festival at Manten, N. C., June 29.

With most of the above continuing in July, that month will have various additions to make to the calendar of outdoor musical events. In California, the Hollywood Bowl concerts will begin on July 9. Carmel's Bach Festival is set for July 17-23. In New York, the annual Chautauqua Festival, including opera, symphony and choral events will open on July 14. Another festival is that scheduled for Salt Lake City, Utah, July 20-24. August 1-18 are the dates of the annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass. The summer calendar of important events thus leads on, almost to the Worcester Festival in the early Autumn.

Though a few European festivals are still scheduled, they can have no interest for Americans, who could not normally obtain visas to attend and who would be foolhardy to attempt the trip through the war zones, even if this were possible —and if, as may be seriously questioned, the events ever take place. Nothing indicates America's growing self-sufficiency in music better than the array of festivals in this country. These not only supply the musical needs of this country through the warm weather months but do so without suffering in any way from what is fast becoming a situation of complete severance from former sources of supply of musical talent in Europe. The American festival is international in the same sense that American life is. But it is made in America for Americans—including those Americans who formerly went abroad each summer for their music but who are now learning more and more with every year the wealth of good things in store for them when they stay at home!

MUSICAL AMERICA for June, 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

JUN 5 - 1940

Pop Concerts Begin Monday

WPA Symphony to Give Weekly Concerts in Pleasure Beach Ballroom.

The first pop concert of the weekly summer series by the Bridgeport WPA Symphony orchestra will be given Monday at 8:30 p. m. in the Pleasure Beach ballroom, which has been newly decorated inside in blue and silver. Outside, an extra box office has been built at the entrance. The concerts will be patterned after the pop concerts of the Boston Symphony.

According to arrangements made by the Connecticut Music project and Perry W. Rodman, director of Pleasure beach, these summer 'pops' are to be given each Monday night throughout the summer months. They will be held regardless of weather conditions, and are to start at 8:30 o'clock.

Of particular interest to lovers of music is the announcement that the admission fee will be only 25 cents, which will entitle the ticket-holder to his choice of any seat in the ballroom.

Last year, it will be remembered, the orchestra played to thousands of symphony-lovers, and so great was the attendance that, despite the huge ballroom capacity of 2500, it was necessary to curtail the sale of tickets on several occasions.

With the ballroom cooled by Long Island Sound breezes, and with the inauguration of pop concerts at the low admission fee, it is believed that audiences will be even larger than at last summer's series.

Arrangements are also being completed for the appearance of nationally-known and local soloists to appear on these programs with the symphony orchestra. No advance sale of tickets will be made for the concerts, and patrons are urged to be present early in order to be assured of good seats. The box-office will be opened at 7:30 each Monday night in order to accommodate early arrivals who wish to avail themselves of the choice selections of these seats.

Symphony Hall—Com. 1492
TONIGHT AT 8.30
POPS
ARTHUR FIEDLER—Conductor
SUNDAY, JUNE 9
REQUEST PROGRAM
All Tickets On Sale 2 Wks. in Advance
All Nights Open to the Public

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
JUN 4 - 1940

U. R. to Confer Honorary Degrees Upon Six

Finnish Minister to U. S. Included in Group Chosen

HJALMAR J. PROCOPE

Hjalmar J. Procope, Finnish minister to the United States, will be one of six persons to receive honorary degrees at the university of Rochester's 90th commencement, June 17, in Eastman Theater.

The handsome, 51-year-old Finnish diplomat, whose name became familiar to most Americans during the Russo-Finnish war, will get a doctor of laws degree.

Others to be honored:

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor of [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has led his musicians in concert here on several occasions. He will receive a doctor of music degree.

Stephen Vincent Benet, poet and 1928 Pulitzer prize winner. The degree of doctor of letters will be conferred upon him.

Mrs. Mary Breckenridge, director of the Frontier Nursing Service, Leslie County, Ky. Hers will be a doctor of laws degree.

Dr. Herbert Spencer Gassner, director of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research. He will be given the degree of doctor of science.

Gisela M. A. Richter, English-born curator of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and author of numerous books on the arts. She will get a doctor of fine arts degree.

Two New Scholarships Established at U. of R.

Establishment of two new University of Rochester scholarships was announced yesterday by Dr. Allan V. Heely, headmaster of the Lawrenceville School, Lawrenceville, N. J.

They are made possible through the generosity of Martin F. Tiernan, Essex Fells, N. J., president of Wallace & Tiernan Co., Newark, N. J., a member of the class of 1906, trustee of the University of Rochester and former president of the Lawrenceville School Fathers' Association.

Through arrangement with the University of Rochester, the scholarships have been created with a value up to $500, the annual stipend, up to the maximum, to depend on financial needs of the applicant. They will be continued through the sophomore and junior years, providing the holder maintains the standard required, while in the senior year the scholarship award may be in the form of a loan rather than a gift.

Preference will be given applicants from the Lawrenceville School, but if applicants from that school fail to meet requirements set, or if there is no application in any one year, the scholarships will be made available to candidates from other institutions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

JUN 6 - 1940

Outing at Boston for High School Musicians

Clarence W. Arey, director of the High School music groups, will accompany 87 members of the orchestra and band to Boston Saturday, for a day's outing which includes luncheon and dinner, attendance at a theater or ball game in the afternoon and in the evening the Pop concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Arey has the first three rows booked for the concert, so the visitors will have a good view of Robert Gunderson, member of the violin section of the orchestra, who was the first concert master of the High School orchestra.

Wednesday of next week, the High School band will play at the commencement exercises of Tabor Academy, Marion. The following Saturday, the Academy will entertain the band and the program includes a sailing trip in the Tabor Boy, the academy ship. A special rehearsal is called for Monday to prepare for the Marion engagement.

UNITED STATES
BAPTIST
CHICAGO, ILL
JUNE, 1940

Convention Precenter

Dr. James R. Houghton, Precenter of the Northern Baptist Convention, is professor in Boston University School of Theology. Dr. Houghton has appeared with such organizations as the New York Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, the Syracuse University Chorus, the Back Choir of Baldwin-Wallace College of Berea, Ohio, and others of similar caliber. He is director of choral activities for Boston University, conducts the Boston University Glee Club, the Boston University Seminary Singers, famous group of "singing preachers," and the Amphion Club of Melrose, Mass.

Tumarkin Soloist At Pop Concert

Pianist June 4

Leon Tumarkin of the faculty of the Malkin Conservatory of Music appeared as soloist at last night's Pop Concert in Tchaikovsky's popular First Piano Concerto in B flat minor. Strong, fleet fingers and a sense of dramatic climax made Mr. Tumarkin's interpretation one which had no trouble in dominating the orchestra in passages where it was necessary to do so. And there was drive and temperament enough to win him many [illegible]

Whether there was also the sensitivity and fantasy which Tchaikovsky demands is a question hard to answer, not only because of the many conversations which are the inevitable though often pleasant accompaniment of a Pop Concert, but also because the orchestra and soloist did not always seem to be of one mind about tempi or phrasing.

An unusually boisterous Ride of the Valkyries in the first third of the program was compensated for by the nostalgic, suaver strains of the Johann Strauss Waltz [illegible] and

The Alazounov arrangeemnt of Chopin's Polonaise Militaire, the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," a "Suite Classique" for strings by Frederic Kempf, of the Malkin Conservatory faculty, the Rachmaninoff Prelude in C sharp minor arranged for orchestra, and a Torch Dance from "Henry VIII" completed the printed list to which encores were added.

The Malkin Conservatory, the Palestine Chapter of Eastern Star, the Marot College Club of Boston and the Uxbridge High School had groups of [illegible]

80

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JUN 3 - 1940

University Selects Six Men, Women for Honorary Degrees

Finnish Envoy Heads List

Six men and women who loom large among contemporary leaders in international affairs, human betterment, medical research, art and letters have been singled out for honors at the University of Rochester's 90th annual commencement, June 17.

Honorary degrees will be conferred at the Eastman Theater on:

Finnish Minister Chosen

Hjalmar J. Procope, handsome, 51-year-old minister of Finland to the United States, who will receive the doctor of laws degree.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born 76-year-old conductor of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, doctor of music.

Stephen Vincent Benet, author of the epic poem, "John Brown's Body," and other poems, and 1928 Pulitzer winner; doctor of letters.

Mrs. Mary Breckenridge, director of the Frontier Nursing Service, Leslie County, Kentucky, whose "saddle bag" fight for the Kentucky mountaineers against death and disease is a thrilling page in American pioneering history. She will receive the doctor of laws degree.

Dr. Herbert Spencer Gassner, director, Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, New York City, doctor of science.

For Fine Arts Work

Gisela M. A. Richter, English-born curator of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, associate editor of the American Journal of Archeology and author of numerous books and articles on classic art and sculpture. He will be given a doctorate of fine arts.

Koussevitsky is kell-known to Rochester concert goers, having appeared at the Eastman Theater for several years with the Boston Symphony. Mrs. Breckenridge has spoken before Rochester audiences on her work in caring for isolated mountain folk, serving a 1,000-mile area through eight nursing centers

---

Fiedler Is Applauded In 27th Pop Concert

Transcript June 5

That a Pop Concert program can be both lively and absorbing even though it introduces no soloist in a famous concerto, was proved by the concert which Arthur Fiedler conducted last night in Symphony Hall. None of the numbers offered could be said to be new either to Pops audiences or to the players, yet in spite of the thrice familiar ring of each number and of the encores, there was no atmosphere of triteness about them. There was a gaiety and freshness about the evening's proceedings to which, of course, the high spirits of the audience contributed to no small degree.

Popular the program was, but with the possible exception of Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance March" it included not a single piece of second class music. There was the Prelude to Humperdinck's too rarely heard opera, "Haensel und Gretel," redolent of the woods and the fresh romanticism of Grimm's tales; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Octet, from another epoch of German romanticism and the Ravel Bolero which is still one of the most exciting orchestral tours de force which in its highly sophisticated manner, plays upon our most primitive instincts.

If our friend Waldteufel's waltzing "Skaters" have become a classic of the ballroom and the light concert hall, Cole Porter's "Night and Day" is every bit as vital and interesting a piece of music well on its way toward becoming a classic itself. Curiously enough, the juxtaposition of Brahms's Fifth Hungarian Dance and "Night and Day" did not sound nearly as sacrilegious as it will look on paper to some purists.

The day of the old-fashioned operatic potpourri or fantasia is fast dwindling, and so it was amusing to hear one on Verdi's "Aida" last night. A "Lagro" from Handel's "Xerxes" somewhat ponderous in both tempo and in volume of sound, was offset by a light and skittish performance of the overture to Smetana's "Battered Bride."

The audience was enthusiastic and Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra were generous with encores.

E. D.

This Clipping From PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

JUN 2 - 1940

Survey of Symphony Orchestra Problems Gives 'Inside' Picture

Interesting Investigation Backed by Carnegie Foundation Presents Results for Laymen

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Editor

For the first time, a broad study of America's symphony orchestras—large and small—with special attention to their economic problems is informingly and convincingly recorded in a volume titled "America's Symphony Orchestras and How They Are Supported," by Margaret Grant and Herman S. Hettinger, published by W. W. Norton and Company.

This significant investigation was made possible by a grant from the Carnegie Foundation of New York. In recent years the public has seen the rapidly increasing activity of our symphonic groups; yet the vast majority are unaware of how these organizations come into existence and by what means they are maintained. These questions and many other problems associated with orchestral life and deeds are answered in precise manner in this important book. a thorough reading of which will supply definite explanations and provide an interesting experience.

Mr. Lewando

Of the approximately 400 orchestras operating in the United States it is interesting to note that 16 are of major importance; and these have an aggregate budget of about five million dollars, give 1300 concerts during the regular season and attract a total annual audience of about 2,750,000 persons. Further, it is revealed that there are almost 300 lesser symphonic groups in various communities and, according to estimate, some 30,000 amateur orchestras in schools, colleges and conservatories throughout the country.

The front-line orchestras listed are the N. Y. Philharmonic-Symphony, founded in 1842; the St. Louis Orchestra (1880); the Boston Symphony Orchestra (1881); the Chicago Symphony Orchestra (1891); the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra (1895); the Philadelphia Orchestra (1900); the Minneapolis Orchestra (1903); the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra (1909); Cleveland Orchestra (1918); Detroit Symphony Orchestra (1919); the new Pittsburgh Symphony Society (1926); Rochester Civic-Symphony Orchestra (1929); Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra (1930); National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D. C. (1931); Kansas City Philharmonic Orchestra (1931); and the NBC Symphony Orchestra which was founded in 1937.

* * *

Yet, of all these excellent organisations and despite the high esteem in which they are held, none is free from deficits, and each year every one of them is faced with financial problems of increasing seriousness. Only the three most successful orchestras earn an average of 85% of their budgets, with other orchestras reaching only the 50% mark. Ticket sales alone have never balanced the costs. It has been thus not only in America but also in European countries.

But over there the principal orchestras—most of them—have been aided by the government. This arrangement does not obtain over here, although the Baltimore Orchestra is municipally operated and a small fraction of real esate taxes has been allocated to the orchestra in San Francisco.

Personnel costs represent the principal outlay for an orchestra; the players' and conductors' salaries contribute to two-thirds to three-quarters of expenses. Concerning conductors' fees, the average is about 10% of the personnel cost. This amounts to about $60,000 each for the Boston, New York and Philadelphia groups; and about $30,000 for the secondary groupings. Add soloists' fees, and the personnel expense mounts to four-fifths of the budget. Is it any wonder that those persons who band together in good faith and with good intentions to provide their cities with an orchestra are frequently sufferers from headaches?

However, do not suppose that this volume on orchestras is intent upon presenting adversities. There are many phases dealt with that should be known. There are chapters on orchestra budgets and sources of income and orchestra management and operation that should prove fruitful reading. Another deals with government support of symphony orchestras such as the Federal Music Project and similar groups participating is partial sponsorship of states, counties and cities. Discussed also are ways and means to increase operating income, meeting operating deficit through endowment and maintenance funds. An appendix treats of the future of our orchestra. Other appendices deal with an orchestral survey and a proposed plan for establishing a Federal Fine Arts bureau.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GARDNER, MASS.
NEWS

JUN 6 - 1940

Boston Symphony Honors Old 6th Night of June 17

The old 6th Veterans Association (MNG) have been honored by the management of the "Pops" in having a night designated in their honor on Bunker Hill Day, Monday, June 17, at Symphony hall in Boston. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Conductor Arthur Fiedler, will present a colorful program of martial and patriotic music. This is the first time in the history of the Pops that a veteran organization has been so honored.

Col. Warren E. Sweetser, chairman of the Pops committee, extends a cordial invitation to all veterans organizations who may care to join their comrades of the Old 6th on this evening of rare entertainment. Incidentally, this will be a ladies night. The popularity of the Boston Symphony, who are enjoying their 54th season, has become so well established among music lovers that the attraction needs no introduction.

Veterans desiring to participate should notify Francis W. Marshall, 73 Tremont street, Boston, to secure reservations, or those in Central Massachusetts may communicate with Major W. L. Beaman of this city, if they find it more convenient. Popular prices will prevail.

MUSIC
SYMPHONY HALL
Pops Concert

Jan Smeterlin, the eminent Polish pianist, was soloist at the Pops last night, which concert was to benefit the Palestine Orchestra Fund. Arthur Fiedler conducted, while Mr. Smeterlin's contribution was the solo part of Chopin's Piano Concerto No. 2 in F minor, Op. 21.

The remainder of the program included: Meyerbeer's Coronation March from "The Prophet," Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala," the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Octet, Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody No. 1, a fantasy on Gershwin melodies, Morton Gould's "Pavane" and Sousa's spirited march, "Stars and Stripes Forever."

Mr. Smeterlin received what amounted to an ovation for his masterly rendition of the Chopin Concerto. A more authoritative and inspired reading of Chopin could not be heard. If the reports concerning the composer's playing of his own works are accurate then Mr. Smeterlin played last night as Chopin might have. There was the oft-written-of rubato, the delicate arpeggios, the nearly rigid treatment of the left hand against the almost freely moving right hand. These do not make for distortion of the music, but rather its interpretation in the spirit in which it was intended.

Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra gave adequate support, performing better here than in the rest of the program. However, the exciting, moody Rumanian Rhapsody came off well.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JUN 8 - 1940

Boston Pops Dedicated by 6th Regiment

Symphony Hall Decked in Summer Garb for Summer Season—Veterans' Night June 17.

With the coming of June, Symphony hall in Boston, the home of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is decked in summer garb as the Pops take full possession. The auditorium is decorated in cool green and gold, the customary rows of seats in black leather give way to festive tables where refreshments are served as patrons of the Pops listen to the delightful strains of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 85 pieces under the able direction of Arthur Fiedler.

Monday evening, June 17, has been designated as the Old Sixth Veterans Association night. This is the fisrt time the Pops have honored a veterans organization. Col. Warren E. Sweetser is the chairman of the Pops committee and extends a cordial invitation to all veterans to join their comrades of the Sixth in making this a gala event.

The response to the call has been most generous, but there is still ample time to make reservations. The Pops this season has been playing to SRO nightly—the greatest season in the history of the 54th year of success. Director Fiedler has arranged an exceptionally fine program of martial and patriotic music, ranging from the light classic to numbers of a more momentary and popular sort. Cole Porter, Gershwin or Kern rub shoulders familiarly with Wagner, Tchaikovsky or Johann Strauss, and the public is well pleased if attendance can be taken as a criterion. This is a ladies night, June 17, and veterans desiring to participate should notify Francis W. Marshall, 73 Tremont street, Boston, to secure reservations as soon as possible as the time is fast getting short.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

JUN 7 - 1940

Old 6th Night at Symphony

June 17th Set Aside for Old Organization

With the coming of June, Symphony hall in Boston, the home of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is decked in summer garb as the Pops take full possession. The auditorium is decorated in cool green and gold, the customary rows of seats in black leather give way to festive tables where refreshments are served as patrons of the Pops listen to the delightful strains of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 85 pieces under the able direction of Arthur Fiedler.

Monday evening, June 17, has been designated as the Old Sixth Veterans Association night. This is the fisrt time the Pops have honored a veterans organization. Col. Warren E. Sweetser is the chairman of the Pops committee and extends a cordial invitation to all veterans to join their comrades of the Sixth in making this a gala event.

The response to the call has been most generous, but there is still ample time to make reservations. The Pops this season has been playing to SRO nightly—the greatest season in the history of the 54th year of success. Director Fiedler has arranged an exceptionally fine program of martial and patriotic music, ranging from the light classic to numbers of a more momentary and popular sort. Cole Porter, Gershwin or Kern rub shoulders familiarly with Wagner, Tchaikovsky or Johann Strauss, and the public is well pleased if attendance can be taken as a criterion. This is a ladies night, June 17, and veterans desiring to participate should notify Francis W. Marshall, 73 Tremont street, Boston, to secure reservations as soon as possible as the time is fast getting short.

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
EXAMINER

JUN 6 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Journal American

JUN 6 - 1940

What's the Answer?

(Distributed by King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

1. Match orchestras of the past orchestral season: (1) Boston Symphony, (2) Cincinnati ~~Symphony~~, (3) Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of New York, (4) Chicago Symphony, with Conductors: John Barbirolli, Frederick Stock, Eugene Goossens and Serge Koussevitzky.

2. What is a familiar name for the fever known as psittacosis?

3. Name the two notable Americans of the '60s around whom John Drinkwater wrote dramas.

4. The British have changed the color of their pound notes from green to blue (different shades). Why this?

ANSWERS

1. (1) Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky; (2) Cincinnati, Eugene Goossens; (3) New York Philharmonic Symphony, John Barbirolli; (4) Chicago Symphony, Frederick Stock. Digression A: To what did "lock, stock and barrel" originally refer—now used to mean the whole of anything?

2. Parrot fever or disease. Digression B: What is the showy large blue and yellow, long-tailed, bird of the parrot family called?

3. Abraham Lincoln and Robert E. Lee. Digression C: In nautical usage, give the opposite of lee, as in lee side.

4. As a safeguard against "inflation by forgery"—said by the British to have happened after the World War.

Answers to Digressions

A. The whole gun.
B. Macaw.
C. Weather.

This Clipping From
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
EXAMINER

JUN 6 - 1940

This Clipping From
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

JUN 6 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM SUFFOLK, VA.
NEWS-HERALD

JUN 9 - 1940

CO-OP CONCERT ASSOCIATION PLANS SEASON

Three Outstanding Artists Appear Here Next Winter

The Suffolk Co-operative Concert Association announced today that three outstanding artists had been secured for the annual concert season in Suffolk this coming winter.

Anna Kaskas, contralto; the Kreuter Trio; and Daniel Ericourt, pianist, have been signed for local appearance.

Anna Kaskas, blonde and bewitching young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Association, was born in Bridgeport, Connecticut, in 1910. Shortly afterwards her family moved to Hartford where, at the age of fifteen, she started the study of music in the local conservatory. Her ability caught the interest of a prominent music lover who financed a trip to Lithuania — the birthplace of her parents. There she remained in Kovno for a year, after which the Lithuanian Government sent her to Milan for two year's study. Then the young singer returned to the United States and for four years sang in the Catholic Cathedral of Hartford.

Four years ago Miss Kaskas went to Enrico Rosati, the teacher of Gigli, Lauri-Volpi and Rosa Tentoni, for concentrated study. She had had operatic performances at the New York Stadium Concerts and also in Newark, New Jersey. She entered the Metropolitan Opera Contest in the spring of 1936 and was awarded first place over all contestants. In her capable hands were placed the roles of Maddalena in "Rigoletto' and Lola in "Cavalleria Rusticana" as well as the title part in the long-heralded revival of Gluck's "Orpheus and Euridice." Her excellence in these parts brought her the choicest plum of all — a contract to appear in leading roles in the Metropolitan's regular winter season.

During the summer of 1938 she was soloist with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Festival, with the New York Philharmonic - Symphony under Eugene Ormandy at the Silvermine Festival, and with the Toronto Promenade Symphony under Reginald Stewart. Last season she sang again under Koussevitzky at Symphony Hall, with the Cleveland Orchestra under Rodzinski. and was soloist at the Preview Concert of the New York World's Fair.

The brilliant pianist, Daniel Ericourt, is known as one of the most accomplished of younger contemporary French musicians. Born near Paris, he has lived surrounded by music from an early age. He began to play the piano when he was six, and at nine had been admitted to the Paris Conservatoire. There he studied with Santiago Riera, Roger Ducasse and Nadia Boulanger. When Ericourt was sixteen, he was graduated from the Conservatoire with the First Grand Prize. Five years later, while still serving in the French army, he won the Diemer Award, one of the highest distinctions that can come to a pianist of any nationality.

Ericourt made many enriching contacts with famous musicians while he was still very young, contacts such as many musicians wait years to acquire. At thirteen he played with Debussy himself in a two-piano recital in Paris Ravel, Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Roussel and Honegger are among the other composers whom Ericourt has known personally.

Shortly after graduating from the Conservatoire, the young artist commenced a tour of Europe that brought him renown and insistent demands for return engagements. Concert engagements have taken him many times to Paris, London, Berlin, Brussels, Monte Carlo, Vienna, Budapest, The Hague, and other important musical centers. He has played also under the batons of such famous conductors as Pierne, Wolff, Monteux, Kolar, Barlow and Goossens.

Ericourt has appeared recently with the Detroit, Cleveland, Cincinnati, San Francisco, Portland, National (Washington, D. C.), and New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestras, and has given two New York piano recitals. both eminently successful. In the spring of 1939 he was featured with Lily Pons at the opening of the French Pavilion of the New York World's Fair. The pianist now makes his home in the United States where he is in growing demand on the country concert courses.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PLAINSFIELD, N. J.
COURIER-NEWS

JUN 8 - 1940

Rutgers Concert Series Will Feature Notables Next Fall and Winter

Dr. Howard D. McKinney, director of music at Rutgers University, has named the artists engaged for the college's 25th series of five annual concerts given in the gymnasium which seats 3,000. Many Plainfielders renew their subscriptions year after year.

On Oct. 9 Paul Robeson will be the soloist. This famous Negro basso, born in Princeton, was one of Rutger's football heroes and a Phi Beta Kappa student, graduating in the class of 1919. Vladimir Horowitz, virtuoso pianist, who returned to the concert stage this season, will be featured on Thursday, Oct. 31.

The Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra will come to New Brunswick on Tuesday, Dec. 10. Lotte Lehman, soprano, and Lauritz Melchior, of the Metropolitan Opera Company will give a joint recital in this series on Feb. 14. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will close the season ~~as usual~~, the date being Apr. 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
UNION

JUN 9 - 1940

NATIVE WORK STRESSED BY DR. HANSON

American composers are much indebted to Dr. Howard Hanson for his consistent stressing of American music. Dr. Hanson heads the Eastman School of Music, Rochester, N. Y., which recently concluded its 10th annual festival of American music. The five concerts in the series included 25 American compositions.

Walter Piston's "The Incredible Flutist," story by Hans Wiener, was considered the outstanding number.

Many news scores were given first performance, among them Roy Harris' "Folksong Symphony," dedicated to Dr. Hanson. The new symphony by the former Los Angeles resident, is in seven movements for chorus and archestra and is built on entire folk melodies rather than fragments.

It is said to be a live work with a fine blend of orchestral colors and a real American flavor. It would be great to hear it this summer in the bowl series, Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff, conducting.

An innovation in the festival was an evening devoted to American songs. Radiana Pasmore, who has been heard here on several different occasions was the contralto soloist.

Frederick Fennell, who will be remembered as the somewhat spectacular drummer during a bowl season by the San Diego Symphony orchestra, now a full-fledged conductor at Eastman, directed the school symphony orchestra in a pregram of novelties, opening with a first performance of Edmund Haines' "Symphony in Miniature."

Featuring one program, Dr. Hanson's Third Symphony first publicly performed last November by the Boston ~~symphony~~ orchestra, received an enthusiastic ovation.—S.B.M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORWOOD, MASS.
MESSENGER

JUN 11 1940

Local Youths Are Graduated From Boston University

BOSTON— W hile war cannons break Europe apart, the 1940 crop of approximately 1404 Boston University graduates who are members of this year's graduating class, participated yesterday in the Boston Arena in the 67th formal commencement program of the historic university. Senior festivities were in order all last week, climaxing Saturday in the annual grand alumni reunion on the new campus by the Charles river.

Hundreds of alumni had their first opportunity to study the 20-foot model of the proposed university campus on display during the day in the Charles Hayden Memorial building, first unit of the campus development.

With President Daniel L. Marsh of Boston University delivering the sermon, the traditional Baccalaureate services were held for the first time in the Boston Arena in order to accommodate the large numbers of relatives and friends who have taxed the Symphony Hall capacity every June.

Yesterday Dr. William Preston Few, noted president of Duke University, Durham, N. C. advised the 1400 graduates on "Public Duties of Educated Men," a timely subject in the light of current conditions not only abroad but in the U. S. A. Last night's gala "Boston University Pops Concert" with Arthur Fiedler conducting the musicians of the Boston ~~Symphony Orchestra~~ lent its ~~usual~~ brilliant climax to the festivities of the University's commencement week-end. Today or certainly later this month, the earnest work of life will begin for the majority of the 1400 academic-robed men and women who received their degrees, confirmation of studies completed satisfactory.

Local graduates include:

Barbara Gould Nichols, 3 Douglass ave., diploma in secretarial studies at the College of Practical Arts and Letters.

William Robert Pothier, 161 Bond st., certificate of Bachelor of Science in Business Administration with commission as second lieutenant, infantry reserve. Special field: Management. Activities: House of Representatives; Junior Week committee; Scabbard and Blade; Skull; Head Cheer Leader.

Willard Joseph Stanewick, A. B., 30 St. Paul ave., the degree of Master of Arts at the Graduate school. Special field: History.

Alfred Lowell Pederson, 22 South st., Medfield, received the degree of Bachelor of Science at the College of Liberal Arts.

MUSIC

Pops Concert

The Boston Pops orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting, gave its 34th program in Symphony Hall last night before a capacity audience. Hazel Hallett, pianist, was the soloist. The program listed the following works:

Marche Militaire	Schubert
Minuet of the Will-O'-the-Wisps	Berlioz
Children's Suite	Naginski
Finale from the 7th Symphony	Beethoven
Overture to "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
Concerto No. 1 in E flat	Liszt
Tales from the Vienna Woods	Strauss
Begin the Beguine	Porter
Semper Fidelis	Sousa

Last night's Pops concert...and by the way they're still selling out to the eaves every night...was distinguished mostly for a first Boston performance and for a good interpretation of the Liszt E flat concerto by Hazel Hallett. The first performance in this case was Naginski's "Children Suite," a witty, impressionistic suite in four brief movements depicting with childlike (but not by any means childish) naivete some of the drolleries of childhood. Of the four sections by the 30-year-old American composer, "Waltz for a Sad Doll" and "Hobby-Horse" were particularly clever, but the literalness of "Travel" brought sufficient response to indicate that it will remain on the Pops' repertoire as an encore.

It might be mentioned in passing that the encore to Naginski's suite, the Polka from Shostakovich's ballet "Golden Age," was written expressly to poke fun at non-Soviets who enjoy lush, capitalistic Strauss waltzes and polkas. Needless to say, it is very funny. Miss Hallet, a talented pianist, gave a good accounting of herself in the concerto. She had a neat sense of balance against the orchestra, and although she was to some extent wanting the bravura domination this work requires, her performance was clean and telling, especially in the lyric solo passage of the slow section. She was given a warm reception by the audience. The rest of the program went off likewise to every one's apparent satisfaction.

R. F. E., Jr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JUN 10 1940

This Clipping From
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES

JUN 10 1940

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVENING PUBLIC LEDGER

JUN 10 1940

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

JUN 11 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHOENIX, ARIZ.
ARIZONA REPUBLIC

JUN 11 1940

DR. F. S. CONVERSE, COMPOSER, IS DEAD

Westwood, Mass., June 9.—(AP)—Dr. Frederick S. Converse, 69, one of the first native American composers of grand opera and former dean of the New England Conservatory of Music, died last night at his home.

His opera, "The Pipe of Desire," in 1909, was the first American opera to be produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, and won for him in 1926 the David Bispham Medal of the American Opera Company.

He was the composer of more than 100 works, including the grand opera, "The Sacrifice," based on a Mexican-American romance during the war with Mexico, and a symphony, "Flivver 10,000,000," which was designed to give all the sounds associated with a "flivver" automobile.

The latter composition was played by the Boston symphony in 1927. Dr. Converse ~~recently~~ completed his sixth symphony.

A native of Newton, he was graduated with highest honors in music from Harvard in 1893 when his sonata for violin and piano was played at commencement.

He studied in Munich, and later taught at the New England Conservatory and at Harvard. Subsequently, he became dean of the Conservatory, serving from 1930 to 1938, when he resigned to devote himself to composition.

During the World War, Dr. Converse was a member of the national committee in charge of music in training camps, and he was one of the organizers and first vice president of the Boston Opera Company.

He leaves his widow and five daughters: Louise, wife of Junius S. Morgan, eldest son of J. P. Morgan; Mrs. Samuel Peabody, of Groton; Mrs. George McCook, of Pasadena, Cal.; Mrs. Paul Cabot, of Needham, and Mrs. Sumner Roberts, of Newton.

Tel. WAtkins 9-4586
"SERVES YOU RIGHT"
PUBLIC SERVICE
CLIPPING BUREAU
INC.
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPINGS
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

JUN 1 1932

Boston Symphony Pop Concerts Begin Tonight

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first program of a June radio series of Boston Pop Concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony Hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard at 10 to 10:45 p. m. over an WEAF coast-to-coast network.

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the fire Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston Symphony. His inaugural Pops broadcast will include the following numbers:

Arthur Fiedler

Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
"Masquerade," An American Rhapsody .... McKinley
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube" .... Strauss
"The Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner

The orchestra of 85 Symphony players is considered one of the finest to be heard in the country at this season of the year.

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new height of popularity. Mr. Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony orchestra, having been born in Boston, son of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel Quartet.

MISSING
PAGE(S)

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

JUN 18 1940

UR Gives Diplomas to 477 Students, Confers Honorary Degrees on Six Recipients of honorary degrees at the University of Rochester's commencement were, from left: Gisela M. A. Richter of the Metropolitan Museum; Stephen Vincent Benet, author; Mrs. Mary Breckinridge, Frontier Nursing Service head; Herbert S. Gasser of Rockefeller Institute; Serge Koussevitzky, orchestra director, and Hjalmar Procope, Finnish minister to this country. A record class of 477 received diplomas.

Finnish Minister Hears Tribute To Homeland

BISHOP TUCKER

Tribute to the "valorous integrity of Finland" was offered by the University of Rochester yesterday as, in ceremonies shadowed by developments abroad, it honored Finland's envoy to this country and conferred the largest number of earned degrees in its history.

News that France had asked peace terms reached recipients of six honorary degrees and the 477 academic degree candidates as they lined up in Eastman Theater's foyer for the start of the 90th commencement procession.

Reaction was swift — ranging from an intensification of the applause given Hjalmar J. Procope, Finnish minister, as he was given the degree, doctor of laws, to an interpolation by the commencement speaker, Episcopal Bishop Beverley D. Tucker of Ohio, in his prepared address.

Departing from manuscript, Bishop Tucker told of the "vale of sorrow" into which all were plunged by "events which appall us," and later added another phrase: "I fear that the real value we have lost is the dignity and sacredness of human personality."

Before the colorful academic procession moved from the foyer Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, summarized the feeling of many faculty members and distinguished guests by saying: "France will live again. Ten Hitlers cannot quench the flame of her culture, the greatest we have."

Tribute to Finns' Valor

From several other recipients of honorary degrees came a call that Americans avoid defeatism. In the commencement exercises President Alan Valentine and faculty members sponsoring the distinguished guests emphasized citations which stressed their peaceful contribution to civilization at a time when the philosophy of force seems dominant.

Dr. Dexter Perkins, presenting Minister Procope for his degree, expressed admiration for "a people which, menaced by external aggression, has preserved its dignity, its valor, and its way of life." And, as the hood of the new degree went over Dr. Procope, Dr. Valentine recalled Finland as peopled by folks "who might be cousins of those who camped at Valley Forge . . . upright figures, unconquered by the storm."

To Dr. Koussevitzky, sponsored by Director ~~Howard~~ Hanson of the Eastman School of Music, Dr. Valentine offered the degree of doctor of music "in honor of your contribution to the ultimate victory of the spirit over the world of force."

THIS CLIPPING FROM OSWEGO, N. Y.
PALLADIUM TIMES

JUN 18 1940

LARGEST GRADUATING CLASS AT ROCHESTER

ROCHESTER, N. Y., June 18 (AP)—The largest graduating class in the history of the University of Rochester heard Monday that "in a changing social order, in a world upheaval the sure rock upon which any stable society is founded" is "the simple integrity of individual men and women."

The Rt. Rev. Beverly D. Tucker, Episcopal bishop of Ohio, told the 478 who were graduated that the integrity of the individual is the fundamental principle in the "higher loyalty of an education."

Honorary degrees were given to six persons at the university's 90th commencement exercises, including a doctorate of laws to Hjalmar Procope, minister of Finland to the United States.

Others honored were: Mrs. Mark Breckenridge of Wendover, Kentucky, director of the Frontier Nursing Service, doctor of laws; Stephen Vincent Benet, poet and 1928 Pulitzer prize winner, doctor of letters; Dr. Herbert Spencer Gasser, director of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, doctor of science; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, ~~doctor of~~ music, and Gisela M. A. Richter, curator of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, doctor of fine arts.

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—THURSDAY, JUNE 27, 1940

Music Soothes G. O. P.'s Tinkham

"MUCH MORE HARMONIOUS" THAN CONVENTION

While most other Republican big-wigs were at party's Philadelphia convention last night, Congressman Tinkham was at Pops concert here. To interviewers he said: "The pressure in Washington is so terrific it's hard to relax. This is great and besides, the Pops is in my district." He's shown autographing program for Mary Roach of East Bridgewater.

This Clipping From BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS

JUN 27 1940

Prefers Pops to Politicians

GEORGE H. TINKHAM

BOSTON, June 27 (AP).—Massachusetts' veteran Republican Representative George Holden Tinkham, who has a penchant for going on African hunting trips during election campaigns, gave politics another new wrinkle Wednesday night. He attended a Boston Symphony "pops" concert while the G. O. P. convention was going on in Philadelphia. "Much more harmonious," he said when asked to compare the concert to a political convention.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUN 27 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

JUN 27 1940

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

JUN 27 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO.
TELEGRAPH

JUN 18 1940

NICOLAS SLONIMSKY, NOTED MUSIC AUTHORITY, LECTURES TONIGHT

Professor Nicholas Slonimsky, prominent musical virtuoso, will lecture tonight at the Temerity ranch in Pine valley on "Latin American Music." Professor Slonimsky was formerly a member of the staff of the Eastman School of Music, former assistant to Serge Koussevitzky, Boston symphony orchestra and ~~was founder~~ of the Chamber orchestra in Boston, Mass. He has been guest conductor in the principal cities of the old world and delegate to the festival of Latin American music held in Bogata, Columbia, in 1938. With this broad background in the field of music, Professor Slonimsky's lecture will prove an occasion of much interest.

"As a conductor Mr. Slonimsky has power, authority and inspiration. As a pianist he plays with skillful measure of tone, musical perception practical and imaginative sympathy," says the Boston Evening Transcript.

Mr. Slonimsky is the composer of many musical gems, the best known being "My Little Pool."

The concert is one in a series of lectures and concerts held at Temerity ranch and at the Half-Way house, during the Latin-American session of Bahais at the ranch. Mr. Slonimsky's lecture will be one of the highlights of the two-week session and he will highlight his lecture with illustrative Master records. Mr. Raphael Pumpelly of New York, will preside.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

RHINEBECK, N.Y
GAZETTE
6/21/40

"Farewell Symphony"

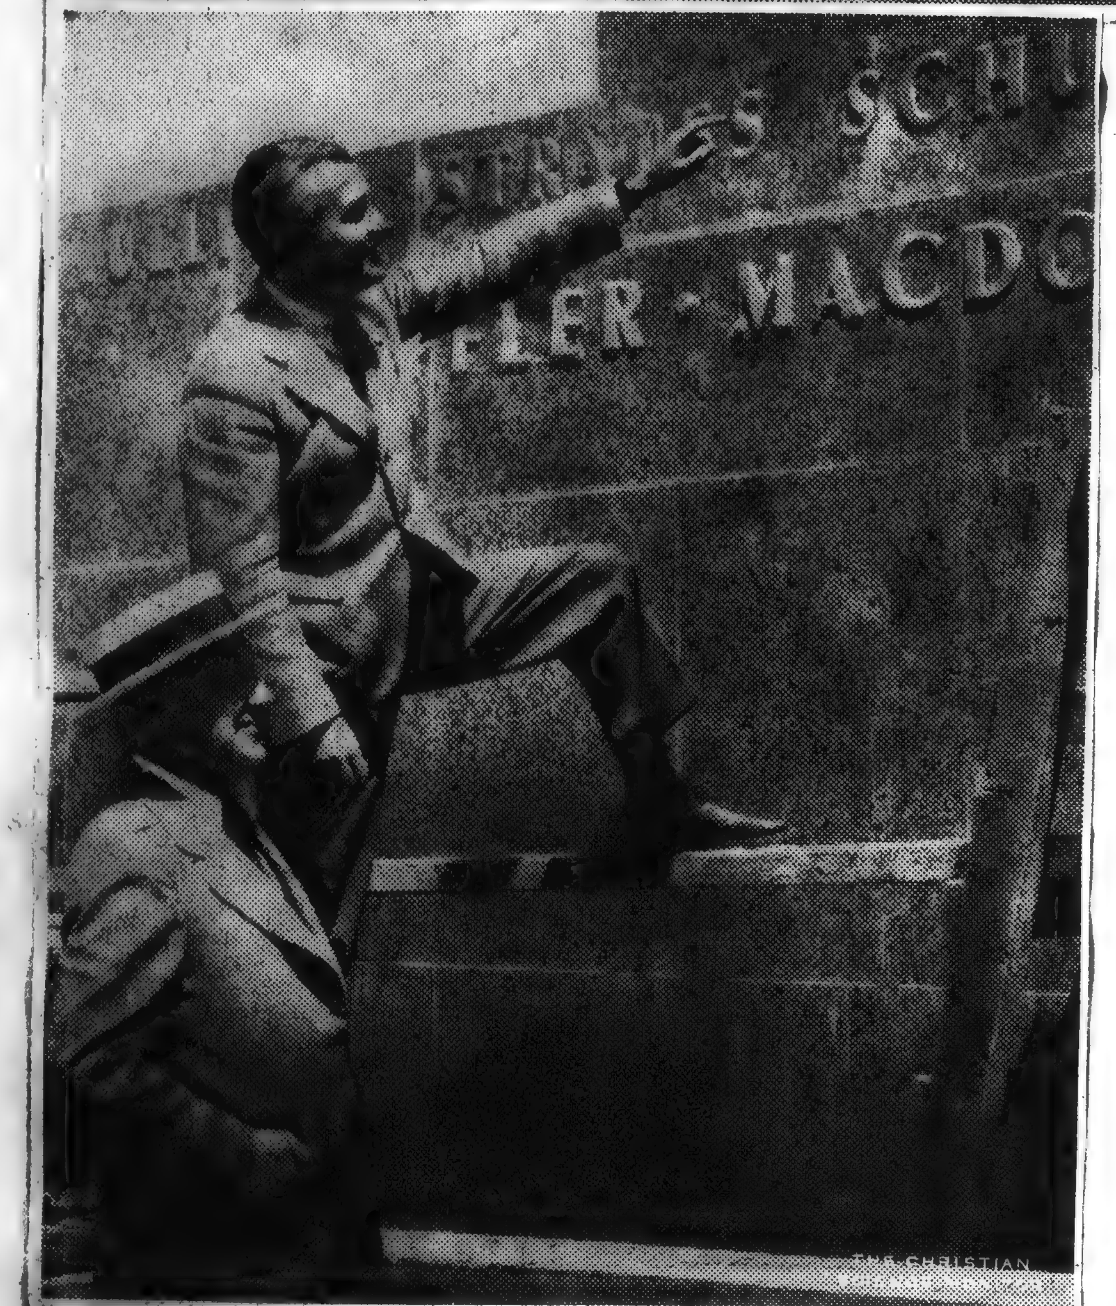
The presentation of Jan Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" at Boston's Symphony Hall by Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra, dressed in the costumes of Haydn's period, recalls the Austrian musician's motive for its composition.

It was while Haydn was conductor of Prince Esterhazy's orchestra that he composed this beautiful orchestral work. A short time before its preparation Haydn asked for an extended vacation; but the Prince, expecting some important visitors, urged the conductor to cancel his plans temporarily. Haydn, undiscouraged, ingeniously repeated his request in musical form by so arranging the instrumentation of the last movement of the symphony that one by one the musicians in the orchestra would stop, pick up their instruments, blow out the candles on their stands, and walk out of the room, leaving but two musicians to play the last bar of the movement.

Needless to say, the "Farewell Symphony" gained the desired leave of asence for Jan Haydn.

New Esplanade Shell a Marvel in Beauty

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR



By a Staff Photographer

Structure on the Charles Nearly Completed

Top—Panorama of the week-old landscaping of the 60,000-square-feet "auditorium" in front of the new Edward Hatch Memorial Concert Shell on the Esplanade.

Bottom—Richard Shaw, architect, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor.

85

THE BOSTON HERALD,

NETHERLANDS RELIEF night program at the Pops tomorrow will include the sale of photograph shown being autographed by Arthur Fiedler, conductor. Egon Petri, Dutch pianist, will be the soloist. These Bostonians of Dutch extraction are, left to right, Jacqueline Hart, Francine J. Krosschell, Johanna Auer, Thomas Korthals, Anita Langendoen, Mrs. William Ripley and Nora van der Groen.

Usher Honored as Composer at Pop Concert

A Symphony Hall usher had one of his compositions played last night by the Pops Orchestra. He is Carlton S. Beyer, 26-year-old graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music who has been ushering Boston music patrons to their seats for the last 12 years.

Thrilled and beaming, Beyer saw the big white card bearing his title, "The Bugler's Holiday," announcing his piece as an encore. He heard it played by his chum and fellow student at the Martin School, Roger Voisin. He went to the stage when Conductor Arthur Fiedler beckoned, the enthusiastic applause of the audience drumming in his ears. He made his bow as a composer whose work had just been played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Beyer wrote "The Bugler's Holiday" for Voisin this Spring. Last night was its first performance. A trumpeter himself, he says he can't play this particular work—"Not without a lot of practice."

Usher Takes Bow as Composer

CARLTON S. BEYER ON PLATFORM

Left to Right—Beyer, Conductor Arthur Fiedler and trumpeter Roger Voisin, who played Beyer's composition, "The Bugler's Holiday," at Pop concert in Symphony Hall last night.

Symphony Hall Usher Honored as Composer

Continued from the First Page

Beyer, who besides ushering, has been a taxi driver and a member of several local dance orchestras, is writing a symphony.

"It's in one movement, he pointed out, "It's sort of modern, with some dissonances and all that but I don't think it is too much on the very modern style."

A Roxbury boy from 'way back—he is married and now lives at 745 Huntington av.—Beyer says that when he's ushering he "picks his own concerts."

"When the orchestra is playing something that's too mch of an old story to me," he explained, "I stay in the corridor. But when it's something I'm interested in, I'm right inside with the audience."

Herald June 27

Esplanade Concerts

This is an excellent time to put an end to the hand-to-mouth maintenance fund which enables Arthur Fiedler and his sixty Boston Symphony musicians give us our Esplanade concerts. On Tuesday evening they will begin their twelfth season. They will move into a new shell which cost $270,000, exclusive of $30,000 for landscaping.

Despite this generous gift to the citizens by the late Edward Hatch and his sister, Maria, who lived for many years on Commonwealth avenue, sponsors of the free concerts are encountering great difficulty in raising about $16,000 for the pay of the musicians. Somehow there is an impression that the Hatch trust provided for maintenance. The result is that the number of contributions received to date is about one-half of what was anticipated. Not a cent of the Hatch bequest can be diverted to maintenance.

About sixty of the world's most proficient musicians play under Conductor Fiedler in the best shell in the United States, and the only one of permanent masonry construction. Support for these performances comes from the people. The donations received from the first have been meagre and disappointing. Many thousands who enjoy the music have neglected to do what little they reasonably could. Music-lovers are not niggardly, and the people at the Esplanade audiences are not parsimonious, but the fact is that more nickels, dimes, quarters and bills ought to be dropped into the receptacles provided, and more gifts sent to Mr. Fiedler. The address of the Esplanade Concert Fund is Merchants National Bank, Boston.

86

MUSIC

14th June

Pops Concert

The 50th—and penultimate—program of the Boston Pops orchestra was given before a capacity audience last night in Symphony Hall to benefit the Holland Relief Fund. Arthur Fiedler conducted and Egon Petri, pianist, was soloist. The program:

Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or" ... Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" ... Mozart
Finale from the Symphony in D minor ... Cesar Franck
Variations on a Dutch Theme, for String Orchestra ... Langendoen
(Conducted by the composer)
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 73, "Emperor" ... Beethoven
Voices of Spring, Waltzes ... Strauss
Knightsbridge (March) from London Suite ... Eric Coates
Prayer of Thanksgiving, Old Dutch Hymn ... Valerius-Kremser

The Pops audience was last night privileged to hear one of the world's foremost pianists in a prodigious interpretation of the formidable "Emperor" concerto. It seems a trife late in the day to point out that the "Emperor," from its majestic introduction to its triumphant conclusion requires the utmost technical and intellectual equipment from both soloist and orchestra. That Mr. Petri possesses these qualifications in abundance is too well known to require confirmation here. That the Boston Pops orchestra is likewise equipped is equally self-evident. Yet considering the time of year, the ennui which must grip both conductor and musicians whose last 50 more or less consecutive nights have been devoted to producing music, a casual approach was almost to be expected. It is definitely to Mr. Fiedler's credit that such was not the case.

Soloist and orchestra projected the entire work in a manner approaching if not actually transcending a mid-February concert. Mr. Petri's powerful yet fully controlled technique, his significant conception of the architectural dimensions and his exhaustive treatment of every musical shading brought him a tremendous ovation. To this the pianist responded with a vivacious Beethoven bagatelle, one of the very few times a soloist has encored at a Pops concert.

Of note also, was a performance of Jacobus Langendoen's "Variations on a Dutch Theme" (from Valerius). Mr. Langendoen has long since distinguished himself as the first desk 'cellist of the orchestra. He assumed the role of conductor for his piece last night, and was warmly received. His variations indicated a deep knowledge of the possibilities of the strings, and while they were hardly of great imaginative sweep, they were sound and scholarly, the final fugue being decidely effective. The program as a whole was of greater interest than most Pops programs and it consequently received a more distinguished reading at the hands of the conductor. In fine, the Pops and its soloist went to town, the emphasis being on the soloist. In the absence of the Dutch ambassador, Prof J. A. C. Fagginger Auer gave a brief talk concerning the Netherlands.

R. F. E., Jr.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Arthur Fiedler will bring to a close tonight the 55th season of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. The program follows:

Slavonic Dance No. 15 ... Dvorak
Overture to "Mignon" ... Thomas
Largo from "Xerxes" ... Handel
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" ... Saint-Saens
Austrian Peasant Dances ... Schonherr
Molly on the Shore ... Grainger
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ... Wagner
Rhapsody in Blue ... Gershwin
Soloist: Leo Litwin
"Prayer of Thanksgiving," Old Dutch Hymn ... Valerius-Kremser

---

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES

JUN 30 1940

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUN 30 1940

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUN 30 1940

$270,000 Boston Concert Shell To Be Dedicated Tuesday Night

70 Symphony Musicians to Open 12th Season of Charles Rives Musicales; "Crunch of Feet on Gravel Walks" Will Be Eliminated

Boston, June 29.—(AP)—A new $270,000 concert shell, reputed to be the only outdoor one of permanent masonry in the world, will be completed in time for dedication Tuesday night when 70 Boston Symphony musicians will open the 12th season of Charles River esplanade musicales, orchestral officials announced tonight.

The esplanade shell, built as a memorial to the late Edward Hatch, of Boston, according to provisions in the will of his sister, Maria E. Hatch, is made of reinforced concrete faced with granite. An arched ceiling over the stage is of Burmese teakwood.

The stage will accommodate 150 persons, and the interior of the structure contains a rehearsal room, fitted with air-conditioned cabinets to provide appropriate temperatures for violins, strings and other equipment. There also is a corridor, or "ambulatory" where musicians may warm up their instruments, and a room where players may take shower baths.

The Hatch will also provided $30,000 for landscaping the environs where an audience of 20,000 persons can be accommodated. The lawn is being trimmed with an asphalt walk which orchestral representatives said would "eliminate the crunch of feet on gravel walks which has disturbed listeners in the past."

OK
AF

Appreciative Audience!...

All of you know Arthur Fiedler, whose work has given so many hours of enjoyable music to appreciative "Pops" audiences. Pictured here with Mr. Fiedler is the Mercury 8 Convertible Sedan, with automatic top—newest in the popular line of Mercurys. Mr. Fiedler is a Mercury owner.

MONTH AFTER MONTH the chorus of praise grows . . . Mercury is really different! . . . Mercury's brilliant V-8 powerplant is giving owners up to 20 miles per gallon . . . Mercury's surprising bigness and roominess are streamlined into stunning new beauty . . . Mercury's remarkable big-car riding ease is matched by handling ease surprising in a car of any size . . . These are some of the many reasons why appreciative audiences all over America are rapidly joining the second hundred thousand of Mercury owners!

Mercury 8

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION & REPUBLICAN

JUN 30 1940

Boston Symphony In 'Pop' Concerts

Boston—The Symphony Hall "Pops" have been thriving since their 55th season began on May 8, reports Musical Courier. Apart from the Pops, however, Boston has seen little or no important musical activity in the public concert halls.

Numerous pianists have been heard with Arthur Fiedler and the Pops orchestra—Fray and Braggiotti, duo-pianists; Jesus Maria Sanroma, who played the Paderewski A minor concerto; Leo Litwin in Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue; Selma Kramer, who offered the rarely-done G major Concerto of Tchaikovsky, and Leon Tumarkin, of the Malkin Conservatory faculty, whose vehicle was the familiar B flat minor Concerto by Tchaikovsky.

Two members of the Longy school faculty have appeared: Yves Chardon conducted a program as guest, and E. Power Biggs performed the solo portion of a Handel organ concerto.

Quincy Porter, dean of the New England Consevatory, was represented both as composer and conductor when he directed his own incidental music to the play "Antony and Cleopatra."

A promising student was revealed at Colby Junior college night at the Pops, as 18-year-old Maxine McCurry played the first movement of Schumann's A minor concerto.

MUSIC

Pops Concert

The 50th—and penultimate—program of the Boston Pops orchestra was given before a capacity audience last night in Symphony Hall to benefit the Holland Relief Fund. Arthur Fiedler conducted and Egon Petri, pianist, was soloist. The program:

Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or" Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" Mozart
Finale from the Symphony in D minor Cesar Franck
Variations on a Dutch Theme, for String Orchestra .... Langendoen
(Conducted by the composer)
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 73, "Emperor" ....Beethoven
Voices of Spring, Waltzes ...... Strauss
Knightsbridge (March) from London Suite .... Eric Coates
Prayer of Thanksgiving, Old Dutch Hymn .... Valerius-Kremser

The Pops audience was last night privileged to hear one of the world's foremost pianists in a prodigious interpretation of the formidable "Emperor" concerto. It seems a trifle late in the day to point out that the "Emperor," from its majestic introduction to its triumphant conclusion requires the utmost technical and intellectual equipment from both soloist and orchestra. That Mr. Petri possesses these qualifications in abundance is too well known to require confirmation here. That the Boston Pops orchestra is likewise equipped is equally self-evident. Yet considering the time of year, the ennui which must grip both conductor and musicians whose last 50 more or less consecutive nights have been devoted to producing music, a casual approach was almost to be expected. It is definitely to Mr. Fiedler's credit that such was not the case.

Soloist and orchestra projected the entire work in a manner approaching if not actually transcending a mid-February concert. Mr. Petri's powerful yet fully controlled technique, his significant conception of the architectural dimensions and his exhaustive treatment of every musical shading brought him a tremendous ovation. To this the pianist responded with a vivacious Beethoven bagatelle, one of the very few times a soloist has encored at a Pops concert.

Of note also, was a performance of Jacobus Langendoen's "Variations on a Dutch Theme" (from Valerius). Mr. Langendoen has long since distinguished himself as the first desk 'cellist of the orchestra. He assumed the role of conductor for his piece last night, and was warmly received. His variations indicated a deep knowledge of the possibilities of the strings, and while they were hardly of great imaginative sweep, they were sound and scholarly, the final fugue being decidely effective. The program as a whole was of greater interest than most Pops programs and it consequently received a more distinguished reading at the hands of the conductor. In fine, the Pops and its soloist went to town, the emphasis being on the soloist. In the absence of the Dutch ambassador, Prof J. A. C. Fagginger Auer gave a brief talk concerning the Netherlands.

R. F. E., Jr.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Arthur Fiedler will bring to a close tonight the 55th season of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. The program follows:

Slavonic Dance No. 15............Dvorak
Overture to "Mignon"............Thomas
Largo from "Xerxes"..............Handel
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Austrian Peasant Dances........Schonherr
Molly on the Shore..............Grainger
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"........................Wagner
Rhapsody in Blue...............Gershwin
Soloist: Leo Litwin
"Prayer of Thanksgiving," Old Dutch Hymn..............Valerius-Kremser

---

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES

JUN 30 1940

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUN 30 1940

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUN 30 1940

$270,000 Boston Concert Shell To Be Dedicated Tuesday Night

70 Symphony Musicians to Open 12th Season of Charles Rives Musicales; "Crunch of Feet on Gravel Walks" Will Be Eliminated

Boston, June 29.—(AP)—A new $270,000 concert shell, reputed to be the only outdoor one of permanent masonry in the world, will be completed in time for dedication Tuesday night when 70 Boston Symphony musicians will open the 12th season of Charles River esplanade musicales, orchestral officials announced tonight.

The esplanade shell, built as a memorial to the late Edward Hatch, of Boston, according to provisions in the will of his sister, Maria E. Hatch, is made of reinforced concrete faced with granite. An arched ceiling over the stage is of Burmese teakwood.

The stage will accommodate 150 persons, and the interior of the structure contains a rehearsal room, fitted with air-conditioned cabinets to provide appropriate temperatures for violins, strings and other equipment. There also is a corridor, or "ambulatory" where musicians may warm up their instruments, and a room where players may take shower baths.

The Hatch will also provided $30,000 for landscaping the environs where an audience of 20,000 persons can be accommodated. The lawn is being trimmed with an asphalt walk which orchestral representatives said would "eliminate the crunch of feet on gravel walks which has disturbed listeners in the past."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

JUN 30 1940

Boston Symphony In 'Pop' Concerts

Boston—The Symphony Hall "Pops" have been thriving since their 55th season began on May 8, reports Musical Courier. Apart from the Pops, however, Boston has seen little or no important musical activity in the public concert halls.

Numerous pianists have been heard with Arthur Fiedler and the Pops orchestra—Fray and Braggiotti, duo-pianists; Jesus Maria Sanroma, who played the Paderewski A minor concerto; Leo Litwin in Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue; Selma Kramer, who offered the rarely-done G major Concerto of Tchaikovsky, and Leon Tumarkin, of the Malkin Conservatory faculty, whose vehicle was the familiar B flat minor Concerto by Tchaikovsky.

Two members of the Longy school faculty have appeared: Yves Chardon conducted a program as guest, and E. Power Biggs performed the solo portion of a Handel organ concerto.

Quincy Porter, dean of the New England Consevatory, was represented both as composer and conductor when he directed his own incidental music to the play "Antony and Cleopatra."

A promising student was revealed at Colby Junior college night at the Pops, as 18-year-old Maxine McCurry played the first movement of Schumann's A minor concerto.

Appreciative Audience!...

All of you know Arthur Fiedler, whose work has given so many hours of enjoyable music to appreciative "Pops" audiences. Pictured here with Mr. Fiedler is the Mercury 8 Convertible Sedan, with automatic top—newest in the popular line of Mercurys. Mr. Fiedler is a Mercury owner.

Month after Month the chorus of praise grows . . . Mercury is really different! . . . Mercury's brilliant V-8 powerplant is giving owners up to 20 miles per gallon . . . Mercury's surprising bigness and roominess are streamlined into stunning new beauty . . . Mercury's remarkable big-car riding ease is matched by handling ease surprising in a car of any size . . . These are some of the many reasons why appreciative audiences all over America are rapidly joining the second hundred thousand of Mercury owners!

Mercury 8

BLANK PAGE

ONE HUNDRED AND MORE

THINGS TO SEE in Boston

AND SURROUNDING CITIES AND TOWNS

Globe Sept 21

No. 114—The Hatch Memorial Shell on the Charles River Esplanade.

(Associated Press photo.)

For sheer beauty probably Monday evening's programme of the American Legion Convention will be "tops," however spectacular and spirited the parade on Tuesday. Boston's Charles River Basin is at its loveliest when lights glow above the dark silhouettes of its bridges creating a backdrop within view of the audience facing the scene pictured above, of the subtly illuminated new Hatch Memorial Shell. After the concert, at 10 o'clock, fireworks over the Basin, will, it is promised, create a spectacle of unrivalled splendor.

The picture shows a fraction of the immense audience, 28,000, of July 3, when the new Shell was dedicated, and its marvelous acoustics tested. The results then at the ensuing open-air concerts gave assurance that the music could be heard with the closest approach to the fidelity of indoor production yet achieved by modern acoustic science. The use of teakwood carpentered with precision in concentric rings and treated with a specially prepared paint to preserve it against weather and yet not interfere with its resonance, was decided upon by Professor William Barss, formerly of M. I. T., after experiments with glass blocks for the interior of the sound shell.

The Shell is based upon New Hampshire granite. In the structure beneath it there is space for a small concert hall, dressing rooms, lockers, and a music library. Through it, too, the players enter and leave the Shell stage.

This splendid memorial to Edward Hatch was built from the $300,000 bequest of his sister. Through the efforts of Attorney-General Dever, the memorial fund was revealed, and subsequent discussion determined upon this use for it. Two hundred and seventy thousand dollars were apportioned to the construction and the remaining $30,000 to making the grounds more suitable. The conductor of the Esplanade concerts, Arthur Fiedler, was one of the happiest of those present at the dedication. Twelve years ago he had begun to dream of the lovely possibilities of the place for open-air concerts, but this perfect arrangement had not occurred as within the range of realization. The concerts have been incredibly popular drawing crowds from communities miles away from Boston's heart.

The use of this setting, large enough for a vast concourse for such events as the Legion's concert, suggests endless possibilities for it beyond the popular symphony orchestra performances each July.

The Basin has been the theatre of some of Boston's most fruitful developments during the past decade. Another gift to the city for its improvement—$1,000,000, from Mrs. James J. Storrow—was increased by an appropriation to $2,280,000 to be used to bring the Embankment roads underpass and other developments into being. The steady growth of use of the Basin, and indeed of the Charles River banks far beyond its limits, has been one of the most valuable recreational movements in Boston's history. Fine beaches for bathing, bath-houses, boat-houses, facilities for races of sailboats, outboard motor boats and racing shells—both private and public, have drawn people of all groups to it for sports and refreshment. The restaurants on Memorial Drive are not only popular but provide excellent food and in some, luxurious lounge equipment, as well as a charming outlook.

Skating rinks, dance halls and other Coney-Islandish-on-a-small-scale entertainment are available at one section of the Drive on the Cambridge banks.

One of the more conservatively attracting parts is on the Beacon street bank—the Lagoon—delightful in summer and in winter, where people sail their small boats or skate on a lighted rink. The Lagoon beside the West Boston bridge has been the scene of a fine experiment by School Committeeman Joseph Lee. He devised inexpensive sailboats, slim and graceful, for the children of the poorer districts and personally taught them to handle them by an ingenious teaching device. At one time, he had 200 children sailing. He also encouraged building gondolas and adding the touch of soft Italian singing by the lad who was the gondolier. Later the use of the Basin in this fashion was the subject of some controversy.

However, in general, the Storrow Fund and enterprise by the authorities have been the cause of happy developments about the Charles River Basin.

Tomorrow's Picture—Old Fireplace in the Old Union Oyster House.

for manuscripts that are lost or go astray. Do not send manuscript unless you are willing to agree to this rule. Unavailable manuscripts are returned, provided return postage accompanies the stories.

All stories printed in the Post become the exclusive property of the Post Publishing Co. and are covered by this paper's copyright of its contents.

THE WEEK'S AWARDS

The first prize of $10 is paid for the story entitled, "Grandmother's Choice," by Miss Florence I. Demaris, 24 Buswell street, Boston, Mass.

Second prize of $5 is paid for the story entitled, "End of Summer," by Miss Bertha Leah Cross, 163 Bow street, Franklin, N. H.

Awards of $2 each are made for the stories entitled as follows: "Love vs. Love," by Mrs. Sadie Goulston, 53 Charlotte street, Dorchester, Mass.; "Broken Appointment," by Miss Vera Holland," 99 First street, Medford, Mass.; "Situation Wanted," by Miss Dorothy W. Hallen, Parker avenue, Holden, Mass.; "Big Shot," by Mrs. Winona Nichols, 56 Water street, South Glastonbury, Conn.

Sewing Circle Letter Award

An award of $5 is made for the most interesting letter of the week to the Sewing Circle to Mrs. M. J. Peppe, 12 Aldrich street, Bridgewater, Mass.

The Oldest Inhabitant Says:

"Boston's warmest day for the 22nd day of September within my recollection was by official figures 94 in 1895.

"Our coldest for this date was 35 in 1902.

"We've had no rain at Boston on this date during the past 20 years except in the years 1921, 1924, 1931 and 1934.

"The weather record for 100 years ago today was 'Frost—killed vines'."

This Clipping From
YONKERS, N.Y.
RECORD

APR 27 1941

WORDS and MUSIC

By H. T. BARON

Beethoven's last years were spent in writing some of his greatest works: the Ninth Symphony, the last four quartets, the "Hammerklavier" Sonata, the "Missa Solemnis." It is the latter, a massive work which consumes an hour and a half in its playing, that is given its first modern recording by Victor this month, in a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, the Harvard Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society (Albums 758-759). Soloists include Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; John Priebe, tenor; Norman Cordon, bass, with E. Power Biggs at the organ.

Because of the comparatively limited appeal of such a work even to most collectors of recorded classics, it would hardly have been practicable for the Victor Company to make this gigantic recording in a special studio. It had to be transcribed, therefore, during an actual concert performance. Considering the difficulties involved in making records this way, the two-volume set of 24 sides is remarkably free from unfortunate breaks between record sides, and from extraneous noise; particularly so in comparison with the Bach "St. Matthew Passion" which was performed by the same orchestra and choral groups, and recorded under similar circumstances.

The "Missa Solemnis" (Op. 123) maintains a curious position among Beethoven's creations. Acknowledged as an indubitable masterwork, it is nonetheless unfamiliar to many music-lovers who are acquainted with virtually every other important composition by Beethoven. It is, of course, a work that is performed only on rare occasions, and further, there were until now no domestic recordings by which collectors of Beethoveniana could familiarize themselves with it, save by consulting a score. Too, the size of the "Missa" is enough to keep all but the musical brave at a distance; only the opera 'Fidelio," of all Beethoven's output, matches it in size. Indeed, this Mass is more characteristic of Johann Sebastian Bach, Beethoven's musical predecessor, than it is of Beethoven himself.

* * *

Regarding Beethoven's choral writing, some musical scholars have maintained that his ability in this field is not consistent with his supreme artistry in the symphonic realm. The requirements of the Mass, too, imposed rigid, unwelcome restrictions upon the composer who was accustomed to expressing himself freely. But admitting that there are technicalities about Beethoven's choral writing that performers find it difficult to surmount, the fact remains that the sum impression of the Mass, as after the chorale of the Ninth Symphony, is of a glimpse into the sublime. Beethoven indeed communed with the gods in much of his music, but nowhere else more surely than here.

Work on the "Missa Solemnis" was begun in 1818, and was designed for the ceremony of the enthronement of the Archduke Rudolph, Beethoven's patron, as Archbishop of Olmutz. But though the enthronement took place in 1820, Beethoven would not be hurried into completing the Mass; it was not until two years later that the titanic work was finally finished. The composer himself heard it performed but once, shortly before his death—and then only three of the five portions into which the Mass is divided.

The present reading contains the original Latin text, and a booklet that accompanies the recording supplies a helpful translation. To undertake the performance of such a work in its entirety requires both patience and fortitude to an extraordinary degree, but the current group of atists, it is evident at every turn, demonstrate that painstaking attention to the many intricate details of this lengthy work that make for a first-class reading of the Mass. The set has been clearly recorded and overlooking the minor annoyances that are inevitably found in transcribing music from an actual concert, can well be considered a definitive performance of the work on discs.

This Clipping From
CHARLESTON, W. VA.
GAZETTE

APR 27 1941

'Missa Solemnis' Called Admirable

Vividly Dramatic Bethoven Work Is Recorded By Victor

Topping Victor's list this month is an admirable recording of Beethoven's vividly dramatic and impassioned "Missa Solemnis," one of the greatest examples of music set to a liturgical text.

It is performed by the Harvard Glee club, Radcliffe Choral society and the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Soloists are Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, and Norman Cordon, bass.

The difficult balance between soloists, chorus and orchestra is well maintained by the conductor as well as by acoustical engineers, while Koussevitzky's interpretation combines sureness of detail and regard for the heroic sweep of Beethoven's melodic line. Of the soloists Cordon shows up the best.

Of the Victor releases by Kirsten Flagstad, soprano, and Lauritz Melchior, tenor, the most recent, the duet of Kundry and Parsifal from the second act of Wagner's "Parsifal," is by all odds the best. Both vocalists sing in opulent fashion some of the most poignant of the composer's music.

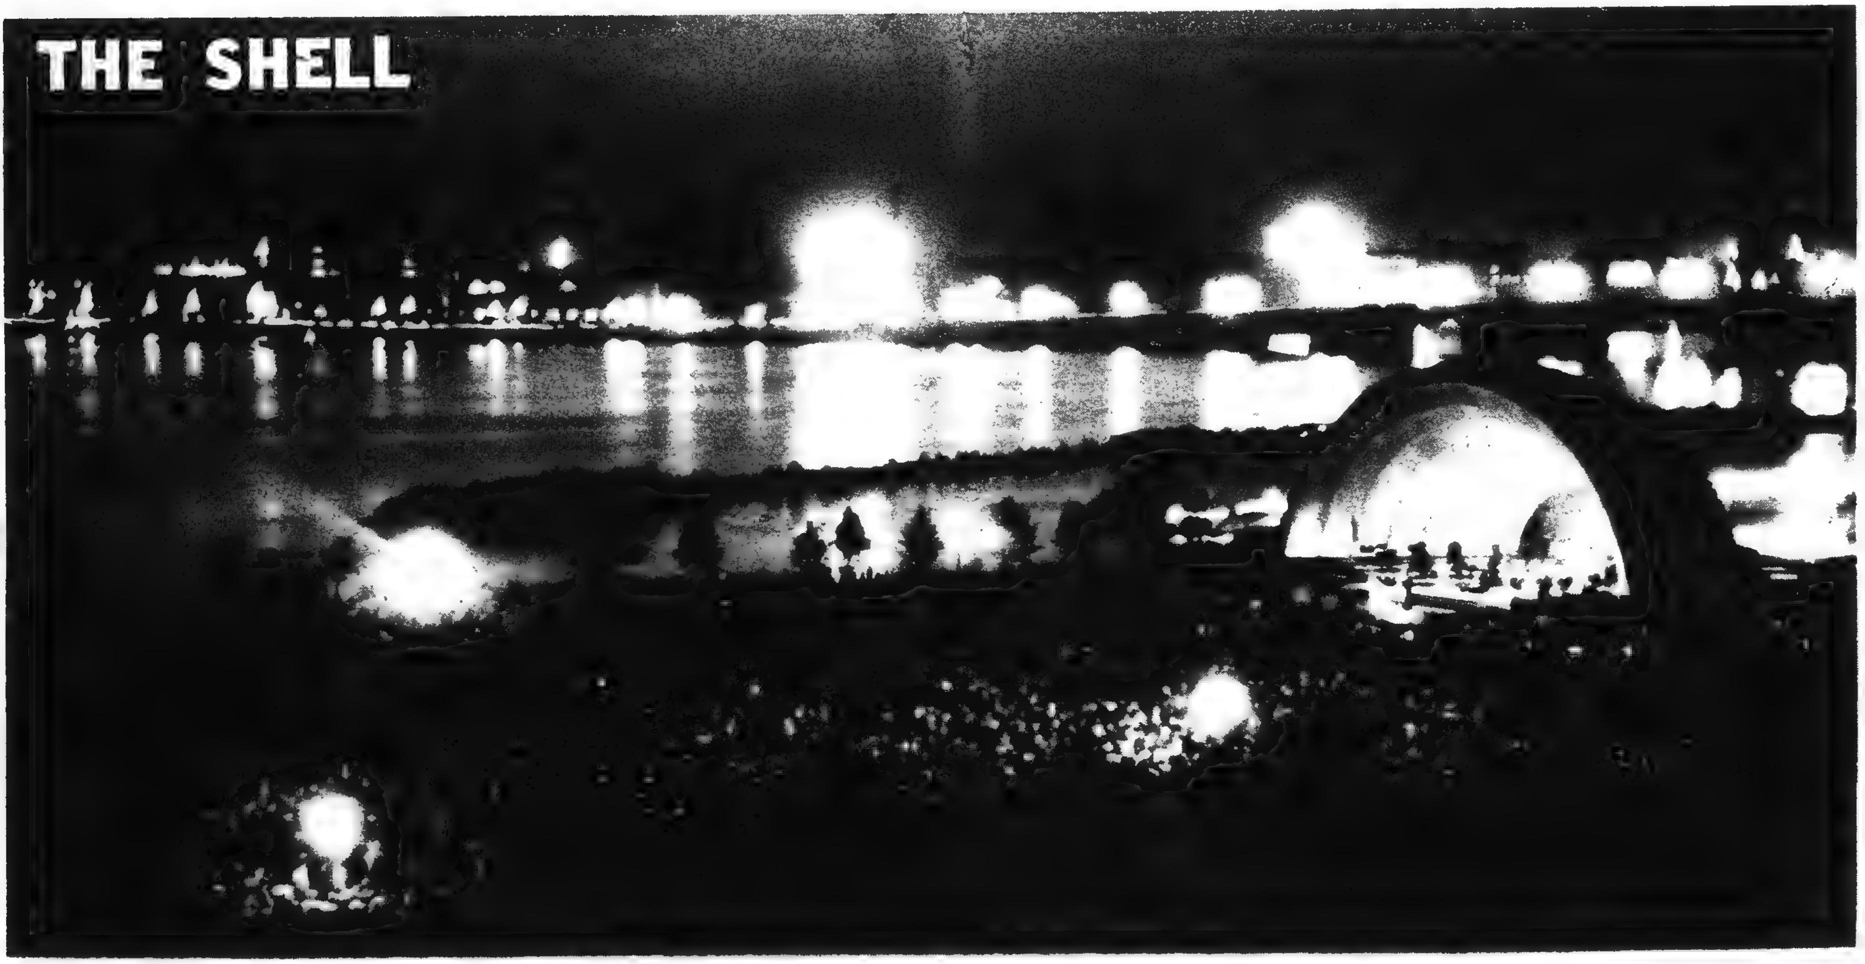
The Victor orchestra directed by Edwin McArthur sounds somewhat feeble at times, partly due to having been placed too far away from the microphone.

"Scenes from Shakespeare Plays," featuring Otis and Cornelia Skinner, is an interesting novelty in recorded literature and one well worth possessing.

Singly and together, father and daughter present the murder scene from "Macbeth," the wooing scene from "The Taming of the Shrew," Marc Anthony's oration from "Julius Caesar," the potion speech from "Romeo and Juliet," Portia's Mercy speech from "Merchant of Venice," and "The Seven Ages of Man" from "As You Like It."—B.F.E.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE FOR SEPTEMBER 22, 1940

THE SHELL



Concertorium on Charles River Esplanade, where tonight's concert will be held. This shows the opening concert of the new $300,000 Hatch Memorial Shell on its completion this Summer. The audience numbered 20,000 for this open air concert, one of the Summer series of concerts on the Charles River Basin given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This distinguished orchestra, first organized in 1881 by Henry L. Higginson, is housed in beautiful Symphony Hall, where the Legion delegates will hold their business session.

THE SHELL

Concertorium on Charles River Esplanade, where tonight's concert will be held. This shows the opening concert of the new $300,000 Hatch Memorial Shell on its completion this Summer. The audience numbered 20,000 for this open air concert, one of the Summer series of concerts on the Charles River Basin given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This distinguished orchestra, first organized in 1881 by Henry L. Higginson, is housed in beautiful Symphony Hall, where the Legion delegates will hold their business session.

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 911
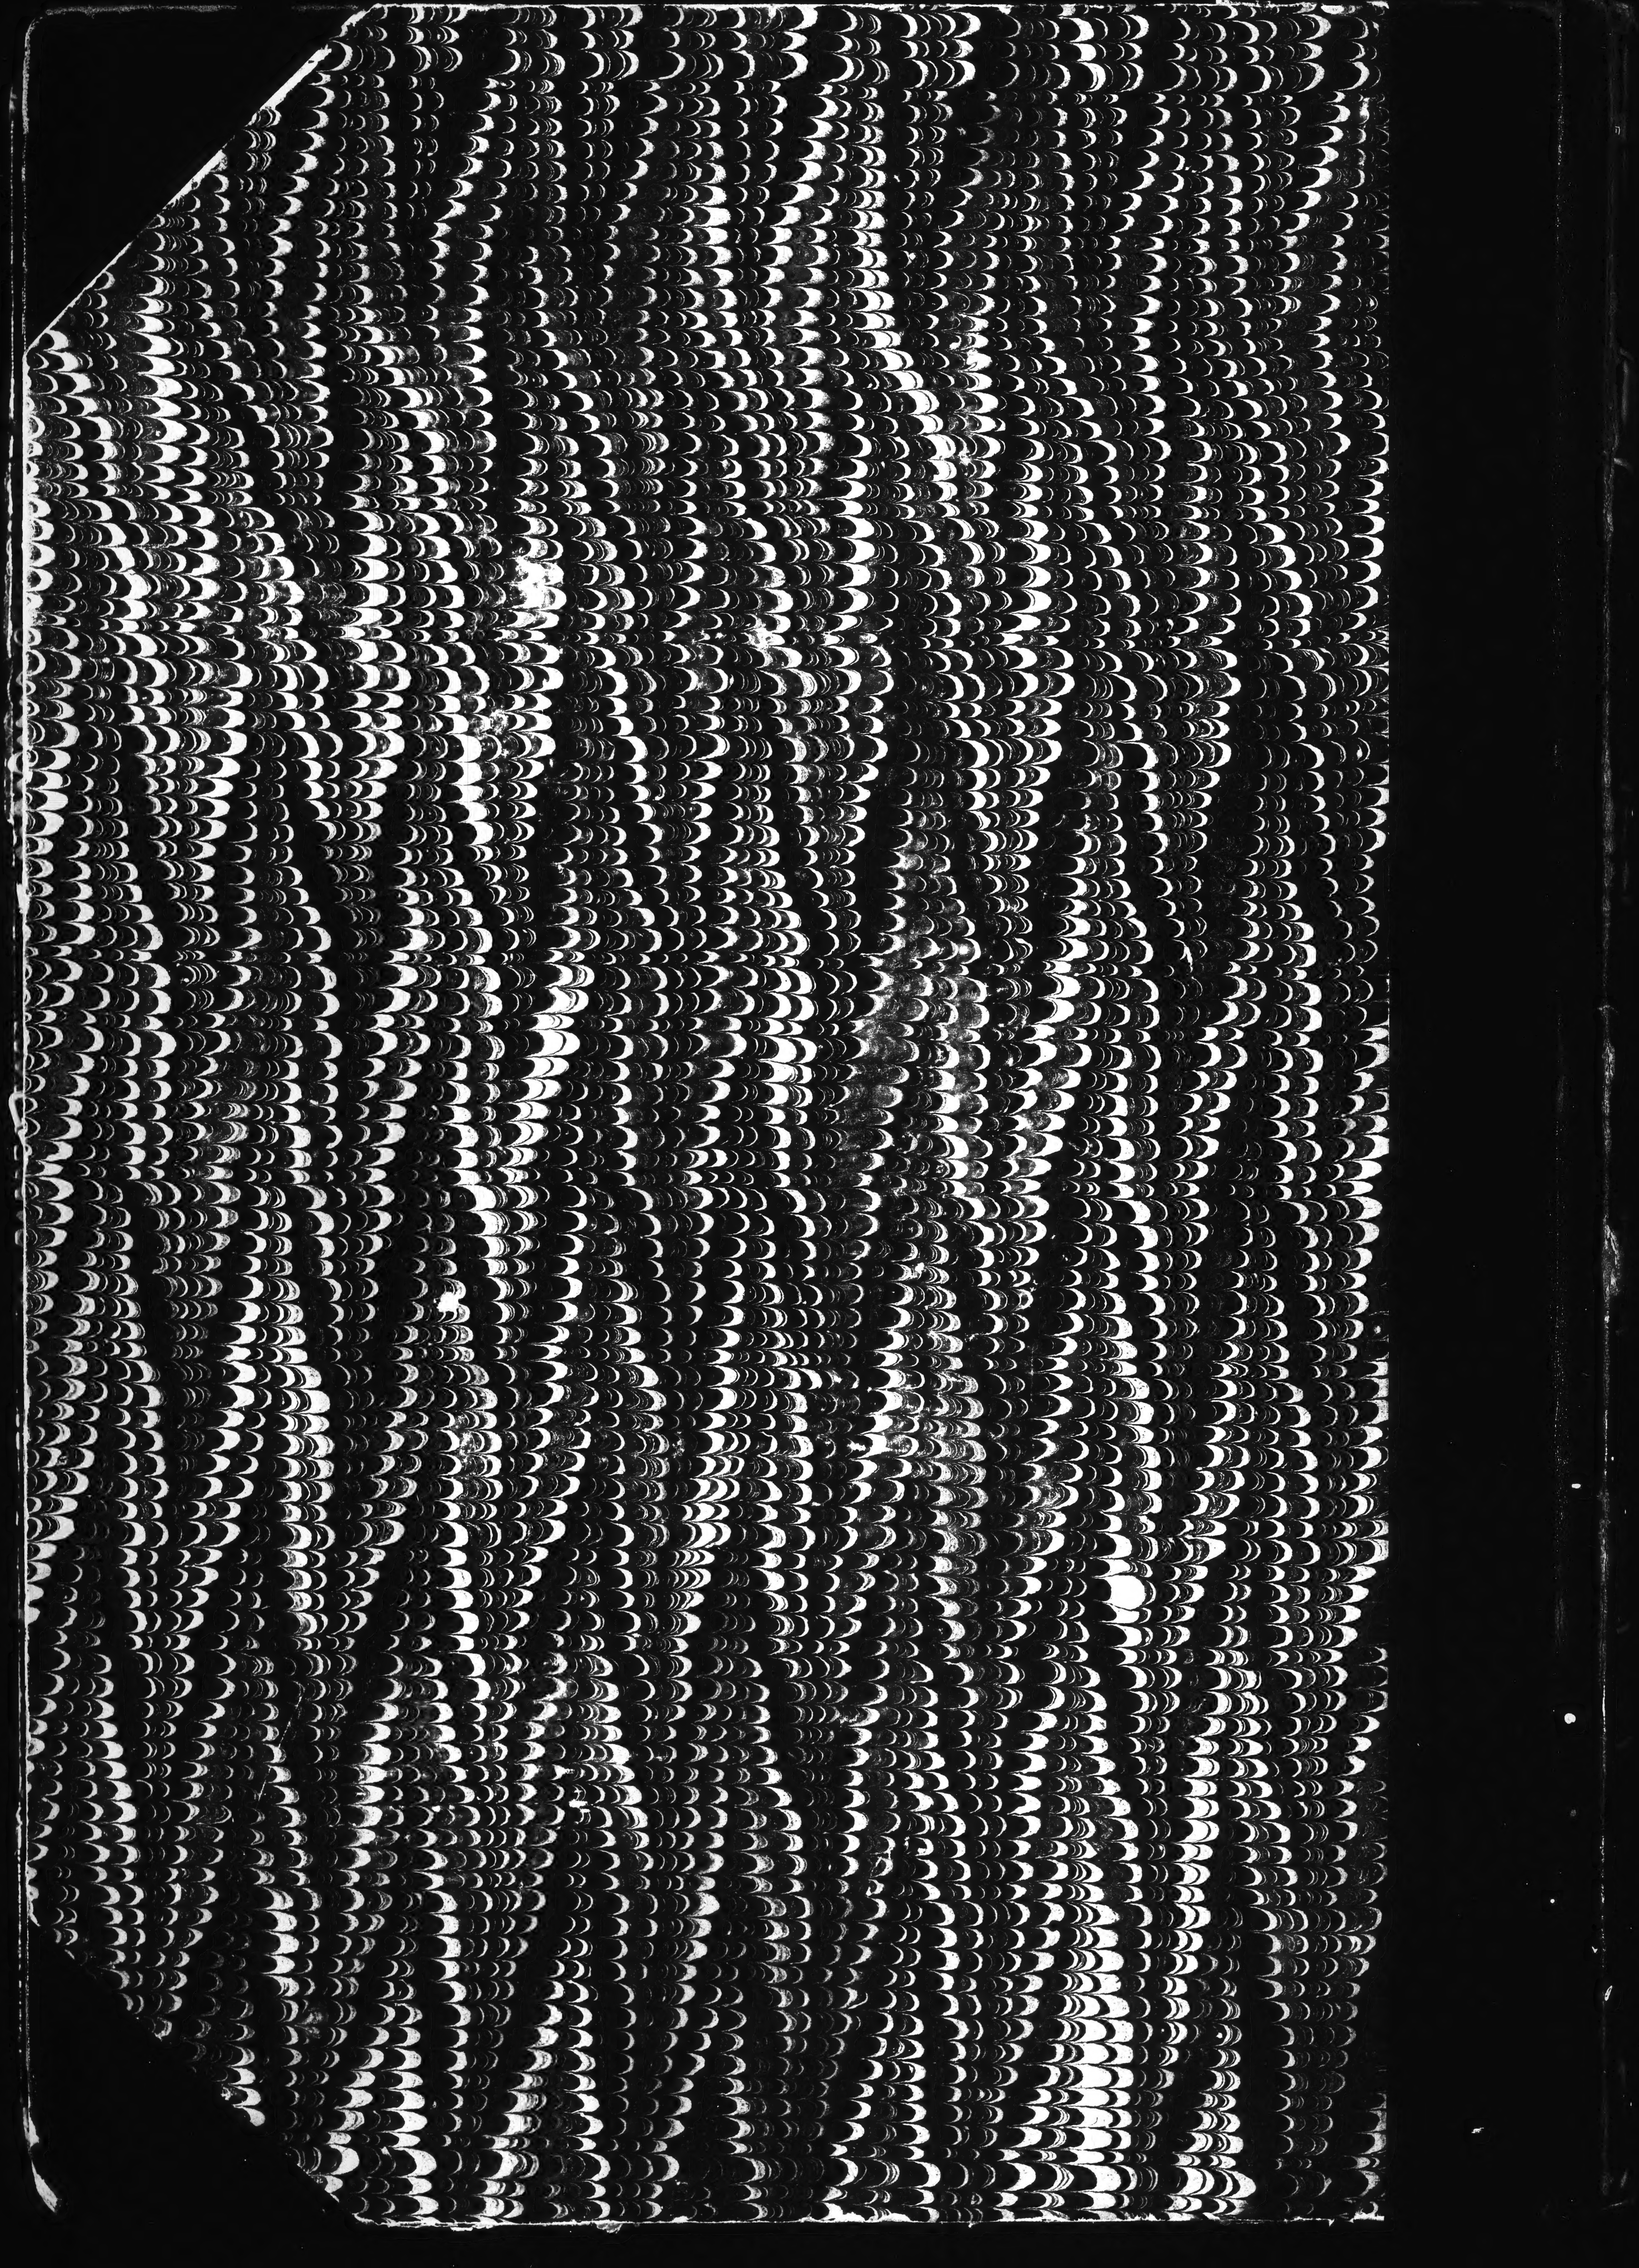
ASA L S SONS
Ward's
STATIONERS
57-61 FRANKLIN ST.
BOSTON



END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND